THE COMMISSION.

Whitehall, September 12, 1907.

The KING has been pleased to issue a Commission under His Majesty's Royal Sign Manual to the following effect :—

EDWARD, R. & I.

EDWARD THE SEVENTH, by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, Defender of the Faith, Emperor of India, to

Our trusty and well-beloved :—

Sir Henry William Primrose,* Knight Commander of Our Most Honourable Order of the Bath, Companion of Our Most Exalted Order of the Star of India, Companion of the Imperial Service Order ;

Sir Frederic Styles Philpin Lely, Knight Commander of Our Most Eminent Order of the Indian Empire, Companion of Our Most Exalted Order of the Star of India ;

Sir Steyning William Edgerley, Knight Commander of Our Royal Victorian Order, Companion of Our Most Eminent Order of the Indian Empire ;

Romesh Chunder Dutt, Esquire, Companion of Our Most Eminent Order of the Indian Empire ;

William Stevenson Meyer, Esquire, Companion of Our Most Eminent Order of the Indian Empire ; and William Lionel Hitchens, Esquire ; Greeting !

Whereas We have deemed it expedient that a Commission should forthwith issue to enquire into the relations now existing for financial and administrative purposes between the Supreme Government and the various Provincial Governments in India, and between the Provincial Governments and the authorities subordinate to them, and to report whether, by measures of decentralization or otherwise, those relations can be simplified and improved, and the system of Government better adapted both to meet the requirements and promote the welfare of the different Provinces, and, without impairing its strength and unity, to bring the executive power into closer touch with local conditions :

Now know ye, that We, reposing great trust and confidence in your knowledge and ability, have authorized and appointed, and do, by these Presents, authorize and appoint you, the said Sir Henry William Primrose* (Chairman) ; Sir Frederic Styles Philpin Lely ; Sir Steyning William Edgerley ; Romesh Chunder Dutt ; William Stevenson Meyer ; and William Lionel Hitchens to be Our Commissioners for the purposes of the said enquiry.

And for the better effecting the purposes of this Our Commission, We do, by these Presents, give and grant unto you, or any three or more of you, full power, at any place in Our said United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or in India, to call before you such persons as you shall judge likely to afford you any information upon the subject of this Our Commission ; and also, whether in Our said United Kingdom, or in India, to call for, have access to and examine all such books, documents, registers and records as may afford you the fullest information on the subject, and to inquire of and concerning the premises by all other lawful ways and means whatsoever.

And We do, by these Presents, authorize and empower you, or any three or more of you, to visit and personally inspect such places as you may deem it expedient so to inspect for the more effectual carrying out of the purposes aforesaid.

* Sir Henry Primrose subsequently resigned, and Mr. C. F. H. Hobhouse, M.P., then Under Secretary of State for India, and now Secretary to the Treasury, was appointed Chairman of the Commission—see page iv.

And We do, by these Presents, will and ordain that this, Our Commission, shall continue in full force and virtue, and that you, Our said Commissioners, or any three or more of you, may from time to time proceed in the execution thereof, and of every matter and thing therein contained, although the same be not continued from time to time by adjournment.

And We do further ordain that you, or any three or more of you, have liberty to report your proceedings under this Our Commission from time to time, if you shall judge it expedient so to do.

And Our further will and pleasure is that you do, with as little delay as possible, report to Us under your hands and seals, or under the hands and seals of any three or more of you, your opinion upon the matters herein submitted for your consideration.

Given at Our Court at Saint James's, the seventh day of September, one thousand nine hundred and seven, in the seventh year of Our Reign.

By His Majesty's Command.

H. J. Gladstone.

EDWARD, R. & I.

EDWARD THE SEVENTH, by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, Defender of the Faith, Emperor of India, to

Our trusty and well-beloved :—

Charles Edward Henry Hobhouse, Esquire, one of the Under Secretaries of State to Our Principal Secretary of State for India ; Greeting !

Whereas by Warrant under Our Royal Sign Manual, bearing date the seventh day of September, one thousand nine hundred and seven, We were pleased to appoint Commissioners to enquire into the relations now existing for financial and administrative purposes between the Supreme Government and the various Provincial Governments in India, and between the Provincial Governments and the authorities subordinate to them, and to report whether, by measures of decentralization or otherwise, those relations can be simplified and improved, and the system of Government better adapted both to meet the requirements and promote the welfare of the different Provinces, and, without impairing its strength and unity, to bring the executive power into closer touch with local conditions.

And Whereas the Chairmanship of the Commission is at this present void by the resignation of Our Trusty and Well-beloved Sir Henry William Primrose, Knight Commander of Our Most Honourable Order of the Bath.

Now know ye that we, reposing great trust and confidence in your knowledge and ability, have authorized and appointed and do, by these Presents, authorize and appoint you the said Charles Edward Henry Hobhouse to be Chairman of the said Commission in the room of the said Sir Henry William Primrose, resigned.

Given at Our Court at Saint James's, the twenty-first day of October, one thousand nine hundred and seven, in the seventh year of Our Reign.

By His Majesty's Command.

ROYAL COMMISSION UPON DECENTRALIZATION IN INDIA.

REPORT

TO THE KING'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR MAJESTY,—

We, the undersigned Commissioners appointed to consider the relations now existing, for financial and administrative purposes, between the Government of India and the Provincial Governments, and between the Provincial Governments and the authorities subordinate to them; and to report whether, by measures of decentralization or otherwise, those relations can be simplified and improved, and the system of government can be better adapted to meet the requirements and promote the welfare of the different Provinces, and (without impairing its strength and unity) to bring the executive power into closer touch with local conditions, humbly desire to submit to Your Majesty the following Report.

2. We assembled in India on the 18th November, 1907, and, having sketched out for the guidance of witnesses, in so far as we could do this in advance, the matters to which we thought our enquiries would probably be directed, we proceeded to take evidence in the various Provinces. Between November 1907 and April 1908 we held public sittings at one or more places in all the major Provinces, as also in the North-West Frontier Province and Baluchistan. Our public sittings occupied in all 71 days, and involved journeys aggregating 12,300 miles in India, and the examination of 307 witnesses, of whom 119 were non-officials. In each Province we obtained a statement of the views and proposals of the Local Government, and examined a large number of high officials who could speak to matters of general policy, or furnish us with information or suggestions as to the working of their departments, e.g., Secretaries to Government, Members of Council in Madras and Bombay, Members of Boards of Revenue and Financial Commissioners, and representative officers of the Medical, Sanitary, Public Works, Police, Education, and other special departments. We also examined a number of officials concerned with general district administration, from Commissioners down to tahsildars, as well as district representatives of the special departments above referred to. These witnesses included a considerable number of natives of India. We likewise examined officials and non-officials, both European and Indian, who have been specially concerned with the administration of district boards, municipalities and other local bodies, as well as other non-officials (mainly Indian) who could speak to local conditions and reforms which had fallen within their observation. The non-official witnesses were, like the official, mainly selected for us by the Local Governments from men who could give us the most useful and representative views on the subjects into which we were enquiring. Invitations were further issued to the public through the press, as well as directly by ourselves, to various persons believed to be specially interested in the scope of our enquiries, to appear before us in support of their views. We likewise obtained the evidence of the Secretaries to the Government of India in the Home, Revenue, Public Works, Finance, and Commerce Departments, and of a number of Imperial officers *who deal with matters primarily within the scope of the Local Governments.

3. We desire to express our obligations to the various Indian Governments, and to their officers, for the valuable assistance they gave us in prosecuting our enquiries and in facilitating our tour arrangements.

We are also greatly indebted to a preliminary Committee, which was appointed by the Government of India to facilitate our labours by the compilation of comprehensive memoranda describing existing administrative conditions. These memoranda have been of great service to us, and we have made free use of them in the preparation of our Report.

4. In printing the mass of evidence which we recorded, we have occasionally departed from the strict order in which it was taken, so as to bring together all the evidence relating to a single Province. The evidence from each Province, including memoranda by the Local Government, is published in a separate volume.† A volume is similarly devoted to evidence and documents obtained from the Secretaries and other officials of the Government of India.

In the Report itself we have usually thought it sufficient to confine our marginal citations to the statements of those witnesses whose evidence on a particular point appeared to be most clear and representative.

Limitations of enquiries.

5. We desire to explain, at the outset, that we have regarded the terms of our appointment as intending us to enquire primarily into the financial and administrative relations existing

(i) between the Government of India and the Provincial Governments, and

(ii) between Provincial Governments and the authorities subordinate to them.

We have, therefore, not considered, except incidentally and so far as discussion of the relations between the Government of India and the Provincial Governments compels a reference thereto, any alteration of the existing control exercised by the Secretary of State over the Indian Governments.

Similarly, we have not enquired into the relations between the Government of India and the heads of the Imperial departments which they directly administer, such as Railways, the Post Office and Telegraphs.

We hold, too, that our terms of reference precluded us from enquiring into questions of a purely political nature, questions of general policy, and questions such as the separation of judicial and executive functions, and the constitution and duties of the civil and criminal courts. We have, therefore, only touched upon such matters when, in our opinion, they have a direct bearing upon administrative decentralization. Nor, again, have we felt ourselves called upon to enquire into the general conduct of the administration, or into alleged grievances against particular departments or individual officers.

Lastly, we have not referred, except incidentally, to certain matters which have recently been made the subject

* The Sanitary Commissioner with the Government of India; the Inspector-General of Forests; the Director-General of the Indian Medical Service; the officiating Director of Criminal Intelligence; the Director of the Geological Survey; the officiating Director-General of Education; and the Comptroller and Auditor-General.

† With the exception of the North West Frontier Province and Baluchistan, which are included in the Punjab volume.

of separate investigation, as, for example, whether a Local Government might guarantee interest on the capital of local railways constructed by private enterprise.

6. While our Report was still under consideration, we were informed by Your Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for India that motives of high policy would require an early pronouncement by him, on behalf of Your Majesty's Government, on certain important reforms in the system of administration in India. Accordingly, at his request, we furnished him with the conclusions now embodied in our Report. We have not thought it necessary to point out, in each instance, the extent to which the application of our conclusions, independently arrived at, may be affected by the pronouncement of the Secretary of State. We have been content to report these conclusions to Your Majesty in their original form.

Our conclusions were arrived at prior to the Secretary of State's pronouncement on Indian policy in Nov.-Dec. 1908.

7. The Report now submitted falls under the following main heads, each of which is discussed in a separate chapter.

Heads of Report.

PART I.—Dealing mainly with the relations between the Government of India and the Provincial Governments.

PART I.

CHAPTER I.

ORGANIZATION OF THE GOVERNMENT OF INDIA AND THEIR RELATIONS WITH THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

The Secretary of State's control over Indian administration.

8. The Government of India Act of 1858, which abolished the control of the East India Company, placed the government of India directly under the Sovereign, acting through the Secretary of State for India. The Secretary of State, who was furnished by this Act with a Council, has the power of giving orders to every officer in India, including the Governor-General, and of directing all business relating to India that is transacted in the United Kingdom. Of these wide powers and duties many rest on his personal responsibility: others can be performed only in consultation with his Council, and for some of these, mainly relating to financial matters, the concurrence of a majority of the members of the Council is required.

106.

Imperial Gazetteer,*
Vol. IV.,
pp. 36-37

The Governor-General (commonly styled the Viceroy except in formal official documents), the Governors of Madras and Bombay, the Commander-in-Chief, and the Members of Council for India, Madras and Bombay are appointed by the Crown, whose approval is also necessary to the appointment of Lieutenant-Governors.

All expenditure from Indian revenues, whether in India or elsewhere, is subject to the control of the Secretary of State in Council, who is required to lay the Indian Budget annually before Parliament, with a report on the 'Home Accounts' by an independent auditor, and to submit therewith a statement showing the moral and material progress of India.

Vict., cap.
106, sec. 41.
53.

All receipts and expenditure relating to India which accrue in the United Kingdom are under the direct management of the India Office, e.g., the 'Home charges' in respect of military equipment, stores, pensions, leave allowances, etc., and the raising and application of sterling loans. By far the larger portion of Indian revenues and expenditure is, however, dealt with in India, by the Government of India and the Provincial Governments, subject to the general control of the Secretary of State.

9. Apart from specific restrictions by the Secretary of State on the spending powers of the Government of India, his sanction is required:—

S. of S.'s
Des. No. 98,
Fin. of
1908.

(i) To any reduction or increase of taxation, or other measure which would substantially affect the Indian revenues.

(ii) To any important new departure in financial policy, such as matters relating to currency operations or debt.

(iii) Generally, to any matters which raise important administrative questions, or involve considerable expenditure, or outlay of an unusual or novel character.

Ibid.

* References to the Imperial Gazetteer are throughout to the new edition recently issued.

10. As regards specific restrictions relating to certain classes of expenditure, the Secretary of State's sanction is required to :—

Specific financial restrictions imposed by the Secretary of State on the Indian Governments.

Ibid.

(i) The construction (subject to certain minor exceptions) of public works from borrowed funds.*

(ii) The construction of a public work charged to revenue which is estimated to cost more than £83,000 (Rs. 12½ lakhs) including establishment charges.†

(iii) The construction of any railway, except certain minor branch lines.*

(iv) The creation of an appointment in India of which the salary exceeds Rs. 500 a month.‡

(v) The raising of the salary of an existing appointment to an amount exceeding Rs. 750 a month.‡

(vi) The revision of an establishment at a cost of more than Rs. 50,000 a year.‡

(vii) The sanction, for a period of more than two years, of a temporary appointment or deputation involving a salary (including deputation allowance) exceeding Rs. 500 a month.‡ But in such case the amount of the deputation allowance or temporary salary rests with the Government of India, unless it be proposed to raise the emoluments of an officer, for a time, beyond Rs. 50,000 a year.

C.S.R.,
Art. 77A.

(viii) The incurring of expenditure (such for instance as that involved in the grant of pensions in excess of those admissible under the rules) for which it is provided, in any of the authorized codes, that the sanction of the Secretary of State in Council is necessary.

The chief codes which contain financial restrictions are the Civil Service Regulations, the Civil Account Code ; and portions of the Public Works and Forest Codes, and of Army Regulations.

S. of S.'s
Des. No. 98,
Fin. of 14th
Aug. 1908.

11. Further, the Government of India cannot now, without the sanction of the Secretary of State—

(i) Make good to Provincial Governments enjoying financial settlements, loss to their revenues consequent on remission of taxation ; or give them grants-in-aid for important measures of administrative reform, or any large money grant save for the purpose of maintaining financial equilibrium in the face of some special calamity such as famine or plague. Moreover, in the event of a revision of such current settlements, the Government of India could not, on their own authority, make initial grants to the Local Governments for public works or other special expenditure.

(ii) Make a loan to a Native State in excess of 5 lakhs, or incur any considerable outlay for the direct benefit of such a State.

(iii) Incur expenditure on the construction of churches, outside the amounts admissible under the Public Works Code.

* The Secretary of State's control over capital expenditure on railways is largely exercised by means of a programme submitted to him annually.

† In the case of military works the limit is £10,000 (Rs. 1,50,000).

‡ Prior to August, 1907, the Government of India's powers extended only to Rs. 250 a month under (iv) ; to Rs. 416½ a month under (v) ; to Rs. 25,000 a year under (vi) ; and to Rs. 250 a month if for a period of more than 12 months under (vii). But the Government of India's powers do not extend to the creation of any appointment habitually held by gazetted officers recruited in the United Kingdom, or to the raising of the remuneration of such an appointment.

(iv) Incur charges for—

- (a) State ceremonies, and the entertainment at the public charge of distinguished visitors, in excess of a lakh of rupees. Ibid, and Des. No. 107 Fin, of 2nd Aug. 1907,
- (b) Grant of political pensions to non-officials, in excess of Rs. 1,000 a year.
- (c) Grants to charitable and religious institutions, in excess of Rs. 10,000 a year, or Rs. 50,000 in the case of a non-recurring grant.
- (d) New measures involving any appreciable addition to military expenditure.

12. There are also certain restrictions on the powers of the Government of India and of Provincial Governments in regard to the grant of mining leases, and other concessions. Moreover, the Secretary of State's sanction would be required to any new departure of importance in Indian administration, even though this might not need his approval financially, and, as will be noticed presently, he has a large control over Indian legislation.

13. It is a primary duty of the Accounts officers to bring to notice any case in which the Government of India appear to have sanctioned expenditure which, by rule, requires the Secretary of State's approval; and if such officers maintain their objections after consideration of any explanation or argument which may be put to them, the matter must be referred to the Secretary of State.

14. Within the above limits, the Government of India, and Provincial Governments acting under their supervision, have very considerable powers of expenditure for the ordinary purposes of administration and the development of the country.

Significance of the restrictions imposed by the Secretary of State.

15. These financial restrictions imposed by the Secretary of State upon the Government of India involve submission to him of a great number of matters which, though not primarily of a financial nature, necessitate additional outlay, or changes in the distribution of expenditure. We have set them forth in some detail because they have an important bearing on the measure of liberty which it is possible to assign to Provincial Governments.

Control of Parliament over Indian affairs.

16. The Secretary of State is, in his turn, responsible to Parliament. Parliamentary legislation has, at one time or another, created the Government of India, authorized the establishment of the large Provinces ruled by Lieutenant-Governors, and brought the Presidency Governments of Madras and Bombay into subordination to the Central Government. From Parliament, too, are derived the constitution and functions of the Indian and Provincial Legislatures, the High Courts, and the method of recruitment of the Indian Civil Service, and any material change in these would, as a consequence, involve Parliamentary sanction.

Imperial Gazetteer, Vol IV., p. 40.

In the ordinary course, however, Parliamentary legislation for India is confined to Acts amending the political constitution, or empowering the Secretary of State to raise money by loan; nor does Parliament directly control the revenues of India, unless these should be applied to military operations beyond the frontier. But the Indian Budget has to be laid before Parliament annually; the Secretary of State, and the Cabinet of which he is a member, are open to criticism, and if occasion should arise, to censure, in either House of Parliament; while every member of either House has the right of interpellation on any matter relating to the administration of India.

Imperial Gazeteer,
Vol. IV.,
chap. V.

17. India possesses an Imperial Legislative Council, but its functions are strictly limited. It may not interfere with Acts of Parliament, and Acts passed by it may be disallowed by the Sovereign, acting through the Secretary of State. Measures relating to the public revenue or debt, to military or naval matters, to foreign relations, or to religion, may not be introduced into this Council without the Governor-General's sanction; nor can any Bill of importance be put before it by the Government of India without previous reference to the Secretary of State. The Legislative Council at present includes—

The Imperial Legislative Council.

(i) The members of the executive Government of India, who sit there ex officio.

(ii) Other officials, who are mostly selected as representatives of the principal Provinces.

(iii) Non-official gentlemen elected by the non-official members of Provincial Legislatures, and by the Calcutta Chamber of Commerce.

(iv) Other non-officials who are directly nominated by the Viceroy.

Including the ex officio members, the official element is always in the majority. The Legislative Council may discuss the Indian Budget, but cannot divide upon it; and its members possess the right of interpellation on matters of public policy, provided the questions are not considered inadmissible by the Governor-General as President. Their main functions, however, are the initiation and discussion of legislative measures, subject to the restrictions already referred to.*

18. The executive Government of India, as at present constituted, consists of the Viceroy and Governor-General, who holds direct charge of the Foreign portfolio; of the Commander-in-Chief in India, who has also charge of the Army Department; and of six ordinary members of Council, amongst whom are distributed the charge of the Home, Finance, Revenue and Agriculture, Public Works, Commerce and Industry, Military Supply, and Legislative Departments. The members of the Government are all appointed by the Crown, on the advice of the Secretary of State, and while some of the ordinary members are drawn from the Indian Services, others are appointed direct from Home. The usual tenure of office of a member of the Government of India is five years.

The Executive Council of the Governor-General.

24 & 25
67.

The distribution of work among the various Departments, and the procedure regulating their relations to one another, are laid down in 'Rules of Business,' which are issued by the Governor-General (under the Indian Councils Act of 1861), and are supplemented by subsidiary regulations termed 'Secretariat Instructions.' Any important alteration in the 'Rules of Business' would, in practice, require the concurrence of the Secretary of State.

Vol. X.,
App. 1e.,
p. 199,
45374.

19. In regard to his own Department, each member of Council is largely in the position of a Minister of State, and has the final voice in ordinary departmental matters.

S. of S.'s
Des. No.
123, Pub. of

* It is now proposed, however, subject to certain restrictions, to give the Legislative Council the power of passing resolutions on matters of public policy, and of discussing the budget in detail and passing resolutions thereon. Such resolutions, however, are to be mere recommendations to the Government of India, who may accept them or not at their discretion.

But any question of special importance, and any matter in which it is proposed to over-rule the views of a Local Government, must ordinarily be referred to the Viceroy.* This latter provision acts as a safeguard against undue interference with the Local Governments, but it necessarily throws a large amount of work on the Viceroy. In the year 1907-08, no less than 21·7 per cent. of the cases which arose in, or came up to, the Home Department, required submission to the Viceroy. The Home Department is, however, concerned with questions which are, in a special degree, subject to review by the Head of the Government, and we believe that in other Departments the percentage of cases referred to the Viceroy is considerably less. Any matter originating in one Department which also affects another must be referred to the latter, and in the event of the Departments not being able to agree, the case would have to be referred to the Viceroy.

The members of Council meet periodically as a Cabinet—ordinarily once a week—to discuss questions which the Viceroy desires to be put before them, or which a member, who has been overruled by the Viceroy, has asked to be referred to Council. The Secretary in the Department primarily concerned with a Council case attends the Council meeting for the purpose of furnishing any information which may be required of him. If there is a difference of opinion in the Council the decision of the majority ordinarily prevails, but the Viceroy can overrule a majority if he considers that the matter is of such grave importance as to justify such a step.

20. Each Departmental office is in the subordinate charge of a Secretary, whose position corresponds very much to that of a permanent Under-Secretary of State in the United Kingdom, but with these differences, that the Secretary, as above stated, is present at Council meetings; that he attends on the Viceroy, usually once a week, and discusses with him all matters of importance arising in his Department; that he has the right of bringing to the Viceroy's special notice any case in which he considers that His Excellency's concurrence should be obtained to action proposed by the Departmental member of Council; and that his tenure of office is usually limited to three years.

21. The Secretaries have under them Deputy, Under, and Assistant Secretaries, together with the ordinary clerical establishments. Taking the Departments with which we are concerned, that is to say the Home, Revenue and Agriculture, Finance, Commerce and Industry, and Civil Public Works Secretariats, the Secretaries, Deputy Secretaries, and Under Secretaries, in all but the last, are members of the Indian Civil Service. The Assistant Secretaries, where these exist, and the subordinate staff, are men permanently connected with the department.

The Government of India, it may be explained, have no Indian Civil Service of their own, as distinct from that of the Provincial Governments. The Indian Civil Service is recruited for, and distributed among, the latter, and officers serving under the Government of India are borrowed from the Provinces for longer or shorter periods. The ordinary tenure of office of a Government of India Secretariat officer, drawn from the Indian Civil Service, is three years, after which time he would generally revert to his own Province. An Under Secretary might, however, return later on as a Deputy Secretary, and a Deputy Secretary as a Secretary. This constant flux and reflux of officers between the Government of India and the Local Governments, mans the superior posts in the Government of India Secretariats with men conversant with conditions in the Provinces.

* "In cases where the Government of India, while differing from a Local Government, express their view in the form, not of a command but of a suggestion, it is unnecessary, merely on this account, to submit the case to the Viceroy for orders at this stage. Similarly, where the proposals of a Local Government contravene standing orders or accepted principles, and the reply of the Government of India merely refers to such orders (as in cases where the Local Government may wish to anticipate the sanction of the Secretary of State or to give retrospective effect to some financial sanction) it is not necessary, merely on this account, to take the Viceroy's instructions."

The men selected for Secretariat appointments under the Government of India have often served in similar capacities in the Secretariats of their own Governments, but they may equally be drawn direct from administrative posts. There is a tendency, if a man has done well in Secretariat work as a junior, to recall him, later on, to higher functions ; and an officer who has obtained experience as an Under or Deputy Secretary in the Government of India, may, after leaving such an appointment, be nominated to a Secretaryship in his own Province.

22. A case coming up to a Government of India Secretariat is first of all noted on by the clerical branch of the office. It then goes, usually, to an Assistant or Under Secretary, who, if he accepts the office note, signs his name below it. If he disagrees or desires to add anything, he notes accordingly. His work, in turn, goes to a Deputy Secretary or to the Secretary, who acts in the same way. A Deputy Secretary often submits cases direct to the Member in charge, but the papers come back through the Secretary, to enable the latter to see what is going on. Secretaries and their principal subordinates may dispose of petty cases of a routine character on their own responsibility, but lists of such cases go weekly to the Secretary and Member, so that any independent action by a subordinate which is deemed inadvisable may be checked. Otherwise, cases go on to the Member in charge, and if reference to the Viceroy or to some other Department is not required, his order is final. This elaborate system of noting, which differs materially from that in vogue in British Government offices, is held to be justified by the constant changes in the superior personnel of the Secretariats and Departments in India.

In important cases the notes are printed, for future reference, along with the papers to which they relate, but these are only for confidential use in the Secretariats themselves. The Government of India, however, submit monthly volumes of their printed proceedings (without the notes) to the Secretary of State, and receive similar volumes from the Local Governments, copies of which also go on to the India Office.

23. We have now briefly described the machinery of the Central Government, and before considering the organization and powers of the Provincial Administrations we propose to make a few general observations on the functions of Government in India. These are, in many respects, much wider than in the United Kingdom. The Government claims a share in the produce of the land ; and save where (as in Bengal) it has commuted this into a fixed land tax, it exercises the right of periodical re-assessment of the cash value of its share. In connexion with its revenue assessments, it has instituted a detailed cadastral survey, and a record of rights in the land. Where its assessments are made upon large landholders, it intervenes to prevent their levying excessive rents from their tenants; and in the Central Provinces it even takes an active share in the original assessment of landlords' rents. In the Punjab, and some other tracts, it has restricted the alienation of land by agriculturists to non-agriculturists. It undertakes the management of landed estates when the proprietor is disqualified from attending to them by age, sex, or infirmity, or, occasionally, by pecuniary embarrassment. In times of famine it undertakes relief works and other remedial measures upon an extensive scale. It manages a vast forest property, and is a large manufacturer of salt and opium. It owns the bulk of the railways of the country, and directly manages a considerable portion of them; and it has constructed, and maintains, most of the important irrigation works. It owns and manages the postal and telegraph systems. It has the monopoly of note issue, and it alone can set the mints in motion. It acts, for the most part, as its own banker, and it occasionally makes temporary loans to Presidency banks in times of financial stringency. With the co-operation of the Secretary of State it regulates the discharge of the balance of trade, as between India and the outside world, through the action of the India Council's drawings. It lends money to municipalities, rural boards and agriculturists, and occasionally to the owners of historic estates. It exercises a strict control over the sale of liquor and intoxicating drugs, not merely by the prevention of unlicensed sale, but by granting licenses for short periods only, and subject to special fees which are usually determined by auction. In India, moreover, the direct responsibilities of Government in respect to police, education, medical and sanitary operations, and ordinary public works, are of a much wider scope than in the United Kingdom. The Government has further very intimate relations with the numerous Native States which collectively cover more than one-third of the whole area of India, and comprise more than one-fifth of its population. Apart from the special functions narrated above, the government of a sub-continent containing nearly 1,800,000 square miles and 300,000,000 people is in itself an extremely heavy burden, and one which is constantly increasing with the economic development of the country and the growing needs of populations of diverse nationality, language and creed.

The extent to which these functions and burdens are distributed between the Central and the Provincial Governments in India will be explained in the next chapter.

CHAPTER II.

ORGANIZATION OF THE PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS AND THEIR GENERAL RELATIONS WITH THE GOVERNMENT OF INDIA.

24. British India is divided into 8 major and 5 minor Provinces, each of which is administered, in subordination to the Government of India, by its own Local Government or Administration.

Of the minor Provinces, two—Coorg and Ajmer—are hardly more than districts, and are respectively administered by the Resident in Mysore and by the Agent to the Governor-General in Rajputana; while a third—the Andamans—is practically a penal settlement. We have left these three administrations out of the scope of our enquiries. The Chief Commissioners of the other two, the North-West Frontier Province and Baluchistan, are graded as 1st class Residents of the Political Department, and are also Agents to the Governor-General in respect of political matters. These administrations are more under the control of the Government of India, especially in the Foreign Department, than the major Provinces, and lack the financial resources and powers which the latter possess.

The minor
Provinces.

25. The 8 major Provinces, with some material statistics relating thereto, are shown in the following statement:—

26. Madras and Bombay are known as Presidencies, having been governed, in the early days of the Company's rule, by Presidents in Council, and they were originally independent of the Presidency of Bengal, out of which the Government of India has grown. They were first placed under the control of the Governor-General by the Regulating Act of 1773, which called that authority into existence; and this control, which was extended by statute in 1784 and 1793, was rendered absolute by the Charter Act of 1833, and the instructions issued by the Court of Directors thereon. Since then, the general tendency has been to treat Madras and Bombay in the same way as the other large Provinces subsequently created; but they still retain the following vestiges of their separate origin and former independence:—

Madras and Bombay.

(i) They are under a Council Government, consisting of a Governor, usually appointed from home, with two Civilian colleagues, who are nominated by the Crown on the advice of the Secretary of State. The ordinary business of Government is distributed between the members of these Councils in much the same way as in the larger Council of the Governor-General, but the distinction of portfolios is not so definite. The Governor can, like the Viceroy, overrule his colleagues in cases of emergency: otherwise decisions of the Governor in Council are by a majority.

(ii) The Presidency Governments have the right of direct correspondence with the Secretary of State, except in matters which raise financial issues, and can appeal to him against orders of the Government of India; but such an appeal must go through, or be communicated to, that Government.

(iii) They have full discretion in the selection for certain important posts, which in other Provinces rests finally with the Government of India, e.g., nominations to the Board of Revenue* and to the Provincial Legislative Councils, and the appointment of Chief and Superintending Engineers in the Public Works Department, and Conservators of Forests.

Imperial
Gazetteer,

(iv) They have, in practice, a free hand in the details of their district land-revenue settlements, which in other Provinces are subject to control by the Government of India.† Similarly, they are less supervised in forest administration.

Other major Provinces.

27. The remaining major Provinces have been constituted, at various times, out of the old Presidency of Bengal, or from other territories which were formerly under the direct administration of the Governor-General in Council, or have subsequently been included in British India. In Bengal, Eastern Bengal and Assam, the United Provinces, the Punjab, and Burma the responsibilities of Government are vested in a single Lieutenant-Governor, who is, in practice, a member of the Indian Civil Service, and is appointed by the Viceroy subject to the approval of the Crown. Lieutenant-Governors, like the Governors and members of Council in the Presidencies, hold office for a term of five years.

The Central Provinces, which for administrative purposes include Berar, now permanently leased from His Highness the Nizam of Hyderabad, are administered by a Chief Commissioner, who is appointed by the Viceroy. He has, in most respects, the same powers as a Lieutenant-Governor, the special restrictions imposed upon him being mainly in the matter of patronage.

Vol. VI.,
App. I.,
p. 130.

Provincial Legislative Councils.

28. All the major Provinces, with the exception of the Central Provinces, possess local Legislative Councils which can pass Acts concerning the Province itself; but, except in cases of extreme urgency, no legislation can be introduced into these Councils by the Local Government without having been examined by the Government of India, and their Acts require the confirmation of the Governor-General. Such legislation is also subject to control by the Secretary of State similar to that which he exercises in the case of the Imperial Legislative Council.

Imperial
Gazetteer,
Vol. IV.,
pp. 135-6.

* In Madras: there is no Board in Bombay.

† A revenue settlement is a periodical reassessment, outside tracts in which the land revenue has been permanently fixed (as in Bengal), of the share taken by Government in the net produce of the soil.

The Legislative Councils of Madras, Bombay, Bengal, Eastern Bengal and the United Provinces, while containing a certain number of nominated officials and non-officials, also include an elective non-official element, representing district boards, municipalities, universities, landed and commercial interests and the like. These Councils may discuss the Provincial Budget after it has been sanctioned by the Government of India, but may not divide on it. They also possess a right of interpellation similar to that accorded to the members of the Legislative Council of India, but limited to matters of Provincial policy and administration.

The Legislative Councils of Burma and the Punjab, though containing some non-official members, are as yet entirely nominated, and have not the right of Budget discussion or interpellation.*

29. In all the major Provinces the work of Government is distributed among different Departments, dealing with the principal heads of internal administration, such as Revenue, Judicial and Police, Local and Municipal, Financial, Public Works (Irrigation and General) and Education. The Chief Engineers in the Public Works Department are also Secretaries or Joint Secretaries to the Local Government, while matters relating to the other Departments are dealt with by Secretaries and Under Secretaries drawn from the Indian Civil Service.† There are three Civilian Secretaries in each Province (two in the Punjab), and the distribution of the various Departments between these varies according to local circumstances, and may change at different times in the same Province. The senior Civilian Secretary is termed the Chief Secretary, and the other Secretaries usually draw their designation from one of the principal Departments with which they are concerned. The organization of the Secretariats in the Provinces is on much the same lines as in the Government of India, and cases are noted on and recorded in a similar way.

The Provincial Secretariats.

30. A distinction, formerly material but now of little practical force, still obtains as between Regulation and Non-Regulation Provinces. The Regulation Provinces are Madras, Bombay proper, Bengal, Eastern Bengal, and Agra (United Provinces). The Non-Regulation Provinces are the Punjab, Burma, and the Central Provinces; and the sub-provinces of Oudh (United Provinces), Assam (Eastern Bengal and Assam), and Sind (Bombay). The latter were ruled, at the outset, by simpler codes, and with a greater centralization of functions in the hands of the district officers, who were recruited not merely from the Covenanted (now Indian) Civil Service, but also from the Army and other sources. Now, however, the Regulation and Non-Regulation Provinces are administered, generally speaking, on the same lines; and the main distinctions still surviving are that, in the latter, the district officers are termed Deputy, and Assistant or Extra Assistant, Commissioners, instead of Collectors and Assistant or Deputy Collectors; that the principal court of criminal and civil jurisdiction is there (except in Assam) a Chief Court or a Judicial Commissioner, and not a Chartered High Court; and that a number of military officers are still employed in the civil administration of Burma, Assam, and the Punjab. But, except in Burma, recruitment for posts held by such officers will hereafter be confined to the Indian Civil Service.

* It is now proposed to give all Provincial Legislative Councils power, subject to certain restrictions, to pass resolutions on questions of public policy, and to discuss the Provincial Budgets in detail and pass resolutions in respect thereto, but it will be for the Provincial Government to accept or reject such resolutions at its discretion.

Districts, and
Collectors.

31. The principal unit of administration is everywhere the district. British India contains more than 250 districts, and the number at present existing in each of the major Provinces has been shown in the statement in paragraph 25. The average area of a district is 4,430 square miles, or about three-fourths of the size of Yorkshire, and the average population 931,000, but the actual districts vary greatly in size and population. They are largest, in point of area, in Burma and Madras, and smallest in the United Provinces.

Imperial
Gazetteer,
Vol. IV.,
p. 48.

Each district is under a Collector (styled Deputy-Commissioner in the Non-Regulation Provinces) who is the local representative of Government in its general dealings with the people, and is also the District Magistrate. As Collector, he is not merely responsible for the collection of most branches of the revenue, but is concerned with the manifold relations existing between Government and the agricultural classes, which represent two-thirds of the total population of British India. Thus he is concerned with questions relating to the registration, alteration, relinquishment or partition of land-holdings which pay revenue direct to Government, and, in the greater part of India, has to deal in these respects with an immense number of petty peasant proprietors. He is likewise, in most Provinces, concerned with the adjudication of disputes between landlords and tenants, and also with the administration of estates taken under the management of the Courts of Wards.* He has to keep a careful watch over the general circumstances of his district, and, in times of famine or severe agricultural distress, he is responsible for the administration of relief and other remedial measures. He also deals with the grant of loans to agriculturists, and with the preparation of agricultural and other statistics; and he has a general control over the working of the Forest Department in his district, in so far as this touches on matters affecting the economic or other interests of the people.

It is his duty to guide and control the working of municipalities, and he is often the actual chairman or presiding officer of one or more of these. He usually, also, presides over the district board, which, with the aid of subordinate local boards where such exist, maintains roads, schools and dispensaries, and deals with vaccination and sanitary improvements, in rural areas. Finally, he has to furnish information on all important occurrences in the district, and he is called upon to advise on any general schemes affecting it which may be under consideration.

As District Magistrate, he is responsible for all matters affecting the peace of the district, and exercises a general supervision over the local police officers, while he controls the working of subordinate criminal courts, and has himself a certain amount of original and appellate magisterial work.*

* In Bombay and the Central Provinces, Commissioners of divisions are Courts of Wards in their respective jurisdictions. In the other major Provinces, except Burma, where there is as yet no Court of Wards, the Court is the Board of Revenue or Financial Commissioner of the Province.

Imperial
Gazetteer,
Vol. IV.,
p. 53.

32. Each district is usually split up into a number of sub-divisions, which are in charge either of junior officers of the Indian Civil Service, or of officers of the 'Provincial' service (Deputy Collectors or Extra Assistant Commissioners.)† The functions of these Sub-divisional officers, who are all magistrates as well as revenue and executive functionaries, vary in different Provinces. They are most developed in Madras and Bombay, where the Sub-divisional officer exercises, within his own charge, most of the functions of a Collector, subject to supervision by, and appeal to, the latter.

Officers.

33. Save in Bengal and Eastern Bengal, there are smaller sub-district units, styled taluks or tahsils, administered by tahsildars who belong to the 'Subordinate' service.‡ These officials are, in general, under the immediate control of the Sub-divisional officer, where there is one, and they and their assistants (deputy or naib tahsildars, revenue inspectors, kanungos, etc.) are in direct relations with the cultivators and the village officials.

Tahsildars, etc.

34. The Civil Service of the country, which deals with revenue and general administration, is divided into :—

The 'Imperial,'
'Provincial'
and 'Subordinate' Civil Services.

(i) The 'Indian Civil Service,' recruited in England by competitive examination, at which natives of India, like other subjects of Your Majesty, can compete; and

(ii) The 'Provincial' and 'Subordinate' Civil Services, recruited in India, and, as a rule, only open to persons who are natives of that country or domiciled therein.

Members of the Indian Civil Service hold most of the Commissionerships, Collectorates and Deputy Commissionerships, and District Judgeships, as well as Secretariat and other headquarters administrative appointments; while its junior men are in training for higher functions, generally as Assistants to the Collectors. The Indian Civil Service forms a single service for the whole of India; but its members, on first arrival in the country, are distributed to the different Provinces; and though an Indian Civilian may be borrowed by the Government of India for work in connexion with the Supreme Government, or for temporary service in another Province, he is not, as a rule, transferred from one Province to another.

35. Each Province has its own separate 'Provincial' and 'Subordinate' services, but while it has a free hand in recruiting for the latter, appointments to the former are regulated by rules which have to receive the approval of the Government of India. 'Provincial' Civil Servants, in their capacity as Deputy or Extra Assistant Commissioners and Sub-Judges, discharge responsible executive and judicial functions, and are also eligible for a certain number of posts, such as those of Collector or District

* Steps are now being taken, in Bengal and Eastern Bengal, towards the dissociation of Collectors and other executive officers from criminal case duties.

† In Bengal and Eastern Bengal the headquarters sub-division of the district is in the direct charge of the Collector, and in the Punjab there are but few sub-divisions.

Judge, ordinarily held by Indian Civilians. The number of posts of the latter description tenable by 'Provincial' officers is fixed for each Province by the Government of India. H. D. Res.
of 21st
April,
1892.

There are similar distinctions in regard to special departments the higher officials of which are usually recruited from England, e.g., Police, Forests, Education, and Public Works. The British element is here styled the 'Imperial' Service, while the 'Provincial' and 'Subordinate' services are locally recruited in India.

It must, however, be borne in mind that the terms 'Imperial' and 'Provincial,' as applied to these services, refer to the personal status of the officer as decided by the method of his recruitment, and not to the Government under which he serves.* The majority of so-called 'Imperial' officers are, as a matter of fact, working under the Provincial Governments.

Divisional
Commissioners.

36. In all the major Provinces except Madras, the districts are grouped into divisions, each of which, consisting usually of from four to six districts, is under the general superintendence of a Commissioner, who also acts as a court of appeal in revenue cases.

Boards of Revenue and Financial
Commissioners.

37. In Bombay there is no intermediate authority between Commissioners and the Local Government, and the same condition has hitherto applied in the Central Provinces, but here the appointment of a Financial Commissioner has recently been sanctioned. In other Provinces there is such an intermediate authority, viz., a Board of Revenue (or a single Financial Commissioner, as in the Punjab and Burma)—which, in subordination to the Local Government, controls the work of Commissioners and Collectors, and the general administration of the Province in revenue matters.

Special Departments.

38. Originally Collectors and their subordinates were responsible for almost all the administrative work of their districts, subject to the superintendence of Commissioners and Boards of Revenue. During the last 50 years, however, separate administrative departments have been gradually evolved, the most important of which are those dealing with Public Works, Education, Police, Forests, Medical administration, Sanitation, and Prisons. These departments have their own separate staffs and heads in each Province, viz. :—

Chief Engineers for (a) Irrigation, and (b) ordinary Public Works ;

The Director of Public Instruction ;

The Inspector-General of Police ;

Conservator, or a Chief Conservator, of Forests ;

The Inspector-General of Civil Hospitals (Surgeon-General in Madras and Bombay) ;

The Sanitary Commissioner† ; and

The Inspector-General of Prisons.‡

* Hereafter, when we have occasion to refer to 'Imperial' and 'Provincial' officers or services in the sense explained in this paragraph, we shall, to avoid ambiguity, place these terms in inverted commas.

† Outside Bombay, the Sanitary Commissioner works largely through the agency of the district medical officers, who, for medical work, are subordinate to the head of the Medical Department. Imperial Gazetteer,
Vol. IV.,
p. 467.

‡ There are also Inspectors-General of Registration ; but, in most Provinces this function is combined with the management of some other department.

When there is extensive famine in a Province, an officer, drawn from the Indian Civil Service, may be appointed to act as a Special Famine Commissioner, under the Local Government.

The Inspector-General of Police is often an Indian Civilian, but otherwise the head of each department is usually drawn, either locally or by transfer from another Province, from the departmental service. These departmental heads are in direct subordination to the Local Government.* As already stated, the Chief Engineers for Public Works are also Secretaries to Government; the other heads of departments address their reports and letters to one or other of the Civilian Secretaries.†

39. As regard the district staffs of these departments, the Collector and District Magistrate, as already noted, has a general outside control, in non-technical matters, over the work of the local Police and Forest officers; he is responsible for the minor jails; and, principally in his capacity as president of the district board (and in some Provinces also of municipal councils), he is largely concerned with questions of sanitation, medical relief and elementary education. He has much less concern with the operations of the Public Works Department, and with those branches of education which are under the direct control of the Department of Public Instruction; and the principal local officers of these two departments (Superintending and Executive Engineers and Inspectors of Schools) have charges which do not necessarily correspond with district or divisional limits.

40. There are other heads of departments who are members of the Indian Civil Service, and who work in closer connexion with the ordinary district staff, through whose agency a great deal of the work which they have to supervise is discharged. The chief of these are the Commissioner of Excise, the Director of Agriculture, the Director of Land Records and, in some Provinces, the Commissioner for Revenue Settlements. These officers are under the Board of Revenue or Financial Commissioner, where either exists.‡

41. The minor Administrations of Baluchistan and the North-West Frontier Province are less fully organized. There are no Divisional Commissioners, and the departments under the control of separate officials are less in number. The Frontier Province possesses a Revenue and a Judicial Commissioner, while in Baluchistan these functions are combined in the hands of a single officer. The Secretariats are likewise smaller, and less sub-divided, than in the major Provinces.

Organization in Baluchistan and the North-West Frontier Province.

42. The present distribution of functions between the Government of India, also styled the Central or Supreme Government, and the Provincial or Local Governments and Administrations§ is, stated generally, as follows:—Amongst Distribution of functions between the Government of India and Provincial Governments, and control by the former over the latter.

* Except, as regards forests, in Madras and Bombay, where Conservators of Forests are under the Board of Revenue in the former Province and under the Revenue Commissioners in the latter.

† In the Punjab the Director of Public Instruction is also ex-officio Under-Secretary for Education, and appears in that capacity to submit cases direct to the Lieutenant-Governor, while the Inspector-General of Police is also an ex-officio Under-Secretary to Government, but subordinate in that rôle to the Judicial Secretary.

‡ In Madras the functions of the Excise Commissioner and the Settlement Commissioner are directly exercised by members of the Board of Revenue; and in Bombay the Commissioner of Excise is of the same status as the territorial Commissioners.

§ Technically a Province ruled by a Governor in Council or a Lieutenant Governor is a Local Government, and one ruled by a Chief Commissioner a Local Administration, but we shall use the terms "Local Government" and "Provincial Government" as including the Governments of all the Provinces.

the important matters which the former retain in their own hands are those relating to foreign affairs, the defences of the country, general taxation, currency, debt, tariffs, posts and telegraphs, railways, and accounts and auditing. Ordinary internal administration, police, civil and criminal justice, prisons, the assessment and collection of the revenues, education, medical and sanitary arrangements, irrigation, buildings and roads, forests, and the control over municipal and rural boards fall to the share of the Provincial Governments. But even in these matters the Government of India exercise a general and constant control. They lay down lines of general policy, and test their application from the administration reports and returns relating to the main departments under the Local Governments.* They also employ expert officers to inspect and advise upon a number of departments which are primarily administered by the Local Governments, including Agriculture, Irrigation, Forests, Medical, Sanitation, Education, Excise and Salt, Printing and Stationery, and Archæology. These officers are commonly known as Imperial Inspectors-General.

Imperial
Gazetteer,
Vol. IV.
pp. 16-17,

43. The control of the Government of India is, moreover, not confined to the prescription of policy and to action taken upon reports and inspections. It assumes more specific forms. They scrutinize, and, when necessary, modify the annual budgets of the Local Governments. Every newly-created appointment of importance, every large addition even to minor establishments, every material alteration in service grades, has to receive their specific approval, and, in many cases, reference to the Secretary of State is likewise necessary. The practical result is that no new departure in Provincial administration can be undertaken without their preliminary sanction or, in important matters, without that of the Secretary of State also. Moreover, the general conditions of Government service, such as leave, pension and travelling allowance rules, and the Public Works and Forest Codes, are all strictly prescribed by the Central Government, either suo motu or on instruction from the Secretary of State. Lastly, there is a wide field of appeal to the Government of India, as also to the Secretary of State, from persons who may deem themselves aggrieved by the action of a Local Government. Ibid.

Instructions of the Court of Directors in 1834 and 1838 as
of this control.

44. The essential point to be borne in mind is thus that at present, even in matters primarily assigned to the Provincial Governments, these act as the agents of the Government of India, who exercise a very full and constant check over their proceedings. The general principles which should govern the relations between the Government of India and the subordinate Provincial Governments were laid down in 1834, in a letter addressed by the Court of Directors to the Government of India on the subject of the Charter Act of 1833, the essential portions of which we subjoin, as well as an extract from a later despatch of 1838. We are informed by the Home Secretary to the Government of India that 45389. these pronouncements may be taken as an authoritative statement of the principles applied to-day.

* As already stated, the Local Governments also submit copies of all their printed proceedings to the Government of India. Para. 22.

Extract from despatch (accompanying the Government of India Act, 1833) from the Court of Directors to the Government of India, No. 44, dated the 10th December, 1834.

76. We have now completed all that we deem it necessary to say at present regarding the legislation to be exercised, and the laws to be made, in India. We will proceed to consider the new relation in which you will be placed with reference to the subordinate Governments, not by means of your legislative supremacy, but in other respects.

77. The words of the 39th clause are very comprehensive: 'The superintendence, direction, and control of the whole civil and military government of all the said territories and revenues in India shall be vested in the said Governor-General in Council.'

78. The powers here conveyed, when the words are interpreted in all their latitude, include the whole powers of Government. And it is of infinite importance that you should well consider and understand the extent of the responsibility thus imposed upon you. The whole civil and military Government of India is in your hands, and for what is good or evil in the administration of it, the honour or dishonour will redound upon you.

79. With respect to the exercise of your legislative powers in the several Presidencies, what we have adduced of a general nature on that subject will, for the present, suffice.

80. With respect to the other powers which you are called upon to exercise, it will be incumbent upon you to draw, with much discrimination and reflection, the correct line between the functions which properly belong to a local and subordinate Government and those which belong to the general Government ruling over and superintending the whole.*

81. When this line is improperly drawn, the consequence is either that the general Government interferes with the province of the local Government, and enters into details which it cannot manage, and which preclude its consideration of more important objects; or that it withdraws its attention from the evidence of many things which may be right or wrong in the general course of the local administration, and thus partially deprives the State of the benefit of its superintendence and control.

82. It is true that the former Acts of Parliament, which made the local Government of Bengal a supreme Government, gave the Governor-General in Council a control and superintendence over the other Presidencies as complete and paramount as it was possible for language to convey, and this we must assume to have been the intention of the Legislature. In practice, however, the Supreme Government made little exercise of its superintending authority, and the result has been that even that little exercise of it has been generally made when it was too late to be made with real effect, namely, after the subordinate Government had taken its course; thus losing the character of control and responsibility, and retaining only that of ex post facto intervention—a sort of intervention always invidious, and in most cases nothing but invidious, because what was already done, however open to censure, was beyond the reach of recall or correction.

83. It is evidently the object of the present Act to carry into effect that intention of the Legislature to which we have alluded. Invested as you are with all the powers of Government over all parts of India, and responsible for good government in them all, you are to consider to what extent, and in what particulars, the powers of Government can be best exercised by the local authorities, and to what extent, and in what particulars, they are likely to be best exercised when retained in your own hands. With respect to that portion of the business of Government which you fully confide to the local authorities, and with which a minute interference on your part would not be beneficial, it will be your duty to have always before you evidence sufficient to enable you to judge if the course of things in general is good, and to pay such vigilant attention to that evidence as will ensure your prompt interposition whenever anything occurs which demands it.

84. In general it is to be recollected that in all cases where there are gradations of authority the right working of the system must very much depend on the wisdom and moderation of the supreme authority and also of the subordinate authorities. This is especially true of a system so peculiar as that of our Indian Empire. It was impossible for the Legislature, and it is equally so for us in our instructions, to define the exact limits between a just control and a petty, vexatious, meddling interference. We rely on the practical good sense of our Governor-General in Council, and of our other Governors, for carrying the law into effect in a manner consonant with its spirit, and we see no reason to doubt the possibility of preserving to every subordinate Government its due rank and power, without impairing or neutralizing that of the highest.

85. The subordinate Governments will correspond directly with us as formerly, but we think that you should immediately receive copies of all their more important letters to us, both as part of the evidence of their proceedings which you should have before you, and that we may have the benefit of the observations which you may have to make, and which we desire that you will always despatch to us with the smallest possible delay.

86. It will be for you to determine what part of their records, or what other documents, it will be necessary for you regularly to receive as evidence of the general proceedings of the subordinate Governments, and as an index to the other documents which you will have occasion to call for when anything occurs which you desire to investigate.

Extract from despatch from the Court of Directors to the Government of India, No. 3, dated the 28th March, 1838.

By the 65th clause of the Act 3 and 4 Wm. IV., Cap. 85, the Governor-General in Council is invested with full power to superintend and control the subordinate Governments in all points relating to the Civil and Military Administration of their respective Presidencies, and those Governments are required to obey the orders and instructions of the Governor-General in Council in all cases whatsoever, and, in order to enable you to exercise with effect the control and superintendence thus devolved on you, the subordinate Governments are required by the 68th section to transmit regularly to the Governor-General in Council true and exact copies of all the Orders and Acts of their respective Governments, and to give intelligence of all transactions which they may deem material to be communicated, or as the Governor-General in Council shall from time to time require. Although a minute interference on your part in the details of the local Administration of the subordinate Presidencies is neither desirable nor practicable, yet we should hold you but ill acquitted towards those whose interests are committed to your charge, if you should allow to pass without comment and, if necessary, without effective interference, any measures having, in your opinion, an injurious tendency either to one Presidency or to the Empire at large.

45. It is thus laid down that the Government of India are responsible for everything done in the Provinces, but it would seem from paragraphs 80 and 83 of the despatch of December 1834, that they were intended to discriminate between matters which would be primarily within the scope of the Local Governments, where their interference would be of a very exceptional character, and matters in regard to which their control would be more detailed and constant. No definite steps towards the immediate attainment of this object appear, however, to have been taken, and the present discrimination between the functions of the Imperial and the Local Governments, and the extent of the control normally exercised by the former over the latter, are the results of gradual administrative evolution.

Political and military exigencies, and the growth of services generally recognized as suitable for direct management by a Central Government, have given the Government of India a number of functions exercised independently of the Provincial Governments. As regards the departments which have been recognized as lying primarily within the scope of the Local Governments, the control exercised by the Government of India has differed at various periods.

The present situation as regards the control exercised by the Government of India.

Speaking generally, it may be said that although the powers of the Madras and Bombay Governments, the only subordinate administrations then existing, were materially reduced in 1833, those of all the present major Provinces, including the two Presidency Governments, are decidedly larger than were the prerogatives of any Local Government fifty years ago, when the Crown took over the government of India. For example, no Province then had any separate powers of legislation, any separate financial resources, or, practically, any power of creating or modifying any appointment in the public service; and the references to the Government of India which this last restriction involved gave that Government the opportunity of interference with all the details of Provincial administration.

46. The difficulty of defining the exact limits between a "just control, and petty, vexatious, meddling interference," recognized by the Court of Directors in 1834, still remains. It is easy to say that the Central Government should confine itself to laying down general principles, and that the detailed application of these should be left in the hands of the Subordinate Governments; but in practice it is sometimes extremely difficult to say what are mere details, and whether these may not affect the application of a principle. Again, what is normally a detail, properly left to a Local Government, may, at a period of political stress or under altered circumstances, become a matter in which the Government of India, and even the Secretary of State, must assert their responsibilities. It is, therefore, of paramount importance that the relations between the Government of India and the Provincial Governments should be readily adaptable to new or changing conditions, and should not be stereotyped by anything in the nature of a rigid constitution. It is essential to remember that the mutual relations of the Indian Governments are not those of States or Colonies voluntarily associated in a federal system, where a written constitution is necessary to preserve original rights of the contracting parties. In India the Provincial Governments are, and should remain, subject to the general control of the Government of India in all respects, and their functions and powers should be variable by the Central Government or by the Secretary of State as circumstances require.

Difficulty of prescribing the relations between the Central and the Local Governments, and certain general considerations governing these relations.

47. As circumstances which tend towards centralization, may be mentioned:—

Circumstances which tend towards centralization.

(i) The natural tendency of strong Secretariats to absorb functions more appropriate to subordinate authorities.

(ii) The increasing ease, rapidity, and volume of postal and telegraphic communication.

(iii) The spread of the English language, and the growth of solidarity and of a national feeling, among the educated classes in the various Provinces.

(v) The increasing interest taken by Parliament in the details of Indian administration, which necessarily tends to a closer check over the actions of the Local Governments and of the Government of India itself.

Considerations
in favour of decentralization.

48. On the other side, considerations adduced in favour of decentralization are :—

(i) The difficulties of administering a vast sub-continent from a single headquarters, and the inevitable failure in statesmanship and efficiency which must result from a central Government attempting this task.

(ii) The fact that the various Provinces contain diverse nationalities with different languages, traditions, and interests, and are often on separate planes of development.

(iii) The desirability of creating a larger sense of responsibility in Provincial and local authorities.

(iv) The importance of strengthening the administration and educating the people by interesting the latter more largely in public affairs.

Necessity for detailed consideration of the proposals made to us. General remarks on the

49. It is extremely difficult to strike a balance between these two sets of opposing forces, and consequently to determine whether the degree of control now exercised by the Government of India over the Local Governments, and by these, in turn, over the authorities subordinate to them, is expedient or excessive. Nor can any satisfactory solution be reached by the mere enunciation of general principles, or without taking into account previous and existing conditions, and the necessary absence of finality in most administrative measures. It has, therefore, been necessary to examine in close detail the proposals made to us and the circumstances governing them. It will be seen from the chapters which follow that, though much has been done in times past in the direction of decentralization, we are of opinion that both the Government of India and the Provincial Governments have hitherto been too much dominated by considerations of administrative efficiency. They have, we think, paid too little regard to the importance of developing a strong sense of responsibility amongst their subordinate agents, and of giving sufficient weight to local sentiments and traditions. In our opinion, the burden of work could be materially diminished if the Indian Governments were to refrain from interfering in unnecessary detail with the actions of the authorities subordinate to them, an interference which results in large measure in every administrative authority in India having to do over again work already accomplished at a stage below. Future policy should be directed to steadily enlarging the spheres of detailed administration entrusted to Provincial Governments and the authorities subordinate to them, and of recognizing that they must definitely dispose of an increasing share of the ordinary work of Government.

50. The control of the Government of India over the Provincial Governments is at present exercised in the following manner :—

(i) By financial rules and restrictions, including those laid down by Imperial departmental codes.

(ii) By general or particular checks of a more purely administrative nature, which may (a) be laid down by law or by rules having the force of law, or (b) have grown up in practice.

(iii) By preliminary scrutiny of proposed Provincial legislation, and sanction of Acts passed in the Provincial legislatures.

(iv) By general Resolutions on questions of policy, issued for the guidance of the Provincial Governments.

Ways in which the Government of India control
the Provincial Governments.

These often arise upon the reports of Commissions or Committees, appointed from time to time by the Supreme Government to investigate the working of departments with which the Provincial Governments are primarily concerned.

(v) By instructions to particular Local Governments in regard to matters which may have attracted the notice of the Government of India in connexion with the departmental administration reports periodically submitted to it, or the proceedings-volumes of a Local Government.

(vi) By action taken upon matters brought to notice by the Imperial Inspectors-General.

(vii) In connexion with the large right of appeal possessed by persons dissatisfied with the actions or orders of a Provincial Government.

51. The Provincial Governments, with the exception of Bombay, are content with the general lines of the present system, but all hold that there has been an excessive interference by the Government of India in matters of detail.

Attitude of the Provincial Governments
present system.

We shall treat first of financial arrangements and restrictions, and shall then deal with the character of the control exercised in regard to the principal administrative Departments.

CHAPTER. III.

FINANCE.

Imperial Gazetteer,
Vol. IV.,
pp. 25-6.

52. The Finance Department of the Government of India deals with the administration of Imperial finance; with the supervision of Provincial finance, with questions relating to the salaries and special allowances, the leave and the pensions, of public officers; with audit and accounts, and with currency and banking. It also supervizes the administration of most of the sources of 'separate revenue'—opium, salt, excise, stamps, and income tax, the local management of which is generally in the hands of the Provincial Governments. Expenditure on the ordinary administrative services within the Provinces, and revenues sufficient to provide for these, have been made over, subject to the control of the Government of India, to Local Governments; while outlay connected with the army, posts and telegraphs, railways, the public debt, and other Imperial objects, is directly controlled by the Supreme Government.

Functions of the Finance Department, and its relations with Local Governments.

53. The relations of the Finance Department of the Government of India to the Local Governments are thus two-fold. It exercises administrative supervision over certain revenue-producing departments, but in its general, and wider, sphere it is concerned with the allocation to Local Governments of adequate financial resources, and with the application of the restrictions imposed upon them in the expenditure of public monies. It is with financial arrangements and restrictions of this character that the present chapter is primarily concerned. We shall, however, have a few remarks to make, at its close, in respect to one of the branches of administration over which the Finance Department exercises administrative control, namely, Excise.

The Provincial Settlements.

54. For more than a generation subsequent to 1833, the public finances were centralized in the hands of the Government of India. Save in respect to local cesses

Centralization of financial

which were levied in some Provinces, principally for roads, schools, and other items of local expenditure, each Provincial Government was absolutely dependent on sums annually assigned to it by the Central Government for the upkeep of its administrative services.

Lord Mayo's

55. In 1870-71, however, the Government of Lord Mayo made the major Provinces financially responsible for the administration of police, jails, medical services, registration, education, roads and buildings, and printing, by assigning to each a fixed sum from which such expenditure was to be met. Any increase in outlay was to be provided for by savings on existing charges, or by the imposition of local taxes. In respect to the services assigned to them, the Provincial Governments were given power, subject to certain general conditions, still in force, to create appointments and raise salaries up to an individual limit of Rs. 250 a month. This delegation obviated many petty references to the Government of India.

The Local Governments had power to allot the revenue thus assigned to them at their discretion, subject to general financial rules. The expenditure was placed under a single heading, "Provincial Services," in the Budget of India, and the Government of India did not check or alter the detailed Provincial estimates.

Further develop-
Lord Lytton.

56. In 1877-79 the Government of Lord Lytton made a material alteration in the terms of the financial settlements thus concluded with Provincial Governments. While Lord Mayo's scheme of financial decentralization had effected a large reform, it suffered from the defect that the services in which the Provinces were given a financial interest were relatively few, and that the Local Governments had no interest in developing the revenues raised through their agency. The new settlements now made gave the Provincial Governments financial responsibility in regard to other heads of expenditure, assigning to them the financial control of services connected with general administration, land revenue, excise, stamps, law and justice; and at the same time gave them, generally speaking, the revenues raised from law and justice, excise, stamps, and the license (now income) tax. But any increase over the revenues as they stood at the time of the assignment was to be shared with the Government of India, who were also to bear a share of any decrease. The Local Governments were still, however, not interested in the development of any revenues other than those covered by the assigned heads, which were far from sufficient to meet their liabilities, with the result that their income had to be largely supplemented by fixed grants. The settlements with Burma and Assam, which were the last of this series, made, however, an important new departure, by substituting a share of the land revenue, in both Provinces, and of some other receipts in Burma, for fixed assignments.

On the other hand, in view of the great extent to which the financial functions of the Local Governments were enlarged by these settlements, Provincial receipts and expenditure were again shown in greater detail in the Imperial Budget. They now appear there under the various budget heads, but there are separate columns to indicate the distinction between Imperial and Provincial monies. The liberty of the Local Governments to meet a deficit in current revenue by expenditure from Provincial balances was at the same time curtailed.

57. In 1882 fresh settlements were made with the major Provinces. The receipts from customs, salt, opium, post office and telegraphs remained wholly Imperial. Receipts from forests, excise, license (now income) tax, stamps and registration were divided equally between the Government of India and the Provinces; while the receipts classified under the head "Provincial Rates" were made entirely Provincial and local, and the receipts from law and justice, public works and education were also provincialized. The bulk of the receipts from railways and irrigation remained Imperial. The division of expenditure liabilities followed, generally speaking, the incidence of the corresponding heads of receipts. But as the outlay devolving on the Provincial Governments was larger than the revenues assigned to them, the balance was made up by a percentage on the land revenue of each Province, which was otherwise an Imperial receipt.

Provincial settlements of 1882.

By these settlements the Provincial Governments obtained the same financial powers in regard to expenditure under divided heads, which now, to a considerable extent, took the place of heads entirely Provincial or Imperial, as they had enjoyed with reference to heads which were wholly Provincial.

58. The 1882 settlements were quinquennial, and accordingly the Provincial settlements were revised in 1887, in 1892, and again in 1897. The sphere of revenue ordinarily divisible between the Government of India and the Provinces was extended by the inclusion of land-revenue, while railways became almost entirely Imperial. The specific arrangements for the sharing of revenue and the allocation of expenditure varied from time to time in the different Provinces, and need not be referred to here. It will suffice to observe that as the shares of divided revenue were not ordinarily sufficient for the normal administrative requirements of the Provinces, these received, in addition, a special fixed assignment adjusted under the land-revenue head.

Subsequent revisions.

59. The year 1904 witnessed an important new departure, viz., the initiation of the present system of quasi-permanent settlements. Under these the revenues assigned to a Provincial Government are definitely fixed, and are not subject to alteration by the Government of India save in the case of grave Imperial necessity, or in the event of experience proving the assignment made to have been materially disproportionate to normal Provincial requirements. Settlements of this character have now been made with all the major Provinces, but these have only lately been completed, and the Government of India have not had time to give effect to all the reforms rendered possible by the new situation. We have, indeed, reason to believe that they were contemplating the appointment of a departmental Committee to consider measures of decentralization when our appointment superseded that proposal.

The present quasi-permanent settlements.

60. The object and principal effects of these settlements have been stated to us by the Financial Secretary to the Government of India in the following terms :—

The general principles underlying them.

The general principles which underlie the financial settlements made by the Government of India with a Local Government are as follows :—

(a) That the Government of India shall retain certain administrative services which it is inexpedient to hand over to Provincial Governments, and that they shall reserve the revenue from those services, and such a share of the other public revenues as shall be adequate to the expenditure falling upon them.

(b) That the remaining administrative services of the country being entrusted to Provincial Governments, each Local Government shall receive an assured income which will be independent of the needs of the Government of India and sufficient for its normal expenditure.

(c) That this income shall be given in the form of a defined share of the revenue which the Local Government collects, in order that the Local Government's resources may expand along with the needs of its administration.

(d) That, so far as possible, the same share of the chief sources of revenue shall be given to each Province, to insure a reasonable equality of treatment.

* * * * *

The object of making Provincial settlements quasi-permanent was to give the Local Governments a more independent position, and a more substantial and enduring interest in the management of their resources than had previously been possible. Under the previous system, when settlements were revised every five years, it was the practice for the Imperial Government to resume the surplus of the Local Government's revenue over its expenditure. This unfortunate necessity (which it is only just to say was largely the result of severe financial pressure on the Government of India during the years of low exchange) went far to destroy any incentive in a Local Government to economise, as it knew that its reduced standard of expenditure would be the basis for a correspondingly unfavourable settlement at the next revision. All this disappears under the existing system. A Local Government need not fear, in any except very abnormal circumstances, the resumption of its surplus revenue by the Imperial Government; it can count upon a reasonable continuity of financial policy; it will be able to enjoy fully the fruits of its economies, and it will not be hurried into ill-considered proposals in order to raise its apparent standard of expenditure. On the other hand, the Imperial Government improves its relations with the Local Government by avoiding five-yearly controversies over the settlement; it can calculate its own resources with more confidence, and can undertake reductions of taxation or fresh schemes of expenditure with a clearer knowledge of the consequences than was formerly possible.

General effect of present settlements.

61. Generally speaking, the effect of these settlements 14860.
is as follows. The Government of India receive the whole of the revenue accruing from opium, salt, customs, mint, railways, posts and telegraphs, and tributes from Native States, while the Provincial Governments get all receipts from registration and from the spending departments which they manage, such as police, education, law and justice, and medical. The receipts from land-revenue, excise, stamps, income-tax, and forests are divided between the Imperial and Provincial Governments, generally in equal proportions. The receipts from the larger irrigation works are also generally shared: those from minor irrigation works are (except in one Province) wholly Provincial, as are also civil works receipts other than those appertaining to Imperial buildings. The bulk of the Provincial revenues is derived from the divided heads.

Expenditure in connexion with sources of revenue which are wholly Imperial is Imperial also, while, subject to minor exceptions, Provincial revenues are responsible for the whole of the expenditure incurred within the Province in connexion with land-revenue (which includes district administration), registration, law and justice, police, jails, education, medical, stationery and printing, and Provincial civil works. Charges relating to stamps, excise, income-tax and forests are equally divided, while the incidence of Irrigation expenditure follows that of the receipts. The Provincial Governments are also responsible for the charges of such scientific and minor departments as they administer, and for political charges in connexion with Native States under their control ; but the bulk of the expenditure in connexion with the Political Department falls on the Government of India, as do all ecclesiastical charges.

G. of I.
Financial Statement, 1908-9,
para. 188.

The charges thrown on Provincial Governments by these settlements being, generally, somewhat in excess of the assigned revenues, the difference is made up, as formerly, by a fixed assignment under the land-revenue head ; but the present policy of the Government of India is to make such assignments as small as possible, when the settlement is framed, so as to enable each Province to derive the bulk of its resources from growing revenues.

Moreover, with these quasi-permanent settlements, the Provincial Governments concerned have all received considerable initial lump-grants, principally with the object of enabling them to undertake works of public utility at an earlier date than would have been possible from their ordinary revenues. Further, the ordinary resources of the Provinces have been largely supplemented of late years by special grants, principally for the development of police reform, agriculture and education, and the Government of India have also made a special assignment to supplement the ordinary revenues of district boards.

Ibid.
1907-8,
paras.

62. Lastly, while till recently liability for famine relief was Provincial, unless and until the resources of a Province became so reduced that the Government of India had to step in and finance it, arrangements recently made have largely relieved the Provinces of this burden. Hereafter, the Government of India will, year by year up to a fixed maximum, place to the credit of each Province exposed to famine a specific amount calculated roughly with reference to its estimated famine liabilities ; and when famine actually occurs, the Provincial Government will be able to draw in full on this credit without trenching on its normal resources. When such credit is exhausted, the famine charges will be divided equally between the Imperial and Provincial Governments, instead of being wholly debited to the latter ; and if, even under these conditions, the Provincial balances should be depleted below half the ordinarily prescribed minimum, further assistance will be given from Imperial revenues.

Recent arrangements in regard to famine
expenditure.

It should be added that the policy of the latest settlements has been to steady the receipts of Provinces specially liable to famine by guaranteeing that their receipts from land-revenue shall in no case fall below a fixed minimum.

63. The result of the present settlements has been to make over to the Governments of the major Provinces nearly one-third of the total revenues of India outside those of local bodies which no longer figure in the Imperial Budget.

64. Before dealing with the complaints and suggestions that have been made in regard to the existing financial arrangements, and as to the restrictions on the powers of Local Governments in dealing with Provincial revenues, we desire to lay stress on the following points :—

siderations bearing upon further financial decentralization.

(i.) In many cases where a Local Government cannot act without reference to the Government of India, a second reference has to be made by the latter to the Secretary of State.

(ii.) The Government of India have not a free hand in their financial relations with the Local Governments. Apart from specific matters of detail arising in the ordinary course of administration which require reference to the Secretary of State, they cannot, without his sanction, make any considerable grants to Provincial Governments outside the terms of the existing settlements. Para. 11 (i.).

(iii.) There is no independent body in India which possesses the power of checking or sanctioning the expenditure of the Imperial and Local Governments. The Legislative Councils can only discuss, in general terms, the Budgets and the policy underlying them : they have no power of sanction or amendment, nor do they deal with proposals for supplementary expenditure during the course of the year.* Again, the members of the Indian Governments all hold office for a short period of years (usually five at most), and have consequently but a fleeting personal responsibility for the growth of expenditure or taxation. The detailed outside control now exercised, in financial matters, by the Government of India over the Local Governments, and by the Secretary of State over the Government of India itself, takes the place, therefore, in some measure, of the control which, in other countries or in our larger Colonies, would fall to a Parliament. Similar considerations apply to administrative control not of a financial character ; and some prominent non-official witnesses have opposed any material measure of decentralization unless Provincial administration is placed on a more popular basis. Men of this class of thought meet the argument that the Local Governments are the best judges of local needs by pointing out that they are also more exposed to local prejudices, and that, in the absence of effective popular representation, it is desirable to provide for reference or appeal to a more impartial outside authority. cf. S. of S's. Des. No. 98, Fin. of 14th Aug., 1908.

(iv.) The existence of the quasi-permanent settlements makes the Provincial Governments more responsible for financing recurring additions to Provincial expenditure. Formerly these might be taken into account, in favour of the Province, in a fresh settlement : now they remain a permanent burden on Provincial resources. To this extent, increased responsibilities seem to justify larger financial powers. 9777. 18398. 19143. 33489. 34073.

(v.) The relative efficiency of the control exercised by the Finance Departments of the Central and Provincial Governments cannot be overlooked. Financial Secretaries in the Provinces deal to a greater extent than the Financial Secretary to the Government of India with branches of work involving expenditure, and the same applies to the Members of Council in charge of financial matters in Madras and Bombay as compared with the Imperial Finance Member : thus, the Financial Member in Bombay is also in charge of the important spending departments connected with revenue and district administration. The Provincial offices, again, have a smaller scope, and are therefore not so strongly organized as the Central Finance Department, and there appears to be less prior training of the civilian personnel there than in the Government of India. 33702. 44915-7. Vol. VIII., App. I., p. 222.

* It is now proposed, however, subject to certain restrictions, to give the Legislative Councils power to discuss the budgets in detail, and to pass resolutions on the subject for the consideration of the Imperial or the Provincial Government, as the case may be. S. of S's. Des. No. 193, Pub. of 27th Nov., 1908.

(vi.) In no case can the financial powers of the Provincial Governments be so developed as entirely to eliminate the control of the Government of India, since the latter must remain responsible for the general efficiency of Provincial administration, and could not allow a Province to become hopelessly crippled or involved.

(vii.) We have not considered complaints as to the inadequacy of particular Provincial settlements. The details of these are for the Local Government concerned to settle with the Government of India.

65. Turning now to the criticisms and suggestions made in regard to the general financial position as laid down in the quasi-permanent settlements, the first point for consideration is whether a more definite separation might be made between Imperial and Provincial finance, by treating all revenue and expenditure as entirely Imperial or Provincial, as the case may be. Speaking generally, those who advocate such a change would keep the present wholly Imperial and wholly Provincial heads as they stand; but it has been suggested that the divided heads should become wholly Provincial, the Government of India being placed in funds, for the purpose of the duties falling upon them, by contribution from each Province on the analogy of the matrikular beiträge of the German Empire. This might take the shape of:—

Schemes for making the present "divided" heads wholly Provincial.

†(b) A lump percentage on the Provincial revenues;

‡(c) A fluctuating contribution imposed by the Government of India and calculated upon the population or wealth, or perhaps upon the revenues, of the different Provinces.

66. An objection common to all these proposals, which we regard as very weighty, is that any such change would convert the share which the Government of India takes of the revenues raised in the Provinces more into the character of a tribute paid by the Local Governments to an outside Administration.

Considerations which lead us to reject such proposals.

67. Apart from this, we may at once dismiss suggestion (c). A subsidy on a population basis would be unfair to relatively poor and undeveloped Provinces, while there is no method of assessing the comparative wealth of each Province which would not cause infinite trouble and give rise to infinite criticism. A fluctuating contribution based upon Provincial revenues would, of course, be feasible; but it would introduce such an element of uncertainty into the Provincial finances that the position of these would be changed for the worse.

We also consider suggestion (a) impracticable. Periodical revision of the fixed assignments to the Government of India, to meet the necessarily growing needs of that Government, would provoke recurring controversies with the Provinces of the same character as those which it has been the object of the present quasi-permanent settlements to allay.

68. It is urged in favour of suggestion (b) that it ensures full provision to the Provinces, as well as to the Government of India, of growing revenues to meet growing expenditure, thus giving greater elasticity in Provincial finance than is possible where a Province receives a considerable portion of its resources in the shape of fixed assignments; and that any desired modification of a Provincial settlement could be more easily effected under this system than is the case at present. It appears illogical, however, to bring the heads of revenue which are already entirely Provincial or Imperial into the field of calculation, and the lump percentage proposed would have to be confined to the present divided heads. Looking at the matter on this basis, it appears to us that:—

(i.) The percentages as between the various Provinces could obviously not be uniform, since the richer and more advanced would necessarily have to contribute a larger proportion of their revenues to the Central Government. Such percentages would have to be arrived at, as the detailed Provincial settlements now are, by checking the resources of a Province under each head in order to get an adequate view of the whole.

(ii.) It is impossible, at present, to attain the object, which this system has in view, of making the whole resources of the Province dependent upon growing revenues. After a Provincial settlement has been concluded there are frequent petty adjustments of various descriptions as between the Imperial and Provincial Governments, and occasional grants by the former, which individually may not be of very large amount, for the purpose of some administrative reform. Such assignments are now made by fixed grants. To convert these, upon every occasion on which they are made, into a reduced percentage of the total Provincial contribution, would involve an enormous amount of laborious calculation, and often a considerable degree of controversy. If, again, it should at any time be thought desirable to convert fixed grants aggregating a considerable sum into a share of growing revenue, such a change could as easily be effected, under the present system by enhancing the Provincial share of some divided head. There is, therefore, nothing to be gained by the adoption of such a scheme.

converting
fixed assignments into

69. The chief valid grievance underlying all these suggestions seems to be that, in some Provinces, fixed assignments from the Government of India tend to increase disproportionately, and to put the Province in a worse position, pro tanto, than if it had a corresponding amount of growing revenue to meet its inevitably growing expenditure. We think, however, that this difficulty can be satisfactorily met by occasional revisions of settlement which would give such a Province a larger share of growing revenue. A revision of this description has, indeed, lately been effected in the settlement made with Madras. There is, no doubt, an advantage in making the Provincial shares of divided heads as uniform as possible throughout India, and providing for differences by lump contributions; but this may be outweighed, in particular instances, by the disadvantage of a large fixed assignment. The Government of India should retain the authority, which we understand they at present possess, to effect such modifications in consultation with the Provincial Government concerned,

70. Other proposals put forward are to the effect that the Local Governments should obtain permanent and separate resources, bringing in not less than their existing revenues, by having certain of the divided heads entirely assigned to them, the others becoming Imperial. The advocates of this view appear to imagine that such a separation would give the Local Governments larger financial powers than they at present enjoy ; but except in the possible matter of general budget control, this is not so, since a Local Government possesses the same detailed financial powers in regard to such matters as the creation of appointments, in the case of a divided head as it does in one that is wholly Provincial. It is, no doubt, conceivable that, under the present system, a Local Government happening to be possessed of a considerable surplus, might desire to push expenditure in regard to a divided head such as forests, while the Government of India might at the same time find themselves in a position in which they could not conveniently meet the additional expenditure which the adoption of such a proposal would call for from them. That, however, would be a matter of rare occurrence, and as against the proposed change there are the following considerations :—

(i.) The Local Governments benefit by broadening the bases of their revenues. If, for example, the whole of the revenues they obtain under the present divided heads (which are the most important from the receipts side) were hereafter to accrue to them from, say, land-revenue only, or from land-revenue and excise, they would be much more at the mercy of fluctuating seasons than they are at present.

(ii.) The arrangement by which the Government of India share in the receipts and expenditure of some of the most important Provincial heads of administration makes them more interested in, and identified with, local developments ; and they can exercise the general control in matters of policy, which they must in any case retain as a Central Government, with less friction if they are also concerned pecuniarily.

(iii.) As a matter of general policy, it seems undesirable to encourage the idea that the Government of India are chiefly concerned with relatively unpopular services, such as salt, military expenditure and ' Home charges.'

71. Accordingly, our conclusion is that it would be undesirable to make any sudden and violent change in the present system of divided heads, but, as already stated, we advocate the conversion of unduly large fixed assignments into shares of growing revenue. Moreover, it seems clear that, as the financial position permits, the resources of Provincial Governments will need to be increased, to provide for the expansion and improvement of local services. It may be, also, that the scope of Provincial financial responsibility will be directly expanded, e.g., irrigation might be made a more entirely Provincial item than it is at present. This increase of regular Provincial revenues should, in our opinion, be met by gradually provincializing heads of revenue which are now divided, and for which the Provincial Governments must always be specially responsible, such as forests or excise.

The high authority of Sir David Barbour may, it is true, be quoted in support of the* thesis that a Province with a population of many millions is important enough to possess a financial system of its own. In theory that is true, but we are of opinion that present circumstances render the full application of this theory impracticable; and the objection to shared revenues which appears to have been mainly present to Sir David Barbour's mind, viz., the want of any assurance that revenues assigned to the Local Governments would be of a permanent character, has been met by the present quasi-permanent settlements.

Possible effect of the grant to local Legislative Councils of material control over Provincial finance upon the system of divided heads.

72. The above considerations apply to the existing conditions of administration, but we recognize that the grant to the local Legislative Councils of material control over Provincial finance, may make it necessary to do away, as far as possible, with the present divided heads, and to place some entirely within the purview of the Provincial, and others within that of the Imperial, Government.*

No advantage in keeping divided heads of revenue, but provincializing the corresponding expenditure.

73. It has been suggested by several witnesses that, while the divided heads of revenue might remain, the corresponding expenditure should be all provincialized, the Provincial shares under the revenue heads being increased proportionately. We see no adequate advantage in such a change. It might possibly justify some relaxation of administrative control based upon the Government of India's interest in the expenditure involved; but it would give the Local Governments no further powers in regard to the details of expenditure than they at present possess, and would in no way solve the problem of separation between Imperial and Provincial finance. Further, the Provincial Governments might conceivably be deterred from undertaking useful schemes of reform by the consideration that the whole expenditure would fall upon them, while they would receive only a portion of any increased revenue, which might result. Lastly, under this system the Government of India share of the revenue, counterbalanced by no share of the expenditure, would assume more of the invidious character of a tribute.

Undesirable to increase the control of the Secretary of State over the present settlements.

74. It has been suggested that the permanent character of the present Provincial settlements should be safeguarded by placing them under the guarantee of the Secretary of State, whose approval would be required to any variation therein. We do not consider this desirable, since the Government of India are already pledged not to alter the quasi-permanent settlements to the detriment of any Province save in very exceptional circumstances. The approval of the Secretary of State is already necessary to any material variation for the benefit of the Province, but there are constant minor adjustments, as between the Local and the Supreme Governments, reference of which to the India Office would cause quite unnecessary correspondence and delay.

Special grants by the Government of India to Local Governments—objections urged against present system.

75. Of late years the Government of India have made considerable grants to the various Provinces for special purposes, such as agricultural improvement, the reform of police administration, the development of education, and, in the current year, for sanitation. This system, which they term one of "doles," is objected to by the Government of Bombay, and by some of the Provincial witnesses, on the ground that it becomes an instrument for increasing the control of the Government of India over the Local Governments in the departments concerned, and that it involves considerable labour in the preparation of special accounts, called for by the Central Government to show how the money granted by them has been spent. As regards this last point, however, it appears that the Supreme Government merely desire a rough comparison of the expenditure on the service concerned in the year before the last grant was made and subsequently, in order to be in a position to decide how far existing grants may be supplemented if occasion offers. This implies a certain amount of extra work, but there is no question of continuous separate accounting.

Those who object to "a policy of doles" urge that, if the Government of India find themselves in possession of a surplus beyond their needs, they should revise the Provincial settlements so as to allot larger resources to the Provincial Governments, or give each of them lump sums to dispose of at its discretion.

76. We think that the system underlying the existing grants is open to some objection. As at present applied, it gives a handle for, and does in effect lead to, increased interference by the Government of India in the detailed expenditure of the money thus granted, while it also tends to make the Provincial Governments rely upon the Government of India for help in any matter of administrative reform. It is, moreover, difficult to distribute the grants fairly. All that can be done is to follow rough methods of calculation available from departmental statistics, or from the reports of special Commissions.

Defects in existing system.

Vol. VIII.,
App. II.,
p. 231.

It has been represented, too, that, under the present system, a Provincial Government may have to spend money on objects which it considers less urgent than others which it would prefer to make the subject of special outlay.

77. We do not, however, desire to depart from a system under which the Government of India have at their disposal revenues sufficient, not merely to meet their existing normal liabilities and provide for some expansion of these, but to cope with sudden and unforeseen additions to expenditure, arising, for instance, from the occurrence of famine or external disturbances. Such a system further enables them to provide, when circumstances permit, for general remissions of taxation such as those which have been so marked of late years in connexion with the salt duty. The possession of reserve resources by the Government of India also allows, in favourable circumstances, of grants to Provincial Governments, but individually these will not usually be sufficiently large to justify a revision ad hoc of the Provincial settlements, while, again, the financial position may admit of non-recurring grants only.

Any material change therein undesirable.

78. Where recurring grants are given, it would, we think, be undesirable to make these simply in the shape of lump assignments which the Provinces might apply as seemed good to them. There is no readily available criterion by which grants of this character could be distributed in a manner which would be recognized as generally equitable. It is also, at present, an essential prerogative of the Central Government that they should be able to call upon all Provinces to take simultaneous steps towards the development of some particular service, and this can be done more smoothly if grants are made for that purpose. Lastly, it would be more difficult to make such general grants, in face of the pressure of the Military and other spending departments of the Central Government, than when the money is to be devoted to some specific improvement which is generally admitted as desirable.

Proposal to maintain the present policy subject to certain conditions.

79. We consider, therefore, that, in present circumstances, the policy of special grants must be maintained, provided that :—

(i.) Such a grant does not involve any greater administrative control by the Government of India over the Local Governments and particular departments concerned, than already exists.

(ii.) The views of the Provincial Governments are fully considered before any decision is taken as to the relative urgency of the objects upon which a grant or grants should be expended.

We do not, moreover, think it always necessary that the object for which a grant is made should be the same in every Province. The Provincial Governments may occasionally require the stimulus of pecuniary help in varying directions.

Lastly, as already indicated, where successive recurring grants have attained to a large amount in any Province, their conversion into shares of growing revenue should be considered.*

80. In dealing with the revenues assigned to them, the Provincial Governments are subject to a variety of restrictions discussed below.

Budget restrictions on Local Governments.

Control of the Government of India over Provincial Budgets.

81. The Provincial Budgets being incorporated in the general Budget of India, the estimated receipts and expenditure under each Budget head managed by a Provincial Government, which, in the case of divided heads, also includes Imperial receipts and charges, have to be forwarded to the Government of India, and the Local Government's figures are often altered by the Finance Department. We are informed that such alterations are generally not for the purpose of restricting the freedom of the Provincial administrations in dealing with their own resources, but in the interests of accurate estimating. Occasionally, however, provision made for expenditure in the Provincial estimates is struck out, or cut down, by the Government of India on other grounds, as when a Local Government seems likely to deplete its balances beyond the minimum normal amount which has been prescribed as a measure of safety in the case of each Province, or when it appears to be spending some special grant too rapidly.†

Further, it is an accounts rule that a scheme cannot appear in the Budget till it has received the final administrative sanction required, which may, according to circumstances, be that of a Local Government, of the Government of India, or of the Secretary of State. In practice, however, this rule is applied with latitude, and schemes which seem likely to be sanctioned at an early date are permitted to appear in the Budget. If, however, a Local Government should include a scheme which is not likely to be administratively sanctioned within the Budget period, or till towards its close, it is usually (and we consider properly) struck out of the estimates.

of the Local Governments, which include the revised estimates for the year drawing to a close, as well as the Budget estimates for the coming year, are sent up to the Government of India through the local Accountant-General, who is an officer of the Imperial Finance Department. The first edition of these has to be submitted to the Government of India by the 20th January ; a second edition, based on later figures and facts, is sent up about the middle of February ; and a third edition at the beginning of March.* In the revised estimates of the expiring year, the Accountant-General can alter the figures of the Provincial Governments so as to bring them into greater accord with what he considers likely to be the probable actuals ; but as regards the future Budget figures he can only suggest alterations. His suggestions are taken into account both by the Provincial Government and by the Government of India, and alterations made by the latter authority in the first edition of the estimates are passed back to the Local Government, which has the opportunity, not infrequently exercised, of asking for reconsideration on any point in which it thinks the alteration of its figures to be undesirable. A similar course is followed in regard to the later editions, though the bulk of the Government of India corrections as regards abstract probabilities are usually made on the first.

83. When the Government of India cut down a Local Government's estimate of expenditure under a major head, such as police or education, as likely to be excessive, the correction is made in lump under the main Budget head, and the reduction has hitherto had to be redistributed by the Local Government over a variety of minor heads. Complaint was made that the amount of work which this involved counterbalanced any advantage obtained in the direction of more accurate estimating, and the procedure has lately been altered by the Government of India. Now, when an alteration of this nature is made in a major head, the figures in the minor heads are allowed to remain unaffected, the reduction desired by the Government of India being shown, as a lump saving, at the end. If, towards the close of the year, it should appear that the minor head estimates are more or less correct, and that the total as reduced by the Central Government will be exceeded, it becomes incumbent upon the Local Government to find the necessary funds, either by reappropriation from some other head, or by obtaining the sanction of the Government of India to an additional allotment from the Provincial balance.

When the Government of India reduce estimates of expenditure with the object of obtaining greater accuracy, the general practice is to inform the Local Government concerned why this has been done, and to state that in case the original estimate proves correct, the Government of India will make no difficulty, provided funds are available, in permitting any requisite drawal from the Provincial balances.

Provincial Governments' powers of re-appropriation.

* The proposals of the Government of India in connexion with the reform of the Legislative Councils will, however, involve the preliminary submission of the Imperial budget to the Viceroy's Legislative Council by the end of February.

(b) the Imperial expenditure with which it is concerned, are not exceeded. Thus, if an additional grant is required for a purely Provincial head of expenditure such as police, it might be met from a head of the same description such as education. If again more money is required under a divided head such as excise, it might be met from a similar divided head such as income-tax ; or the additional Provincial expenditure involved might be covered by reappropriation from a purely Provincial head, and the additional Imperial outlay from some Imperial head which the Local Government administers and budgets for, e.g., customs in the maritime Provinces.* If reappropriation within these limits fails to meet requirements, the Local Government must draw from its own balances in the case of Provincial expenditure, or from Imperial balances in the case of Imperial outlay ; and in either case the sanction of the Government of India is required.

Suggestions made for diminishing the control of the Government of India over Provincial Budgets.

85. It has been suggested by the Governments of Bombay and the Punjab, and by some witnesses in those Provinces, that the Local Governments should deal finally with their own Budgets, or at any rate that they should have this power in respect to the purely Provincial heads. The exact bearing of this proposal upon the divided heads is not altogether clear ; but it is apparently contemplated that the Government of India should accept the figures of the Local Government, or that the Local Government and the Government of India should, where they differ, each have their own set of figures. Thus, in the latter case, if the excise revenue of a Province, of which the Government of India take a half share, were estimated by the Local Government at 2 crores of rupees and by the Government of India at 2·4 crores, the latter figure would appear in the Imperial Budget, while the Budget of the Province would contain the former.

Reasons for rejecting them.

We are not in favour of this last proposal. The existence of such double sets of figures must inevitably tend to confusion and misapprehension.

86. Nor do we think it possible that the Government of India should accept the Provincial Budget figures without question. The divided heads furnish a large part of the Imperial revenues, and the Imperial surplus or deficit would be materially affected by inaccurate estimating in respect of these.† It is necessary, therefore, for the Government of India to scrutinize figures in which they are so materially interested, and statements furnished to us by their Financial Secretary show that the corrections made by them, in the interests of accuracy, have, generally speaking, been justified by facts.

The figures in respect to the entirely Provincial heads are also of importance to the Government of India as affecting their surplus. The general rule is that

* It seems to be imagined in some Provinces that the Local Governments can only reappropriate between heads of the same character, e.g. (a) divided heads and (b) those wholly Provincial : but we understand the Government of India follow the view given in the text, viz., that the powers of the Provincial Governments are only limited by the condition that the totals of the Imperial and Provincial estimates included in the Budget are respectively not exceeded.

† Land revenue, stamps, excise, income-tax and forests afford to the Government of India a gross revenue of about £15,000,000, and a net revenue of about £13,900,000.

Imperial expenditure must be covered by the year's revenue ; but the Provincial Governments, which deal with services where continuity of expenditure is of primary importance, have a larger latitude, and may spend more than their current revenues if they can find the money without depleting their credit balances with the Government of India beyond a prescribed minimum figure. Under this system, if a Provincial Government, for example, has a current income of 3 crores of rupees and spends 2·8 crores, the remaining 20 lakhs, which go to its balances, are, under the terms of the Provincial settlements, not ordinarily available for utilization on current expenditure by the Government of India. That Government has consequently a liability of 20 lakhs in respect of the unspent money ; and this is recognized by deducting the amount from what would otherwise be the Imperial surplus of the year. If, on the other hand, the Provincial Government in question spends 3·2 crores, the excess 20 lakhs are withdrawn from balances for which the Government of India have already made themselves responsible in a preceding year, and consequently, for Imperial purposes, the total expenditure of the current year is reduced by 20 lakhs and the Imperial surplus correspondingly increased.

Further, the Government of India's surplus cash balances are utilized in financing certain capital expenditure, e.g., the construction of productive public works, and loans to local bodies and agriculturists. Of these cash balances, the sums to the credit of the various Provinces form a material portion, and it is necessary that they should be estimated as accurately as possible, which cannot be done without a review of the current figures as given in the Provincial Budgets.

87. While, therefore, Imperial and Provincial finance remain as closely intertwined as at present, it is essential that the estimates of the Local Governments should be incorporated in the Imperial Budget, and be subject to revision by the predominant partner.

If, however, Provincial Legislatures are given an effective share in the control of Provincial finance, that, as we have already observed, would render it desirable to give the Provinces more distinct sources of revenue, and, concomitantly, more final powers over their Budgets. In such an event it would, no doubt, be necessary for the Government of India to frame their own independent estimates for general ways and means purposes. Even then, however, we think that the Provincial figures should continue to appear in the Imperial Budget, so that the latter may afford information as to the collective resources of the Indian Governments, and as to the manner in which these are to be applied. The Government of India should also retain a general power of control over the Provincial estimates.*

The Provincial Budget estimates must still figure in the Imperial Budget, and be controlled by the Government of India ; but the grant to Local Legislatures of an effective control over Provincial finance would render it desirable to give Local Governments more power over their Budgets, and more distinct sources of revenue.

* Since this paragraph was written the Secretary of State has sanctioned proposals of the Government of India to give Provincial Legislatures larger powers in connexion with their budgets, and to allow Provincial Governments very considerable latitude in dealing with the details of Provincial expenditure, while purely Provincial revenue and expenditure are to be outside the purview of the Imperial Legislative Council. To avoid overlapping discussion by the Imperial and Provincial Legislatures, which would seem inevitable with reference to the divided heads, it follows, in our opinion, that, as recommended in the text, the sources of Provincial revenue should be made more distinct than at present.

Meticulous alterations in Provincial figures by the Government of India should be avoided.

88. But while we consider it justifiable, and indeed necessary, in present conditions, for the Government of India to review the Provincial estimates in the manner above described, we think that meticulous corrections of Provincial figures in the interests of accurate estimating should be avoided. Statements furnished to us by the Finance Department show alterations under particular heads which go down so low as Rs. 1,000, and we do not think that such minute changes, of which complaint has been made in some Provinces, are desirable. The Provincial figures should be accepted unless they seem likely to lead to material error, either in the total figures of the Province itself or in the figures for all India under a particular head.

The information required from the Provinces in regard to Public Works Budget figures should be reduced.

89. It appears, too, that under the head "Civil Public Works," preliminary Budget information submitted from the Provinces goes into unnecessary detail in regard to particular works. The Public Works Secretary to the Government of India tells us that such details are not required, and we recommend that the information furnished should be reduced to what is really needed.

It is undesirable that the Provincial estimates should be submitted to the Government of India at a later date than at present.

90. It has been suggested that the Provincial estimates should be sent up to the Government of India, for the first time, at a date approximating to that on which the second edition now goes in to them, i.e., about the middle of February, or even later, the object being to give the Local Governments more reliable figures in respect to the current year, and longer time for preparing their Budgets. We are not in favour of this proposal. As the Imperial Budget has now to be completed and presented during the last portion of March, it would be impossible for the Government of India to deal with the Provincial figures adequately, and to compile and revise the Imperial Budget as a whole, within a period of about four weeks, while the delay suggested would also render it very difficult to communicate in time with the Secretary of State as to the exact remissions of taxation, or additional grants for administrative improvements, which might be contemplated.*

The allegation that corrections by the Government of India in the Provincial Estimates handicap Provincial Governments in dealing with unforeseen expenditure is not justified.

91. It has been urged that although the alterations effected by the Government of India under Provincial heads of expenditure may in themselves be justified, the figures are cut so fine that a Local Government may be left without means to meet unforeseen expenditure except by withdrawal from its balances, for which a reference to the Government of India is required. Such a contingency, however, could usually be met by reappropriation from other heads, at the Local Government's own discretion, and the cases in which it is necessary to go up to the Government of India for a net extra allotment are rare. The Financial Secretary to the Government of India informed us that during the last five years there had been only 18 such requests for additional expenditure-grants in all the major Provinces, and that some of these were not really necessary, as the Local Government could have met the amount by reappropriation. The reappropriation powers of the Local Governments are indeed very large, for they can add to the estimates of expenditure under one major head by transfer of funds from another in a way which, in the United Kingdom, would only be possible by means of a Supplementary Vote passed by the House of Commons.

92. We disapprove, too, of the suggestion that the Local Governments should have power to draw on their balances without reference to the Government of India, provided these are not allowed to run below some definitely fixed sum. As already explained, the Government of India are materially interested, for ways and means purposes, in the amount of the Provincial balances, and these should not be depleted without their sanction.

Rejection of the suggestion that Provincial Governments should be able to draw on their balances without reference to the Government of India.

93. It has, however, been argued that a Local Government might be allowed to incur net additional expenditure without the sanction of the Government of India :—

(i.) If this can be met by increase of revenue over the Budget estimate within the year, thus leaving the net balance provided in the Budget unaffected.

(ii.) Up to some relatively small amount, so as to avoid petty references.

The Financial Secretary to the Government of India was against proposal (i.) on the ground that the addition to revenue could not be easily verified at the time when the additional expenditure was demanded, and might eventually prove illusory. He did not think proposal (ii.) necessary, but was willing to accept it, up to a total limit of five lakhs in the year for any one Province, as a satisfaction to Provincial sentiment.

We do not think any modification of the existing system necessary. The Local Governments have already very large powers in respect to reappropriations, and any addition to the year's expenditure which goes beyond this should require outside sanction.

94. Such real inconvenience as has been experienced by the Provincial Governments in respect to alterations made by the Government of India in their Budget figures arose from the fact, mentioned in paragraph 83, that the reduction of an expenditure estimate under a major head necessitated the revision of a number of detailed minor head estimates by the local authorities. As already explained, this is now no longer the case. Similar inconvenience was previously felt in respect to the Budget figures of the district boards. These were formerly shown in lump (under the appropriate service heads), along with the Provincial figures, in the Government of India Budgets, and a cutting under "Local" for a Province involved distribution among a number of district boards, and possible difficulties thereafter in the way of reappropriation. Now, however, the district board figures have been omitted from the Imperial Budget, and no such case can arise in future.

Real inconvenience formerly experienced by Provincial Governments in consequence of reductions by the Government of India in their expenditure figures has now ceased to exist.

95. It has also been suggested that Local Governments should be allowed to enter, in their expenditure Budgets, a general unallotted reserve, to be applied later on to meet emergent or unforeseen outlay. This proposal is contrary to the present Budget system, which requires all current outlay to be scheduled under particular heads of expenditure, and we do not recommend its adoption. The Provincial balance, from which the

It is not desirable that Local Governments should be allowed to provide general unallotted reserves in their Expenditure Budgets.

Local Government can draw, when needful, with the assent of the Government of India, furnishes the real reserve required to meet unforeseen outlay of a large character, while small charges can generally be met from savings.

Provincial Governments might be allowed to delegate certain powers of reappropriation to Boards of Revenue and other subordinate authorities.

96. It has been suggested that the power of reappropriation might be delegated by Local Governments to Boards of Revenue, Financial Commissioners and heads of departments, in respect of branches of the administration which these control. We would allow such a subordinate authority to make reappropriations of a routine character from one minor head to another within the same major Budget head, provided that savings under salaries and establishments are not reappropriated to other classes of expenditure, or vice versa. If the Local Governments are to have proper control over their Budgets, they cannot delegate the power to transfer between different major heads. The restriction we recommend in regard to minor heads is due to the fact that no separate provision is made for leave allowances paid in India, that such allowances are ordinarily met out of savings in the Budget allotments for salaries, and that this circumstance may require redistribution of allotments as between different major heads and departments. Savings under salaries, moreover, afford a certain minor reserve for meeting excess expenditure in other directions, or special calls upon the Local Government's purse.*

Other general restrictions.

Local Governments may not impose additional taxation, or make any fundamental change in a revenue system, without the previous sanction of the Government of India.

97. (1.) A Provincial Government may not impose additional taxation, or make any fundamental change in an existing revenue system, without the previous sanction of the Government of India.

C. A. C. Art. 283.

There are, however, some small practical exceptions to this general rule. In so far as a fresh district land-revenue settlement may be said to involve additional taxation, the Madras and Bombay Governments have a fairly free hand. Provincial Governments may also enhance local excise duties upon liquors manufactured in India, or drugs, without reference to the Government of India, unless the action proposed is calculated to affect some neighbouring Province. The general principles of land revenue and excise policy have, however, been prescribed by the Government of India, and it is merely in respect of the detailed application of these that the Local Governments have some discretion. Forest receipts are derived from the operations of a quasi-commercial department, and registration revenue is mainly in the nature of fees levied for services in connexion with documents. The Provincial Governments have some discretion in regulating the receipts from these sources.

Ibid.

In present circumstances Local Governments should not have power to impose additional taxation.

98. It has been suggested by the Bombay Government, though rather as a matter ultimately desirable than one of immediate practical application, that the Local Governments should have power to raise and revise Provincial taxation of all descriptions. We do not recommend this in present circumstances. Provincial Governments have not, as yet, a sufficiently separate fiscal sphere to render such a policy desirable, and the probable

Further, the Local Governments, while keenly interested in the development of administrative efficiency, lack that responsibility to the taxpayers, and their representatives, which acts as a check upon increased taxation in other countries.

99. But should a larger degree of separation be hereafter effected between Imperial and Provincial finance, following upon a more effective control over the Provincial finances by Legislative Councils which would in some measure represent the taxpayers, it would no doubt become practicable, and probably necessary, to allow Local Governments which desired to increase their scale of expenditure, the means for doing so by levying special Provincial taxation. Even then, however, the special sanction of the Government of India and of the Secretary of State to any such taxation should be requisite, since it would involve legislation, and might raise important political issues or trench upon the sphere of Imperial (Government of India) finance.*

tive purposes, and the control of the public debt is a function of the Central Government.

A number of witnesses advocate giving Provincial Governments power to borrow in the open market*; but many of these admitted that some control on the part of the Government of India would still be required in regard to the amount and time of the loan, the rate of interest, and the period of repayment; and that Provincial loans could not be permitted to compete prejudicially with one another, or with the loans of the Government of India.

Arguments adduced in favour of giving them such powers.

105. The arguments put forward in favour of the proposal are :—

(i) That it would tap fresh local markets, the markets for Imperial loans in India being at present practically confined to Calcutta and Bombay.

(ii) That it would enable Provincial Governments to raise money for important projects when the Government of India could not assist them.

(iii) That while the Government of India loans are usually confined to productive purposes, i.e., are raised for railways and irrigation works which are expected to yield a net return that will more than cover the interest on the money borrowed therefor, it might also be desirable to borrow for purposes which are financially unremunerative, but of administrative importance.

Arguments on the other side.

106. The arguments against† the proposal are that—

(i) It is very doubtful whether the Local Governments would be able to attract fresh capital in India, and if they failed to do this, their borrowings would disturb the Government of India loans. The Government of India already borrow for productive works all that they and the Secretary of State think can be expediently raised; and these authorities are better able to gauge the amount of available capital than any Provincial Government could possibly be.

(ii) The Provincial Governments have no separate sources of revenue on which they could borrow, for the Government of India loans are already based on the security of the whole Government revenue, Imperial and Provincial. This point, per se, is not a very strong one, as the Government of India would practically guarantee a Provincial loan, in that they could not allow any Local Government to go bankrupt; and indeed some of the witnesses who have proposed Provincial loans have also suggested that they should be subject to a Government of India guarantee. But the very fact that there would be, at any rate, a tacit guarantee of this description seems to be fatal to the proposal. The Local Governments would, in any case, have to pay more for their loans than the Government of India, and it is cheaper, therefore, for the latter to conduct borrowing operations. This indeed is recognized by some witnesses, who suggest that loans should be raised by the Government of India on behalf of the Provincial Governments.

(iii) Provincial Governments would generally borrow for financially unproductive purposes, and this would add to the dead-weight of debt. Facilities for loans of this description ought to be very cautiously given, and the services administered by the Local Governments are pre-eminently such as ought to be financed out of current revenues or by drawing from balances.

33489,
Vol. II.,
App.,
p. 326.

Some witnesses mentioned the case of large famine expenditure as one which would justify the Local Government in borrowing; but we do not share this view, since, under the arrangements indicated in paragraph 62, the Government of India will bear a very large share of such expenditure, and will specially assist the Provincial Governments should the outlay falling upon the latter assume inconveniently large proportions.

107. After weighing these considerations, we hold it undesirable that Provincial Governments should borrow any large sums in the open market. That is a function which ought to remain in the hands of the Government of India.*

Provincial Governments should not be allowed to borrow in the open market.

108. It has been suggested, however, that, for relatively small projects of local utility, not exceeding, say, five lakhs of rupees in cost, a fresh local market might be found, which Provincial Governments might be allowed to tap with the approval of the Government of India.

We are sceptical as to such local markets proving available save in exceptional instances, and in any case they furnish a more natural sphere for the borrowings of the local bodies referred to below. Even if fresh capital could be found in this way, we should still consider the proposal undesirable. Loans which individually might not be large, might be accumulated until the aggregate in all Provinces became formidable, and demands upon the public purse which could be satisfied by loans of this description ought, as an essential principle of sound finance, to be met out of current revenues or Provincial balances.†

109. There may, however, be cases in which Provincial Governments are unable to provide from their current resources for costly non-productive works of manifest utility, as for instance the improvement of water-ways in Bengal, and of sanitation and drainage in the country generally. In the case of a large project of this sort, it might be desirable that the Government of India should advance the money in the first instance, recovering it from the Provincial Governments in short-term instalments. But should such loans become at all numerous, the Government of India would not be able to meet them out of cash balances, and it would then be necessary to curtail productive borrowing, and the amounts which can be spared to local bodies and agriculturists, or to increase the Indian debt. The proposal is, therefore, one which would have to be very carefully considered in each case.

Cases in which it may be desirable that they should receive loans from the Government of India.

110. (vii.) But though Provincial Governments have no borrowing powers per se, such powers are possessed by statutory local bodies under their control, principally Port Trusts, Presidency and other municipalities, and district boards, whose transactions are now outside the Budget figures presented by the Government of India. Such bodies have already at their disposal separate sources of revenue, such as port dues, house and profession taxes, octroi, or land cesses. There is, moreover, a material difference between these bodies and Provincial Governments in that while a municipality, for instance, might reasonably treat, as capital expenditure, outlay on markets, buildings or offices which would only recur at very rare intervals, expenditure of an analogous description by a Local Government is of such constant occurrence, taking the Province as a whole, that it must be regarded as current outlay.

Control of the Government of India over open market loans by local bodies.

111. The borrowing powers of Port Trusts and Presidency municipalities are mostly regulated by the special Acts constituting them; and while they are occasionally allowed to borrow from Government, they generally, subject to the sanction of the Provincial Government, and also of the Government of India, raise loans in the open market, the same course being adopted by large district municipalities.

The control of the Government of India over such local loans is directed to prescribing that these shall not be issued at a time when they would compete injuriously with those of the Government, and that the periods of repayment shall not be excessive. Complaints have been made in regard to both these matters, the intervention of the Government of India being objected to as unnecessary or as unduly rigid.

10896, Vol. VII.,
10941-2, App. II.,
Vol. III., p. 162.
App. II., 33745,
p. 176, and 34228,
App. III., 34237-45.
p. 188.

This should not be reduced except in the case of loans not exceeding 5 lakhs and repayable within 30 years.

112. In this we cannot agree. Some of these local bodies, e.g., the Calcutta and Bombay municipalities, and the Port Trusts of those cities and of Karachi and Rangoon, issue loans of very considerable amount; and it is not desirable that they should be floated at a time when they might compete injuriously with those of the Government of India. The loan market in India is limited in capacity, and the Government of India, as representing the general taxpayer, are entitled to priority over other public authorities.

As regards the cases in which the Government of India have intervened to diminish the period within which a proposed local loan is to be repaid, we would draw attention to Mr. Meston's remarks on this subject, and express our general concurrence in the arguments there adduced. The tendency of public corporations in India, as elsewhere, is to endeavour to diminish present burdens, and add to present resources, by long-term loans which will re-act on the credit and resources of the next generation. There is no matter in which more careful outside check is required than in the case of local indebtedness, and we therefore hold that the present control of the Government of India in this respect ought to be maintained, save, as suggested by Mr. Meston, where the loan does not exceed 5 lakhs and will be repayable within 30 years. In such relatively small cases, full power of sanction might be left with the Provincial Government, and this delegation would apparently cause an appreciable saving in references.*

Loans given by Government to local bodies.

113. District boards and most municipalities are allowed, in the absence of facilities for raising money in the open market, to borrow from Government, which also advances money, for agricultural purposes, to owners and occupiers of land, and occasionally for the purpose of clearing some large or historic estate from pecuniary embarrassment. Loans of these descriptions fall under what is termed the Local Loans Account; and the money required for them is found by the Government of India from their cash balances, the outgoings and repayments of principal being treated as capital transactions, and interest payments only being entered in the current revenue accounts. The total amount available for the Local Loans Account in each year is distributed among the Provincial Governments in proportion to their requirements, and, subject to the general conditions imposed by law or rule, they have full discretion as to the individual application of the amounts assigned to them. Upon these they pay interest to the Government of India, and are responsible for any loss of principal, while, to cover this risk, they lend the money out at a somewhat higher rate.

Loans to agriculturists, commonly known as takavi advances, are regulated by the Land Improvement and Agriculturists' Loans Acts.

114. Loans to district boards and municipalities for purposes of public improvement are regulated by the Local Authorities Loans Act, and section 5 of that Act authorizes the Government of India to make rules as to the method in which such loans may be made. The ordinary period for repayment of such loans has been fixed at 20 years, but till lately the Provincial Governments could extend this to 30 years in special circumstances. In 1907, however, this power was taken away, and the Government of India now require any loan for a longer period than 20 years to come up to them for sanction. This restriction, which has been made the subject of complaint, we consider sound. In addition to the considerations adduced above, as to the necessity for outside control in matters which lead to the increase of local indebtedness and the casting of unnecessary burdens upon posterity, there is the fact that the amount available for lending from the Local Loans Account is limited, and that the more rapidly these monies are repaid, the more is available for employment elsewhere.*

115. Another enactment, the Local Emergencies Loans Act, governs loans from Government to local bodies for temporary emergencies, such as famine relief, or outlay on the prevention of plague or other epidemic diseases. Section 3 of this Act requires that such loans shall be subject to such general terms and conditions as the Government of India may impose, and the maximum period of repayment has been fixed at 15 years. Section 2, however, also requires the specific sanction of the Governor-General in Council to every individual loan under the Act, even though the general conditions laid down under section 3 have been complied with. We do not consider this restriction necessary. The Government of India need only be referred to where it is desired to depart from their general rules or instructions.

116. It has been suggested that large municipalities should receive greater assistance from the Local Loans Account instead of being required to borrow in the open market when possible. We consider this proposal undesirable. The funds under the Local Loans Account are limited, and should be primarily used to assist bodies whose credit is inadequate for independent borrowing.

The control of the Government of India in respect to such loans should not be relaxed.

But a specific restriction in the Local Emergencies Loan Act is unnecessary.

Undesirable that municipalities, able to borrow in the open market, should receive loans from Government.

Local Governments should not have power to guarantee the open market loans of local bodies.

117. It has also been suggested that Local Governments should have power to guarantee the open market loans of local bodies, in order to enable them to obtain more favourable terms ; but, in our opinion, the considerations which tell against outside borrowing by Provincial Governments apply equally to their guaranteeing the loans of others. There is the further objection that, if this grew into a common practice, the guaranteed loans of local bodies, which would still, necessarily, be issued at higher terms, would compete injuriously with those of the Government of India even if floated subsequently to these, since investors desirous of a higher rate of well-secured interest, and knowing that a guaranteed local loan would shortly be in the market, would prefer to await the latter.

With a few exceptions, based, in so far as reasons have been given, on the desirability of the continuance, in present circumstances, of a fairly close financial control by the Government of India, the Provincial evidence on this point is in favour of an increase of the powers of Provincial Governments in respect of the creation of new appointments and the enhancement of the pay of existing posts.† The Financial Secretary to the Government of India thinks, too, that Provincial Governments should receive the same powers as the Government of India now possess in these respects, provided the cost falls wholly or partly upon Provincial revenues. We are entirely in favour of this suggestion. When a proposal has to be referred to the Government of India or the Secretary of State by reason of salary or other financial restrictions, it is inevitable that it should also be scrutinized, in some measure, with reference to departmental administrative considerations. Accordingly, reduction in the number of such references, which will in itself be considerable under the above suggestion, will also give larger administrative freedom to the Provincial Governments.

121. It seems to us, however, that the distinction hitherto drawn between the creation of a new appointment, and addition to the emoluments of one already existing, is hardly necessary, and that where the Government of India or a Local Government have power to raise a salary to Rs. 750 a month, it would simplify matters, especially in regard to questions of grade distribution, if they could at once make a new appointment up to this limit.

We would further suggest that the limit be raised to Rs. 800 a month, as this would cover the highest grade of Deputy Collectors and Subordinate Judges save, as regards Subordinate Judges, in the case of Bengal.*

122. Further, in the event of more complete separation of Imperial from Provincial finance, accompanied by larger financial control on the part of local Legislative Councils, we think that the ratio decidendi should be the character of the service to which an officer belongs, rather than the amount of his salary, and that Local Governments should have a free hand in regard to their 'Provincial' and 'Subordinate' services, subject only to control by the Government of India in respect of:—

(a) Posts usually filled by an 'Imperial' Service which are made over to 'Provincial' men.

(b) The appointment of persons other than natives of India to 'Provincial' and 'Subordinate' services.†

123. The Government of India have to refer to the Secretary of State, where the rules so prescribe, in the matter of salary and local allowances; but they have full powers in regard to the grant of office, house rent, conveyance and fixed monthly travelling allowances.‡ But, in the case of the Local Governments, the restriction as to raising of pay is based on the total fixed monthly emoluments of an officer, and not on salary and local allowances only. We think that the Local Governments should have full powers in respect of monthly office and other allowances of the above descriptions, subject to such general principles as the Government of India may lay down.

124. Local allowances are given, in addition to salary, for duties which do not properly belong to an officer's appointment, or in consideration of special circumstances, such as the unhealthiness or expensiveness of a locality or duty, or the specially arduous nature of the work. It has been suggested that Local Governments should have a free hand in regard to the grant of local allowances. Their powers in regard to the grant of such allowances will, in any case, be materially enhanced by our proposal

Desirability of enhancing the existing powers of the Government of India, and consequently of Local Governments.

In the event of a more complete separation of Imperial and Provincial finance, and larger Provincial control by Legislative Councils, the Local Governments should have very large latitude in respect of 'Provincial' and 'Subordinate' services.

Local Governments should have the same full powers as the Government of India in respect of office, house rent, conveyance, and fixed monthly travelling allowances.

* Mr. Dutt concurs in these proposals so far as they relate to the Government of India; but in regard to the Provincial Governments, whom he considers more amenable to personal influence and pressure, he would not go beyond a limit of Rs. 500 a month both in respect to new appointments and the enhancement of pay of existing posts.

† Mr. Dutt would not increase the powers of Provincial Governments to the extent proposed in this paragraph. He thinks that control by the Government of India provides a wholesome and necessary check on hasty changes.

‡ They can also sanction local allowances to Civil Surgeons for charge of medical attendance of railway employés (Art. 277, C. A. C.)

in respect to the salary restriction, since they will now be able to give an officer such an allowance provided that his salary and local allowance will not thereby be raised above Rs. 800 a month, whereas they now have to refer to the Government of India in every case in which a total limit of Rs. 250 is exceeded. Most of the references now required will thus be eliminated.

Indian Governments should have discretion in granting local allowances for the unhealthiness or expense of exceptional localities. Otherwise a local allowance should be treated as an addition to salary.

We think further, that local allowances which are given in consideration of the unhealthiness or expense of exceptional localities should not be counted as an addition to salary for the purpose of the salary rules, either in the case of the Government of India or of the Provincial Governments. Allowances proposed in respect of increased or arduous work or responsibility are, however, essentially of the nature of salary, and any increase of emoluments in this direction requires to be carefully scrutinized and should remain subject to the general salary rule. The grade system, which applies to most of the Indian Services, presupposes an average remuneration based upon an average amount of work, and a certain amount of inequality in the work falling on particular officers is inevitable, and should not be made a ground for special concessions.

Relaxation of rules which prevent Local Governments from abolishing, or reducing, posts carrying more than Rs. 250 a month, and from creating, abolishing or reducing the pay of, any class or grade of officers.

125. (iii.) Provincial Governments may not abolish, or reduce the emoluments of, any appointment the pay and allowances of which exceed Rs. 250 a month. This rule was introduced in connexion with the settlements of 1877.

Generally, such abolitions or reductions are counter-vailing parts of an expenditure scheme which may require sanction by reason of its magnitude, or of its containing other appointments to be created or enhanced. Apart from this, we agree, in so far as 'Provincial' or 'Subordinate' services are concerned, with those Local Governments which do not consider the present restriction necessary. But appointments pertaining to 'Imperial' services stand on a different footing, and we consider that any abolition, or alteration in the character, of these should require the approval of the Government of India.*

Unnecessary to maintain the rule which precludes action by a Local Government which may lead to increase in the emoluments of officers serving under the Government of India in the same Province.

127. (v.) No addition may be made to the pay and allowances of any individual officer, or class of officers, that may lead to increase in the emoluments of any public servants, doing duty in the same Province, whose pay is charged to Imperial revenues. This likewise dates from Lord Mayo's settlements, when only a few heads of service, and those not the most important, had been transferred to the Local Governments. In present circumstances, however, civil officers paid by the Government of India, who are in direct contact with the Provincial departments are relatively few in number, and are confined to distinct services, such as Accounts, Post Office, and Salt. We agree, therefore, with the suggestion that has been made for the abolition of this rule.

Art. 277 (4).

128. (vi.) The Government of India reserve the right to forbid alterations in the rates of pay and allowances which a Local Government may desire to effect in its establishments, but which, in their opinion, would produce inconvenience in other Provinces.

Thus the pay of hospital assistants, which varies from Rs. 25 to Rs. 70 a month, has hitherto been kept uniform throughout India, any difference which may arise from their being stationed in unhealthy or expensive localities being met by local allowances; and there is a similar uniform grading in respect of Assistant Surgeons. Proposals made by a Local Government as to the grading of such officers as Deputy Collectors and tahsildars are also, it is understood, checked by the application of a more or less uniform scale as regards the pay of grades and their relative distribution. The arguments adduced in favour of such attempts at uniformity are that men belonging to such services have many interests in common, that they are often recruited at the same educational centres, and that additions to their remuneration in one Province would inevitably provoke claims elsewhere. The Financial Secretary to the Government of India admits, however, that such uniformity is not necessary in the case of ordinary 'Subordinate' establishments, and in our opinion the uniformity argument is fairly applicable only to 'Imperial' services. As regards 'Provincial' and 'Subordinate' establishments, we think it desirable to recognize the fact that the rates of pay must depend upon varying Provincial circumstances, such as the cost of living, and difficulty or ease in obtaining trustworthy and capable men, while the recruitment of officers of this description is intended, as far as possible, to be made within the Province. The rates of pay of men bearing the same general designation may therefore rightly vary in different Provinces, and we consider that the special restriction now under discussion should not be applied except in the case of 'Imperial' services. Similarly, we do not think it necessary that rules for the recruitment of 'Provincial' services should, as is now the case, require the sanction of the Government of India. The functions of the latter Government should not go beyond laying down a few general principles as to eligibility for appointment, etc., on which detailed Provincial rules would be based.*

129. (vii.) A Local Government may not, generally speaking, make a revision of establishments on its own authority involving additional expenditure of more than Rs. 25,000 a year, even though the scheme may not contain any appointment of sufficient magnitude to require

It is not necessary to require uniformity of pay in 'Provincial' and 'Subordinate' services of the same general character, but working under different Local Governments. Nor need rules for the recruitment of 'Provincial' services require the specific sanction of the Government of India.

Local Governments should have the same power as the Government of India in respect to the revision of minor establishments.

* Sir F. Lely and Mr. Dutt concur in this paragraph only so far as the non-gazetted services are concerned. The 'Provincial' services furnish the highest field of employment under Government to which the bulk of the educated classes in India can look, and they think, therefore, that a certain amount of co-ordination as between the different Provinces is as desirable here as in the case of 'Imperial' services.

specific sanction. The same rule applied to the Government of India till lately, but their limit has now been extended to Rs. 50,000.

We agree with the proposals made to place Provincial Governments on the same footing as the Government of India in regard to establishments debited to wholly Provincial, or to shared, heads of revenue.

Vol. II.,
App.,
p. 326,
Vol. V.,
App. IV.,
p. 225.

In the event of local Legislatures obtaining control over Provincial finances, this limit might be further raised, and the control of the Government of India and the Secretary of State should then be merely with reference to the ability of the Province to bear the charge contemplated.

130. It has been suggested, indeed, that this general money limit might be altogether, or largely, waived, on the ground that the Local Governments must be the best judges of their requirements in the matter of the lower paid establishments; that the Government of India will retain their general budget control; and that schemes containing appointments of importance will fall under the salary restrictions discussed above. We think, however, that even if Provincial finance were placed under the control of local Legislative Councils, there might be a tendency, which would require outside check, to considerable outlay in respect of 'Provincial' and 'Subordinate' establishments, and it is in establishments on relatively low pay that the largest aggregate expenditure arises. On the other hand, it is desirable to bring home to local Legislatures their financial responsibility, and in the event of their obtaining control over Provincial finance, we think that the limit of Rs. 50,000 which we have proposed might be further raised.* The control of the Government of India and the Secretary of State should then, moreover, be limited to considerations as to the ability of the Province to bear increased recurring charges out of its own resources, not merely at the time proposals were sent up, but in subsequent years. The most practical way of securing such outside control, and of ensuring that it is not overlooked, is, however, to prescribe a specific money limit in regard to total expenditure on establishment schemes.

Even in present circumstances, minute criticism of administrative details, in cases which Local Governments have to submit under financial rules, is undesirable.

131. We think it desirable, in this connexion, to deprecate, even in present circumstances, the tendency to subject cases, which Local Governments have to refer to the Government of India under financial rules, to minute criticism on points of detail in the administrative department concerned. A striking instance of this was put before us by the Bombay Government, who stated that proposals for the reorganization of their subordinate forest establishments, submitted to the Government of India in 1890, were still under discussion, owing to criticism of this character, and to the preparation, in the offices of the Supreme Government, of alternative proposals which the Provincial Government was not able to accept. The Bombay Government has, no doubt, itself been responsible for a great part of the delay which has taken place; but we think it very undesirable that important proposals of this character should be blocked by discussion of details for which the Local Government should be primarily responsible.

Vol. VIII.,
App. II.,
pp. 271-2.

Manner in which the rule as to minor establishment charges should be applied.

132. In testing expenditure with reference to a general money limit, what is looked to is not merely the outlay which may be immediately contemplated, but the total charges which the scheme proposed will involve. It has been suggested that Local Governments should be competent to deal with "compartments" of such schemes separately,

* Mr. Hichens would, in this case, give full power to the Local Governments.

i.e., if the cost of the immediate application of a scheme to, perhaps, one or two districts would not exceed Rs. 50,000, or whatever the money limit laid down may be, reference to the Government of India should not be required by reason of the possibility of subsequent expenditure in other parts of the Province. In our opinion, the question to be asked in such a case is whether expenditure in one or two districts could stop there, or whether it must inevitably lead to outlay elsewhere. In the former case, the expenditure immediately contemplated should be considered by itself; in the latter, the financial result of its general application must be taken into account. There is no evidence that the rule is at present otherwise applied.

133. (viii.) Local Governments have full power to make temporary appointments and deputations if the emoluments of the officers concerned do not exceed Rs. 250 a month, but otherwise up to six months only. The power of the Government of India in this respect extended till lately up to 12 months, but has now been increased to 24 in the case of officers drawing more than Rs. 500 a month, while below that limit they have full powers.

We think that Provincial Governments might be given larger latitude in this respect, and we consider that they should enjoy the same powers as the Government of India in regard to all deputations and temporary appointments the cost of which falls wholly or partly upon them. But, as in the case of the salary rules, we think that, if larger financial powers should be given to Provincial Legislative Councils, the ratio decidendi should be the character of the service to which an officer belongs, and that a Provincial Government should have a free hand in respect of the deputation or temporary appointment of officers of 'Provincial' or 'Subordinate' services, while remaining subject to some restriction in the case of 'Imperial' officers. Where full powers are given in respect of permanent appointments, the same powers must obviously be given in respect to deputations or temporary appointments of the same character.

Local Governments should have the same power as the Government of India in respect to temporary appointments and deputations, the cost of which falls on them.

If larger financial control is given to Provincial Legislatures, the Local Governments' powers should be further enhanced.

134. (ix.) While the Government of India have full powers in respect of the remuneration of officers on deputation, save in the case of an officer drawing more than Rs. 50,000 a year, the power of a Local Government in regard to the grant of deputation allowance is restricted to one-fifth of salary or Rs. 300 a month (Rs. 10 a day) whichever is less.

We understand that the Government of India also apply these general restrictions to their own officers unless special circumstances render them undesirable. They also receive references from the Provincial Governments in regard to men on small pay, where latitude is frequently sought, and usually given, for an extension of the one-fifth of salary rule. The Financial Secretary to the Government of India suggests that, to avoid petty references of this description, Local Governments might have the power of giving deputation allowance up to 50 per cent. of an officer's salary or Rs. 300 a month, whichever is less. We think this open to objection, as the maximum one-half limit would tend to become the amount usually given. We prefer, therefore, to maintain the existing rule, which we have no reason to consider generally inadequate, but to allow Local Governments discretionary power to depart from it, in exceptional cases, in regard to officers the cost of whose deputation they meet. They should, that is, have the same powers as the Government of India now enjoy.

The present rule as to the salary of officers on deputation should be maintained, but Local Governments should have special discretion to relax it.

The same remarks apply generally in regard to the salary of officers who hold special temporary appointments.

135 (x.) As regards the remuneration of a Government officer who holds a temporary appointment, the general principle, laid down by the Government of India in 1902, is that this should not ordinarily exceed the salary which would be grantable to him if placed on deputation; but in the case of officers who would draw less than Rs. 250 a month, Local Governments have discretion to relax this rule. Otherwise, the grant of a temporary salary in excess of what would be admissible under the deputation allowance rule requires the sanction of the Government of India.

Letter No. 57, H.D. of 31st March, 1902.

Some desire has been expressed for the relaxation of this rule. The Financial Secretary to the Government of India proposes, and we agree with him, that, where temporary appointments are in reality additions, for a limited period, to a permanently sanctioned scale, the pay of an officer should be regulated, under the acting allowance rules, as if he were officiating in one of the regular appointments. In regard to posts which are sui generis, we think the existing limitation of pay sound, but we consider that Local Governments might have power to make exceptions in special cases.

Vol. VIII., App. II., p. 256. 44869.

Where a temporary appointment is held by a man not previously in Government service, Local Governments have full discretion as to his remuneration, subject to the rule which governs the duration of the appointment.

Restrictions in regard to grant of honoraria to Government officers.

136. (xi.) (a) Any recurring fee, reward or honorarium paid to a Government officer from general revenues or local funds administered by Government, for special work done outside his ordinary duties, is reckoned a portion of salary, and is governed by the salary rules; but the grant of non-recurring fees may be sanctioned as follows:—

C. S. R., Art. 72 (b).

By the head of a department up to Rs. 100.

By a Local Government up to Rs. 500.

By the Government of India up to Rs. 1,000.

Above that limit, the sanction of the Secretary of State is necessary.

(b) A Government officer may, in certain conditions, accept a fee from a private person or firm, or a public body whose funds are not administered by Government, subject to the same restrictions as to sanction specified in clause (a), save that both the Government of India and the Local Governments have full powers to permit the acceptance of fees for conducting university examinations.

Ibid., Art. 74.

Various Local Governments desire to have larger latitude in these respects, and Mr. Meston suggests that the powers of the Local Governments and the Government of India should be doubled as regards money limit, and that those of the heads of Provincial departments should be raised to Rs. 250.

Vol. II., App. p. 327, Vol. V., App. IV., p. 226. 44869.

Our proposals in respect thereto.

137. We consider that the acceptance of the fees, etc., referred to in Article 72, Civil Service Regulations, should be subject to close scrutiny. Nothing should be done to obscure the principle that the Government is entitled to the full time and capacity of its officers in respect of work done for the State, and that no officer can claim extra fees for such work. The Government is also entitled to use the services of its officers, without extra remuneration, for the purpose of assisting Native States or local bodies. In the exceptional cases in which the additional work thus done by a Government officer is so arduous or peculiar as to merit some special honorarium, the Local Government might, we think, have discretion as to the amount, subject to the principle that the fee should bear a reasonable relation to the additional cost which would have been involved had the Government servant concerned been placed upon special duty, as a whole time officer, for the purpose of carrying out the work in question.

Vol. III., App. II., p. 179, Vol. IV., App. II., p. 205, Vol. V., App. IV., p. 226, Vol. VII., App. III., p. 171, 44869.

C.S.R.,
Art. 74.

As regards the undertaking by Government servants of work in which Government is not primarily concerned as such, e.g., an examinership in a university, or private consultation work by a scientific expert, Local Governments may reasonably be allowed to regulate the acceptance of fees, provided they are satisfied that the undertaking of such work by an officer does not interfere with the efficient discharge of his regular duties, or is not inexpedient for other reasons.

33 Geo.
52, sec. 64.

Fees to medical officers for private practice must, however, continue to be treated as sui generis, as in Article 74 (d) Civil Service Regulations. Power to engage in private practice is an element in the general conditions of the service of medical officers in India, which has been recognized by Act of Parliament.

138. We do not consider it desirable to give heads of Provincial departments larger power to sanction fees for work done at the desire of, or for, Government, in view of the fact that such honoraria should be exceptional and jealously scrutinized, but in regard to the class of cases referred to in clause (b) of paragraph 136, they might be allowed to deal with cases up to Rs. 250.

139. (XII.) The local excise duties on spirits and drugs may not be altered, without the sanction of the Government of India, in any case in which such alteration is likely to affect the excise arrangements of an adjacent Province; and that sanction must be specially obtained to any alteration in the rates of duty in a district which borders on another Province.

Proposed relaxation of a restriction in regard to the imposition of local excise duties by a Provincial Government.

We think that it would suffice, hereafter, for a Provincial Government which contemplates such alterations to refer to the neighbouring Province concerned, and that reference to the Government of India need not be made unless the two Local Governments are unable to agree.

C. A. C.,
Art. 283.

140. (XIII.) The rates of discount upon the retail of stamps and court fees labels cannot be altered without the sanction of the Government of India.

The present rule in regard to discount on sale of stamps, etc., should be maintained.

It is, of course, desirable that the policy in regard to stamps should be as uniform as possible, and we have no alteration to propose.

Ibid.

141. (XIV.) No item hitherto credited to general revenues, Imperial or Provincial, may be alienated to form an asset of any local or special fund.

So also the rule precluding transfers of general revenues to local or special funds without the sanction of the Government of India; but in certain cases such sanction may be of a general character.

Vol. VIII.,

p. 265,
Vol. VII.,

Reference has been made by the Governments of Bombay and the United Provinces to the desirability of avoiding applications to the Government of India in regard to assignment of petty items of revenue, such as the grant of fines imposed for ill-treatment of animals to societies established for the prevention of such ill-treatment, or the transfer of certain fees or fines to a university or a cantonment. We think that the existing restriction is sound, but that cases of a recurring nature in which small items of revenue may legitimately be assigned to outside bodies, can, and should, be covered by general exceptions which would apply to all cases of the kind.

Other restrictions in regard to which we propose no alteration, or which will be discussed separately.

142. (xv.) Local Governments may not, without reference to the Government of India, diminish services rendered by Provincial to Imperial departments, or increase services rendered by Imperial departments to Provincial. C.A.C., Art. 283.

(xvi.) No line of through communication may be abandoned or allowed to fall out of repair. Ibid.

We have no recommendations to make in regard to these two restrictions.

143. There are also restrictions on the power of the Provincial Governments to diminish future receipts from land revenue by the alienation of land, or by its grant upon specially favourable terms. These, however, will be dealt with in connexion with land revenue. Chap. V.

Similarly, certain specific restrictions, relating to public works expenditure, will be dealt with in the separate chapter on that Department. Chap. IV.

Powers of Provincial Governments in respect to Imperial expenditure.

Power of Local Governments in respect to expenditure which is wholly Imperial.

144. So far we have been dealing, mainly, with the powers of Provincial Governments, possessing quasi-permanent settlements, in respect of expenditure which falls wholly or partly on their revenues. Our recommendations also apply to Baluchistan in so far as they are applicable to expenditure falling within a more limited settlement which has been made with that Province. But in the case of establishments controlled by Provincial Governments, but paid wholly from Imperial revenues, as, for instance, Customs, Opium and Salt in Bombay and Bengal, the powers of the Local Governments are considerably smaller. Thus:—

(a) Generally, a revision of establishment, involving additional expense, must be met by an equivalent reduction in the same department, or in some other department charged to the same major head of account; provided that such re-adjustment of charges does not extend to the creation, abolition or modification of appointments the emoluments of which exceed Rs. 250 a month, or to dealings with a class or grade of officers. C.A.C., Art. 278.

(b) Nevertheless, non-gazetted establishments may be increased without such equivalent reduction—subject to budget provision being available under the same head of charge, from savings other than gazetted officers' salaries—to an aggregate extent not exceeding Rs. 3,000 in any one year; but no new appointment in excess of Rs. 50 a month may be created, nor the emoluments of any existing appointment raised beyond Rs. 50, without reference to the Government of India.

Provincial Governments can also sanction fixed recurring charges of a contingent character up to a limit of Rs. 200 a year in each case.

Reason for maintaining closer control by the Government of India in this respect.

145. Provincial Governments must necessarily be under closer control in dealing with wholly Imperial expenditure than when the financial responsibility rests wholly or partly with them. This does not involve, as has been sometimes implied, any undue want of confidence in the Provincial authorities. It is only reasonable that the Government of India, who have to provide the money, should decide how it can be most profitably expended, having regard not merely to the circumstances of any one Province, but to the demands on their purse from other parts of the country. They may fully realize the desirability of expenditure proposed by a Local Government, but may be obliged to postpone it for reasons which do not come within that Government's ken. It seems, however, desirable, in order to facilitate business and avoid petty references, to extend the present restricted powers of Provincial Governments. The Bombay Government suggests that its powers should extend to Rs. 250 a month in regard to individual appointments, and to a total expenditure limit of Rs. 25,000, subject to the existence of budget provision.

Vol. VIII.,
App. II.,
p. 235.

44868.

Art.278(b).

The Financial Secretary to the Government of India has suggested that, for the major Provinces, the limit under clause (a) above might be raised from Rs. 250 to Rs. 500 a month; that the limit of Rs. 50 a month in clause (b) might be raised to Rs. 100; and that quarterly statements which have now to be submitted by the Provincial Governments, showing the expenditure they have incurred on their own authority on Imperial establishments, should be discontinued.

146. It is an essential condition in regard to the exercise of these powers, that there should be budget provision available at the time new expenditure is incurred. Subject to this, we think that the total limit within which additional expenditure can be incurred in any one year may be raised from Rs. 3,000 to Rs. 6,000, and that, within this general limit, the Local Governments should have power, in respect to any individual appointment, up to Rs. 250 a month. A Rs. 100 limit does not seem particularly convenient, while Rs. 250 would cover nearly all cases of non-gazetted officers. We agree with Mr. Meston's proposal in respect to clause (a).

Some enhancement of their powers might, however, be allowed to Provincial Governments.

The same powers should be given to the Administrations of the North-West Frontier Province and Baluchistan, in regard to such Imperial expenditure as they administer.

147. We consider, however, that the Frontier Province should be placed on the same footing as Baluchistan, by the grant of a quasi-provincial settlement which would give the Chief Commissioner a greater interest in developing the resources of the Province, and in administering it economically. Within this settlement he could exercise the same powers as the Governments of the major Provinces, and this would save a number of references which are now necessary. Although the Province is peculiar in that the ordinary Provincial expenditure is in excess of the revenue raised within it, and the settlement would therefore have to be of a special character, a similar difficulty has been surmounted in Baluchistan where the revenue is smaller. It is now more than seven years since the Frontier Province was first formed, and the argument that the conditions there are not sufficiently normal to enable a settlement to be made, can no longer be held applicable.

The Frontier Province should receive a special settlement of the same character as that made with Baluchistan.

Powers of Local Governments in regard to temporary appointments and deputations chargeable to Imperial revenues.

148. As regards the sanction by Local Governments of temporary appointments and deputations chargeable to Imperial revenues, the present limit is Rs. 50 a month in each case. The Financial Secretary to the Government of India has suggested that this might be raised to Rs. 100 up to a period of 12 months, and subject to the existence of budget provision. Here again we think that Rs. 250 would be a more convenient individual limit.

The Government of India must, of course, always be referred to if expenditure cannot be met by direct budget provision, by savings, or by reappropriation from some other head.

The Civil Service Regulations.

Scope of the Civil Service Regulations.

149. The principal detailed restrictions upon expenditure by the Provincial Governments, or by the Government of India themselves, on matters connected with Government establishments are contained in the Civil Service Regulations, a volume of 1,163 Articles extending over nearly 300 pages, with a supplementary volume of Appendices. This Code deals with matters affecting the pay and allowances, leave, pensions and travelling allowances of the various Civil Services, and also with the transfer of Government officers to 'foreign service,' i.e., service not directly under Government, as when an officer is lent to a Native State, to a Government outside India, to a local body such as a district board or municipality, for work connected with Courts of Wards, or, occasionally, to a private employer.

The Civil Service Regulations, as a consolidated code dealing with all the matters above referred to, date from 1889; but separate codes, which dealt respectively with pensions, leave, and acting and travelling allowances had previously been issued.

Convenience of such a code.

150. The Civil Service Regulations, as they now stand, have been objected to* as containing an enormous mass of detailed instructions which are a fruitful source of unnecessary reference. It must be remembered, however, that the code embodies the practical experience of many years, in the shape of rulings on a variety of questions which have come up to the Government of India and the Secretary of State, and the decisions on which govern subsequent cognate cases. It is, in fact, the crystallization of an enormous mass of departmental case law, which has been placed in a form in which it is available for reference to any officer of Government. In the absence of such a code, previous decisions and precedents would remain arcana of the Secretariats, and there would be constant references from local authorities and Local Governments on matters upon which a definite policy had already been laid down. In fact, if the existing code were swept away to-morrow, the mass of references and rulings which would be required under the new conditions would, of necessity, condense in course of time into a new code. In so far, therefore, as guidance and control is necessary for district officers, heads of departments, Local Governments, and the Government of India themselves, the codification of the principles and rulings upon which such control is exercised must be held to be a labour-saving appliance.

151. As regards the necessity of such control, there is no subject on which Governments, consisting mainly of permanent Civil Servants, require greater check than in matters which relate to pecuniary concessions to Government officers. We have already accepted the necessity for check of this description in matters directly bearing upon salaries and the creation of appointments, the provisions relating to which are embodied in the Civil Service Regulations and form a very important portion thereof, while such matters as the grant of acting allowances, leave concessions, and travelling allowances, bear directly upon the pecuniary advantages of service under Government. Pensions, again, are not only deferred pay, but impose a burden on the State which does not accrue immediately, and which is collectively largest in the case of establishments on low pay. Pension concessions may thus involve expenditure which is relatively small and little appreciated at the outset, but which may attain formidable proportions hereafter, either in itself or by reason of supplementary concessions involved. Again, while extravagance in the shape of actual establishments may be remedied by retrenchments, it is practically impossible to reduce pensions once granted, or the pensionary expectations which have been held out to officers already in Government service. To this extent, therefore, pensions, like loans, require special scrutiny, to obviate the danger of throwing undue burdens upon a subsequent generation, and the control exercised by the Secretary of State in regard thereto is specially strict. Save in the case of pensions not exceeding Rs. 10 a month, or gratuities which fall within an equivalent capital value—in regard to which the Government of India have power to allow concessions not strictly admissible by rule—no pension or gratuity can be granted outside the rules laid down in the Civil Service Regulations, without the Secretary of State's specific sanction.

C.S.R.,
Art. 924.

* Generally speaking, too, any important alteration of the Civil Service Regulations in other respects requires the Secretary of State's concurrence, and in no case can the Local Governments or the Government of India exceed the powers vested in them by the code.

152. On the other hand, the existing code had its beginnings at a period when the Provincial Governments had practically no independent financial powers, while up to 1904 they had only five-year leases of their revenues, and it was necessary for the Government of India to scrutinize carefully proposals involving permanent additions to establishment charges, which would have to be taken into account in framing the terms of the succeeding settlement. The position in this respect has, however, been materially changed by the introduction of the present quasi-permanent settlements, under which no such permanent additions to expenditure will enable the Local Governments to claim larger assignments of revenue hereafter; and this fact justifies the grant to them of larger powers than they have hitherto been allowed to exercise. We have accepted this view in the case of the provisions of the Civil Service Regulations relating to salaries, etc., which have already been discussed.

Necessity for special control over the Indian Governments, in matters relating to pecuniary concessions to Government officers.

Circumstances which now render it possible, however, to grant Local Governments larger powers.

* Des. from the S. of S., No. 131, of 20th June, 1889. Des. from the G. of I., No. 279, of 7th Sept. 1889. Des. from the S. of S., No. 250, of 7th Nov., 1889. Res. of the G. of I., No. 916, of 4th March, 1893.

Matters in which it is essential that the Government of India should prescribe general principles, etc.

153. As regards the rest of the Regulations, we consider it essential that the Government of India should continue to lay down general principles, and methods of calculation, in such matters, for example, as :—

(i.) The manner in which acting allowances shall be calculated. Under the conditions of Indian service, a large number of officers are constantly officiating for others who are absent on leave or other duty, and it is desirable that there should be a uniform procedure regulating the salaries of officiating officers.

(ii.) 'Joining time,' i.e., the limit of time to be allowed to an officer who is transferred from one place to another, to enable him to wind up his affairs in his old station, and reach and settle down in his new one.

(iii.) The extent to which leave of various descriptions may be earned, and the proportion of leave allowances to active emoluments.

(iv.) The circumstances under which pension is claimable, the amount of service requisite to enable an officer to earn an ordinary or invalid pension (or a compensation pension when an appointment is abolished), and the ratio of such pension to the officer's active pay.

Similarly, as to the circumstances in which a lump gratuity may be given where regular pension has not been earned, and the amount of such gratuity.

The main general principle is that travelling allowance is not intended to be a source of profit, nor, on the other hand, to be so inadequate as to put an officer to material loss ; but a mere instruction to this effect would inevitably provoke endless discussion and references as to the expenses which may be considered essential to the journey or tour, and not a matter of what may be termed private indulgence by the officer concerned, e.g., the class by which he may travel at the expense of the State by rail or steamer, or the amount of baggage and servants he may take with him. It is also necessary to prescribe the principle, generally applicable to the Civil Services,* that, in fixing an officer's travelling allowance, the State looks only to his own movements, and that if he takes his wife or family with him, he must do this at his own expense. The best method of applying principles of this sort in practice, has been found to be the prescription of certain distance scales of travelling allowance, which vary according to the position of the officer who travels, and are based upon the average additional expense which such an officer would legitimately incur in a journey made on State service. In some cases, too, it has been found convenient to substitute daily or monthly rates of fixed travelling allowance, or to give a monthly conveyance or horse allowance to officers who have a large and constant amount of inspection work within a small area.

(vi.) The conditions under which officers should be transferred to 'foreign service,' the emoluments which they may fittingly receive, and the extent to which the outside employer should contribute to the officer's eventual pension.

154. It would in any case be necessary to have a general code, embodying principles and rulings on these and other similar points, in the case of 'Imperial' officers, who, though serving in different Provinces, belong to a single service, and in regard to the general personnel of establishments working directly under the Government of India. It may be urged, however, that, so long as these embody such general principles as it may be found desirable to enact for the country as a whole, Provincial Governments should have their own codes in regard to 'Provincial' and 'Subordinate' establishments serving under them. There might be something to be said for this were we dealing with a tabula rasa; but a single code providing for these matters has been long in force, and its general conditions are well understood; while, though the Local Governments consider various articles of the present code to be unduly restrictive, no strong desire has been expressed in the direction of getting rid of it as a whole. The Provincial codes would, moreover, have to be safeguarded by a variety of general restrictions, for the alteration or relaxation of which application would have to be made to the Government of India and the Secretary of State, and the orders and rulings on these points would, necessarily, still be of a generally uniform character.

We desire therefore to maintain a code of Civil Service Regulations for India as a whole, but we consider that the existing code will require material modification with reference to the considerations discussed below.*

155. (i.) A number of the rules in the Civil Service Regulations seem to us unduly minute, and occasionally far from clear, e.g., those relating to the regulation of progressive salaries, and a number of the leave rules, the travelling allowance regulations, and the 'foreign service' provisions.

It is desirable to maintain a general code of Civil Service Regulations for India.

A number of the rules of the existing code are, however, unduly rigid and complicated.

(ii.) The general rules laid down often require special relaxation to meet particular cases, but in a number of such instances the discretionary power is vested in the Government of India, to whom application has to be made by the Local Governments. Speaking generally, we consider that where such dispensing power is given to the Government of India, and is not now possessed, or is possessed only in smaller measure, by the Provincial Governments, the latter should have the same power as the Government of India in respect of officers serving under them. In the event of a Local Government exercising its dispensing powers in any matter so frequently, and in cases so nearly normal, as to give reasonable ground for the belief that a new practice was gradually being established as opposed to a special and occasional relaxation of existing rules, the Accountant-General should be entitled to require a reference to the Government of India.

(iii.) The bulk of the references now required under the Civil Service Regulations accrue, however, not as between Provincial Governments and the Government of India, but as between the Local Governments and their own officers, who have to refer to the Provincial Government in a large number of cases in which the opinion of the local officer or departmental head must generally prevail. This arises from the fact that powers vested by the Civil Service Regulations in a Local Government cannot be delegated by it to a subordinate authority without the express sanction of the Government of India, a restriction which has been made the subject of complaint. We understand that, of late years, a certain amount of delegation to subordinate authorities in such matters as the grant of petty pensions, subsidiary points arising under the travelling allowance rules, etc., has been allowed by the Government of India upon the application of Provincial Governments; but the references in such cases have been on specific articles of the code, and they were dealt with separately for various Provinces and not upon any general or uniform principle. Occasionally, too, such requests for power to delegate were negatived, on what appear, in present circumstances, inadequate grounds, and the grant of larger powers to subordinate authorities in a variety of matters is now asked for by various Local Governments and witnesses. It appears to us that in such cases as the grant of pensions, acting or charge allowances, &c., under the existing rules, a head of a department or other subordinate authority should usually have powers in respect to officers whom he can himself appoint; and a delegation of this character would cover the bulk of the subordinate non-gazetted establishments. Travelling allowance charges, again, should be passed, within ordinary rules, by the officer under whose orders a journey in the public service can be legitimately undertaken. We would also delegate to heads of departments, &c., in regard to officers whom they can appoint, a large part of the dispensary powers which are now recognized as legitimate in a variety of cases, but which the code vests in the Local Governments, or, in some cases, in the Government of India.

Recent relaxations of restrictions by the Government of India are insufficient to remedy the excessive centralization of the present code.

156. Since, consequent on our appointment, attention has been drawn to the unduly restrictive character of a number of the existing sections of the Civil Service Regulations, the Government of India have altered some of these in the directions indicated above, but their action is, in our opinion, far from sufficient to remedy the excessive centralization of the existing code.

Corrigenda to C.S.R. of 9th and 29th June; 18th July; 15th and 19th Aug.; and 9th, 23rd and 30th Sept. 1908.

Under these recent orders, Local Governments have now been substituted for the Government of India as the authority which may relax the present rule limiting the emoluments of officers without substantive appointment, officiating in such an appointment, to one-half of the minimum pay thereof in the case of posts on Rs. 100 and upwards. They have been given full power to extend, in special circumstances, the joining time ordinarily admissible. They have also been empowered to grant the special pensions admissible, under Articles 475 and 642-3, to the chief officers of various departments serving under them, and to give sanction to the counting of his previous service for leave by an officer who re-enters the public service after having quitted it.* The reference required to the Government of India by Articles 434-5 in case of the discharge of an officer in consequence of a change in the nature of his duties, or of the abolition of one of two appointments held by him, has also been done away with, save where, in the latter case, it is proposed to give an immediate pension in respect of the abolished post.

- In such matters, again, as the regulation of the present or future salaries of officers who have been reduced for misconduct, relaxation of the rule which forfeits an appointment where joining time has been exceeded for more than a week, departure from the strict rule as to subsistence allowance during a period of suspension, and permission to an officer to appear for departmental examination, powers have now been delegated to the authority who made the original reduction, transfer, suspension, etc.‡

157. We offer the following general remarks in regard to certain portions of the regulations :—

- (i.) Leave Rules.—We consider these rules, as a whole, unnecessarily complicated and rigid, e.g., Articles 232-6, which usually prevent ordinary leave of various descriptions being combined ; and the Article which forbids the grant of furlough for 18 months after privilege leave for more than six weeks has been taken, and prevents the grant of furlough for three years after a previous furlough.
- Art. 308.

- Such restrictions were intended to diminish transfers by preventing officers from taking leave at too frequent intervals, but, on the other hand, they debar an officer from taking leave when it might be most convenient to the Government that he should do so, e.g., when he has completed some special duty and there is a man already acting for him in his ordinary post. The Comptroller-General and the Financial Secretary to the Government of India are in favour of the suggestion that an officer should have what might be termed a 'leave ledger' account with the Government of India, to which should be credited the leave earned under the general rules ; and that he might be allowed to draw upon such credit at any time at which it was convenient to the Government to spare his services. We too are in favour of this plan, as simplifying references and tending to diminish transfers. It is also a question for possible consideration whether periods of furlough leave, which are usually on half pay, might not be commutable, with advantage to the public service, to shorter leave of absence on higher remuneration.

‡ In respect of Art. 285, the delegation has been to the immediate superior of the officer concerned.

(ii.) Pensions.—The general rule should be that in the case of gazetted as well as non-gazetted officers, the authority which can fill up an officer's post when he vacates it should be able to grant him a pension, provided the case is certified by a competent Accounts official as being covered by the ordinary rules.

(iii.) Foreign Service Rules.—The chief complaint made by the Local Governments was as to the provisions of Articles 753 and 764, which, except in the case of certain 'Imperial' services, do not permit of the transfer of an officer to service with an outside employer—or to any special appointment or establishment created at the cost of funds outside general revenues, of which the Government has control—unless he has had 10 years' qualifying service under Government. There are also restrictions as to remuneration (Articles 753 and 764). We understand, however, that the rules have lately been revised so as to give wider latitude to Local Governments in these respects, and especially in regard to the temporary loan of officers to Native States, without reference to the Government of India. We think that any exemption from the general rules might rest with the Local Governments in the case of officers deputed to 'foreign service' within the Provinces, or in Native States subordinate to the Provincial Government.

We consider, further, that the Foreign Service Rules as they at present stand are unduly complicated; that it is unnecessary to call an addition to a regular Government establishment made at the cost of a Native State or outside body* 'foreign service' at all; and that officers who remain practically under the direct control of Government, e.g., men lent to Court of Wards estates, should not be considered as on foreign service, though their pay, and eventually a portion of their pension, may properly be recovered from the estates in question. Such men should be treated as Government officers on special duty, and the amount to be paid for their services and pensions by the estates, or other bodies, for whose good they work should be at the discretion of the Local Government.

(iv.) Travelling Allowance Rules.—These are unduly minute and centralized. As we have already indicated, it is quite proper that the Government of India should lay down general rules and rates as regards travelling allowance concessions; but it is not desirable that they should keep in their own hands such matters as the grant of conveyance allowance, the grant of special rates of travelling allowance in particularly expensive localities, and the substitution of fixed monthly allowances for ordinary rail and mileage rates.† Subject

158. In Schedule 1. of this volume, we give certain detailed examples, drawn from the evidence, illustrating the character of the changes in the Civil Service Regulations which we recommend. This schedule must not, however, be taken as in any way exhaustive, and we consider that the Civil Service Regulations should be thoroughly revised, in accordance with the principles we have laid down, by a Committee to be appointed by the Government of India.

The Civil Service Regulations should be recast in accordance with the principles we have laid down.

159. Some witnesses have suggested that where reference now has to be made to the Government of India, in regard to departures in particular instances from the rules laid down by the Civil Service Regulations, it would save time and correspondence if the Local Governments were allowed to act on their own discretion. They urge that the Government of India, who would receive copies of the Provincial proceedings, or special periodical returns, could intervene, though not necessarily with retrospective effect, in any case in which they thought that a Local Government was acting unwisely, or departing too largely from general rules. But if Local Governments are, as we suggest, generally entrusted with the special dispensing powers now vested in the Government of India, there will be no necessity for such a course; and where a reference to the Government of India is still required, we think that it should be made, as at present, before orders are passed.

Where references to the Government of India will still be required, the previous sanction of that Government should be obtained.

The Civil Account Code, and the position of Audit Officers.

Vol. X.,
 App. Id.,
 pp. 197-9.

160. There are three separate Accounts departments in India: the Military Accounts department; the Public Works Accounts department, which deals with ordinary public works, railways and telegraphs; and the Civil Accounts department, which deals with other civil charges. The Civil and Military Accounts departments are under the administrative control of the Finance Department of the Government of India; the Public Works Accounts officers are under the Public Works Department of that Government.

The various Accounts departments.

161. The Civil Accounts department has at its head in each major Province an Accountant-General (a Comptroller in the Central Provinces), while there is also a Comptroller of India Treasuries in Calcutta, who audits the expenditure of departments under the direct control of the Government of India and of certain of the minor administrations. There is likewise a special Comptroller of Post Office accounts.

All these officers are departmentally subordinate to the Comptroller and Auditor-General, whose Deputy Auditors-General periodically inspect their offices, as also (though less frequently) those of the Military and Public Works Accounts departments, in regard to which the Comptroller-General has some control in matters of procedure. 43645-6.

Functions of the Comptroller-
General.

In the matter of accounts and audit, the functions of the Comptroller and Auditor-General lie mainly in direction and supervision; in the compilation, review or examination of figures and statements on behalf of the Finance Department; and in the conduct, through his deputies, of test audits to ascertain if the detailed audit conducted by accounts offices is efficient, and their office procedure sound. Besides compiling for the Government of India a complete monthly account of the receipts and expenditure of the whole country, and keeping them informed by periodical statements of the progress of revenue and expenditure, and of the state of 'ways and means,' throughout the year, the Comptroller and Auditor-General compiles the finance and revenue accounts which are annually submitted to Parliament. He is also the head of the Paper Currency department, which deals with note issues. Vol. X., App. Id., pp. 197-9.

Audit functions of Accountants-
General, etc.

162. In the matter of detailed audit, the Civil Accountants-General and officers exercising corresponding functions have independent powers. It is their duty to bring to notice all cases in which a spending authority, whether it be the Government of India itself, the Local Government, or some head of a department, etc., has exceeded its powers as laid down by the Civil Service Regulations or other rules, and to require that such expenditure shall be disallowed if not sanctioned by the authority which is competent to pass it. Thus, if a competent Accounts officer challenges any financial action of an Indian Government as being ultra vires, that Government must either withdraw its previous sanction or refer the matter to higher authority. General position of the Civil Accountants-
General.

163. An Accountant-General assists the Local Government in the preparation of its budget estimates, and advises upon any financial question which may be referred to him, but he is an independent officer of the Government of India. He and his principal assistants are directly appointed and promoted by the Finance Department, and he refers to it, through the Comptroller-General, all questions relating to his office establishments, in regard to which he has not full powers of control. All Government audit and accounts charges are Imperial. Vol. X., App. Id., p. 197-9. 41141.

The Civil Account
Code.

164. The existing system of Government accounts in India is based on a report submitted, in 1864, by two special Commissioners, who were deputed from England for the purpose of enquiring into the constitution and method of business of the Financial Department and the offices of audit and account. The system thus developed was embodied in a number of circulars, which were gradually consolidated into a code. The Civil Account Code, in its present form, comprises two volumes, covering, with appendices, some 960 pages and divided into 80 chapters.

and more than 1,700 sections. The first volume (which has reached a seventh edition) is divided into two parts covering :

(I.) Instructions to officers generally in dealing with Treasuries ; and (II.) Treasury procedure.

The second volume refers to the procedure in the Accounts and Audit offices.

Most Government officers are, as a rule, only concerned with Part I of Volume I., which comprises 131 pages and 299 sections, and the evidence we have taken has been mainly confined to this Part.

41197.

The general code is, we understand, supplemented by Treasury Manuals, or Standing Orders of the Accountant-General, in each Province.

44873.

165. In its general lines the present organization of the accounts and audit work appears to us entirely satisfactory. An independent and impartial audit, such as now obtains in India, is essential to a well ordered financial system, and there are strong arguments in favour of a centralized system of accounting. Systems of account are not materially influenced by local conditions, and do not affect the relations of Local Governments with their servants or with the general public, nor are questions of local policy involved in the form in which accounts are kept. On the other hand, a uniform system is of the greatest importance for statistics and purposes of comparison, while independence and efficiency of audit is one of the essential conditions for any decentralization of financial powers.

The present organization of accounts and audit work is entirely satisfactory.

Art. 75.
Art. 100

166. The accounting rules are laid down with considerable minuteness in the Civil Account Code. At the same time the principle is recognized that minor matters may be dealt with by Local Governments, e.g., they have powers in regard to the nature and limit of contingent charges which may be incurred without previous sanction, or which require such sanction (a) by themselves, and (b) by controlling officers whom they designate. They can deal with such matters as the sanction necessary for refunds of revenue ; while, as already pointed out, they have large powers in regard to the transfers of money from one budget head to another.

167. We have had allegations as to the meticulous character of a number of the existing account rules, and the amount of trouble and correspondence they throw on executive officers ; but the specific criticisms generally resolved themselves into complaints as to excessive requirement of vouchers in cases of petty expenditure, the necessity for sending up duplicate and triplicate copies of bills and connected papers, and unnecessary requirement of counter-signature by outside authorities. These are matters which the Local Governments are at present, to some extent, competent to remedy in consultation with the Accountants-General.

168. The Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces has suggested that enquiry is desirable as regards the simplification of work in the accounts and audit offices themselves, and a similar view was evidently entertained by some witnesses. Being satisfied with the general lines of the accounts and audit systems, we did not think it incumbent on us to examine their detailed working. The time at our disposal would, moreover, have been insufficient for such a course. We are, therefore, not prepared to offer an opinion on this matter, but we mention it for the future consideration of the Government of India.

The present Civil Account Code should be replaced by a simpler code.

169. But apart from the internal working of the Accounts offices, we think that the Civil Account Code has become unnecessarily large and unduly minute, and that it might be superseded by a simpler code embodying the rules of procedure necessary from the point of view of Imperial finance, and supplemented by Provincial manuals which should deal with such matters as might reasonably be the subject of local discretion. If a difference of opinion should arise between the Accountant-General and the Local Government, in respect to matters falling within the scope of the Provincial manuals, the former holding (for example) that some change desired by the latter would be prejudicial to efficient accounting and auditing, the case should be referred to the Comptroller-General, and the Local Government should either accept his opinion or make a further reference to the Government of India.

Schedule of suggestions in respect to certain Articles of the code.

170. In Schedule II of this Volume we have recorded notes on some of the more important specific Articles of the Code to which our attention has been drawn, apart from those which have already been discussed in connexion with the more general restrictions which accompany the Provincial settlements, e.g., the budget and salary rules. But like the previous schedule, this list does not purport to be exhaustive, and we consider that the Civil Account Code should also be revised by a Committee to be appointed by the Government of India.

Audit officers should not have larger discretion in condoning departures from rule, nor should Local Governments have power to set aside audit objections.

171. The head of an Accounts Office may write off, without reference to higher authority, sums, not exceeding Rs. 25 in any one case, which have become irrecoverable, or which, in his judgment, may be passed although not covered by ordinary rule.

Art. 989.

We do not agree with the suggestion that Accounts officers should be given larger discretionary powers of this nature, or that the Local Governments should have power to set aside audit objections. The grant of larger powers to Local Governments and their subordinates in the matter of sanctioning public expenditure will do away with a great number of references and challenges which have now to be made by the Accounts department; but in so far as rules restricting the powers of expenditure remain, it is obviously the part of an Accounts officer to interpret them strictly, and the power to allow condonations and deviations should rest not with him, but with an appropriate executive authority.

An Accountant-General must retain the power of interpreting financial rules; and be able to require reference to the Government of India where he holds that a Local Government has infringed a rule, or that a discretionary power granted to it is being too widely exercised.

172. Further, an Accountant-General, or similar Accounts officer, must retain the power of interpreting financial rules; and in cases where he holds that a rule as it stands does not permit of the exercise of a power which a Local Government claims under it, the matter must be referred to the Government of India. Moreover, as we have already observed, the exercise by a Local Government of the discretionary powers, now vested in the Government of India, in regard to departure from general rules in particular cases, must be subject to the challenge of the Accountant-General, if he should find reason to believe that such discretionary power is being exercised so liberally as practically to substitute a new rule for the old one.

173. The district treasury is the unit of the financial system in India, and the bulk of the Government receipts and payments are lodged in, or issued from, district treasuries, including in that term not merely the main treasury at the headquarters of each district, but subordinate outlying treasuries which are under the management of a tahsildar or other local revenue officer. The work of the main district treasury, and the supervision of the subordinate treasuries, is in the hands of a special assistant belonging to the Collector's ordinary staff, usually a Deputy Collector or officer of like standing, but the Collector retains a general responsibility for treasury administration. He must verify, at specified intervals, the balances of cash, stamps and other valuables lodged in the district treasury, and inspect the subordinate treasuries in the course of his tours. In general matters of accounting and the management of the cash balances, the district treasury authorities are under the orders of the Accountant-General, who checks and audits the charges incurred within the districts.

174. It was suggested by some witnesses, mainly in Burma and Eastern Bengal, that the Collector should be relieved of his present responsibilities in regard to treasury work, so as to give him greater time for other functions more directly connected with the people, and that the management of district treasuries should be in the hands of officers belonging to the Accountant-General's staff. We are not in favour of this proposal, for the reasons given by the Comptroller-General, which are, in brief, that such a change would be expensive, and would provoke more friction with the spending departments in the districts than is the case at present, while the relief to the Collector would be but slight. Complete detachment of the Collector from treasury work would also weaken his authority as a controlling officer in matters relating to expenditure within the district and the local supply of currency.

We think, however, that the instructions as to the verification of district treasury cash balances by the Collector require some modification to meet his absence on tour. The general rule is that he should make such verification on the first of each month, unless he should be absent from the station, when he may delegate the duty to a subordinate; but in no case can he allow more than two months to elapse without his own verification save with the special sanction of the Local Government. Collectors have sometimes to cut short a tour for the mere purpose of complying with this rule, and we think that an exception which has been allowed for the Bombay Presidency, and which relieves the Collector from personal verification while on tour, provided he performs the duty in person in not less than four months of the year, might be made of general application.

175. We have received criticisms, which seem to us well founded, as to the extent to which rural boards and municipalities have been tied down by the rigid application of accounts rules and procedure based on those of the Civil Account Code. This is a matter primarily for Local Governments, and we think they should take steps to ensure that the accounts rules of local bodies shall be of a simpler character than is necessary in the case of direct Government expenditure.

Account rules for local bodies should be of a simpler character than is necessary in the case of direct Government outlay.

The same remark applies to audit requirements in respect of the transactions of local bodies.

176. Similar complaints have been made as to the audit of municipal and district board accounts, which is effected by peripatetic auditors from the Accountant-General's office. The tendency seems to have been to make unduly stringent requirements in regard to such matters as the submission of vouchers for items of petty expenditure. Here, again, the Local Governments are the controlling authorities, the Accountants-General being under their orders in respect of the receipts and expenditure appertaining to local bodies which do not figure in the accounts of the Government of India, and are governed by local Acts and by rules enacted thereunder. In this case, too, we have not enquired in detail into the actual working of the system, but we think that the audit requirements in regard to such bodies should be simpler than those applicable to Government departments. So long, however, as a charge requires specific sanction or evidence of its having been actually incurred, it is clearly the duty of the auditor to bring to notice irregularities, and to require that such charges shall be regularized by competent authority, or by satisfactory evidence of payment.

177. In so far as the Public Works and Forest Codes of the Government of India embody financial or quasi-financial restrictions not covered by the Civil Service Regulations or the Civil Account Code, they will form the subject of subsequent remarks.

Excise administration.

Excise revenue and laws.

178. We submit some remarks on the administrative control of the Imperial Finance Department over Excise.

Excise revenue is derived mainly from liquors produced in India, but it also includes the taxation on opium consumed within the country, and on intoxicating drugs.* Excise receipts are shared between the Local and Supreme Governments, and the administration of this branch of revenue is vested in Provincial Governments, subject to the general control of the Government of India in the Finance Department.

The Provincial Governments have, as already explained, a certain amount of discretion in the levy of excise duties, and there is no single Excise Act applicable to the whole of India. Madras, Bombay and the two Bengals have their own local laws; the other Provinces are governed by the Northern India Excise Act of 1896.

Para. 97.

The Excise Committee of 1905.

179. The systems of excise administration which grew up in the various Provinces differed materially from one another; and in 1905 a Committee consisting of Excise experts from the major Provinces,† was appointed by the Government of India to consider the working of these various systems, and how far they were in accord with the declared policy of Government that, in order to restrict the consumption of liquor, the excise revenue should be as high as it was possible to raise it without driving the people into illicit practices. The recommendations of the Committee were unanimous, and gave rise to a series of Resolutions and orders which were issued by the Government of India in 1906 and 1907, and which dealt with the systems and policy to be adopted in future.

* The taxation of imported liquors and of exported opium is an Imperial matter, and the receipts from these sources come respectively under the budget heads "Customs" and "Opium."

of 1896.

180. As a result of the conclusions thus arrived at, the provisions of the Northern India Excise Act were found unsuitable to present conditions, and it has been determined to replace this enactment by fresh legislation, which is, however, to be carried out in the various Provincial Councils, on a general model proposed by the Excise Committee and approved, subject to some modifications, by the Government of India. The same course has been suggested to the Governments of Bengal and Eastern Bengal and Assam, where the existing Bengal Act has been found unsatisfactory, and was already under revision by the Bengal Government. Considerable amendment will also be required in the Bombay Act.

The fresh excise legislation now required is to be Provincial and not Imperial.

181. The Committee's recommendation had been in the direction of a general Excise law for the whole of India, and in rejecting this the Government of India recorded the following remarks, which we consider it desirable to reproduce:—

Reasons for adoption of this course.

Circ. letter.
No. 4737,
Exc. of

"Excise is a branch of the administration in which uniformity is neither possible nor desirable. Local conditions vary enormously, not only from Province to Province, but also in different parts of a single Province. . . . In one Province tari (toddy) is all important; in another the prevailing taste is for country spirit; in a third it is for drugs. . . A general Act would only be possible if its provisions were made wholly general, and all details were left to be supplied by rules. . . . It is manifestly preferable that each Province should have a self-contained law of its own, taking full account of its own local requirements, laying stress on those matters which are of local importance, and passing more lightly over those which are not. Uniformity is desirable in such matters as (1) general policy . . . ; (2) the principal definitions; (3) inter-provincial transactions, such as transport from one Province to another; and (4) the general scale of penalties. In other matters there is room for much diversity. In some Provinces, for example, there is a distinct public demand that local opinion should be ascertained before shops are opened or their locality decided; other Provinces are not ripe for such a step, or at least are less ripe. There is no advantage but quite the reverse in applying a single rule to all alike. Subject to the foregoing remarks, the Government of India wish to leave to Local Governments and Administrations full liberty to make such additions, omissions or alterations in the draft Bill* as may be necessary to meet local requirements. In particular it will be left for them to decide how far arrangements for ascertaining local opinion should, in view of local conditions, be included in the law."

182. This decision renders it unnecessary to consider matters in which the existing Northern India Excise Act is alleged unduly to fetter the action of the Governments of the

* i.e., the general model draft above referred to.

Provinces to which it applies. The new legislation contemplated will give these Governments full opportunity for suggesting such modifications as they may desire.

The present Madras and Bombay Acts contain no statutory restrictions on the powers of the Local Governments, while the only such restriction in the Bengal Act is contained in a section, relating to municipalities and excise licences, which has never yet been acted upon.

Act VII.
Bengal,
of 1878,
sec. 84.

183. We have already recommended that a general condition attached to the Provincial settlements, which debars alterations in the local excise duties in districts bordering on another Province without the sanction of the Government of India, should be altered.

Para. 139.

All questions involving any important change of excise policy or system are, however, essentially matters for the consideration of the Government of India.

Considerations held to justify the close control hitherto exercised
Government of India over excise policy in the Provinces.

184. The rather close administrative scrutiny hitherto exercised by the Government of India over the excise policy of the Local Governments was, we understand, dictated by the following considerations :—

(i.) Excise administration is subject to constant criticism both in India and in England. Thus, in 1889, the House of Commons passed a resolution unfavourable to the then excise administration, and an answer had to be prepared at great length by the Government of India.

Fin.
Dept.,
Pro. A.,
Sep. Rev.,
March,
256-348.

(ii.) The Government of India have more than once pledged themselves not to regard the increase of revenue from excise as an object to be sought per se, and they had to ascertain that their policy was not misunderstood or misapplied by local authorities.

(iii.) As the Excise Committee brought to notice, each Local Government has hitherto proceeded largely on its own lines in the development of its excise administration, without sufficient knowledge of systems which had failed or succeeded elsewhere, or of the effect which its actions might have upon adjoining Provinces. The increase of inter-provincial communication renders it more than ever desirable to obtain co-ordination in the general lines of excise policy.

Excise

Appointment of an Imperial Inspector-General of Excise and Salt.

Accordingly, an Imperial Inspector-General of Excise has lately been appointed ; and he is also to be Inspector-General in regard to the various Salt departments administered by the maritime Provinces. The salt and excise establishments have already been combined in Madras and Sind, and are likely to be similarly conjoined in Bombay proper and in Bengal.

His functions.

185. The functions of the Inspector-General were stated, in a letter to the Provincial Governments announcing his appointment, to be as follows :—

F.D. letter,
No. 6599,
Exc., of 28th Oct.,
1907.

(a.) To keep the Government of India informed on matters of general administration relating to Excise and Salt.

(b.) To furnish Local Governments with advice and information.

(c.) To bring the experience of one Province to bear upon the problems of another, so as to secure such co-ordination as may be possible of the systems of the different Provinces.

“In the discharge of the above duties, (it was said) the Inspector-General will tour freely all over India, and familiarize himself with the local conditions, the administrative methods and the special problems of the various Provinces. He will exercise no authority of any sort over Provincial Excise and Salt departments, and will not call for any returns or reports from them. He will, however, correspond and confer informally with the heads of these departments, and with Local Governments, on matters regarding excise and salt, in order that he may be in the most favourable position to offer informed advice to the Governor-General in Council, who is ultimately responsible for the effective observance of the policy of Government in such matters.

"In their report (paragraph 297) the Excise Committee represented the advantages of appointing an Imperial officer with a general knowledge of the different excise systems in India who would be made available for investigation, consultation and advice. The Government of India have fully accepted this view. They do not consider that excise is a branch of administration in which uniformity is either possible or desirable; on the contrary, they are convinced that it must always belong essentially to the domain of the Provincial Governments. At the same time it is a difficult and highly technical subject; it is now one of the most important branches of revenue; and its administration is subject to constant attacks and criticism. There is every reason to hope that the Inspector-General will, by his experience and friendly counsels, facilitate the reforms on which the different Provinces are at present engaged, and the Governor-General in Council has full confidence that his appointment will be of the greatest assistance both to the Government of India and to the various Local Governments and Administrations."

Chap. VIII.

Vol. VII.,
App. II.,
p. 164.]

186. The general recommendations made in our chapter on Imperial Inspectors-General will apply also to the Inspector-General of Excise. As regards the other matters noticed above, it appears to us that the Government of India were acting within their normal functions in appointing the Excise Committee of 1905; but now that orders, laying down future policy, have been issued on the report of that body, and after settlement of any points on which the Provincial Governments may have to represent local difficulties which stand in the way of carrying out such orders, detailed control by the Government of India over Provincial Excise administration ought, in our opinion, to be very greatly diminished.

Detailed control by the Government of India over excise administration should be materially diminished.

187. The receipts from opium used for internal consumption in British India also fall under the head of Excise, and the regulation of the internal opium traffic is under the immediate control of the Local Governments, though these act under an Imperial law, the Indian Opium Act of 1878.

Control by the Government of India over internal opium traffic.

The administrative control of the Government of India, apart from references required under the financial rules, and specific matters arising out of Provincial Excise Reports, is here ordinarily limited to points of general policy, such as the method of opium supply and questions relating to poppy cultivation. Burma, however, has been subjected to closer control, since there is there a special system—which is at present on its trial and which it is found very difficult to bring to a successful issue—of forbidding the supply of opium to Burmans, other than persons registered in Lower Burma as having been opium-smokers prior to 1893, and—ancillary to this—a special system of retail vend. The Burma Government send annual reports on the progress of this system, and these are submitted to the Secretary of State.

Desirability of amendment of certain sections of the Opium Act.

188. Under section 5 of the Opium Act, 1878, the rules framed by each Local Government in regard to such matters as the possession, import and export, transport, and sale of opium, which practically regulate the opium traffic within a Province, have to receive the previous sanction of the Governor-General in Council. So also do rules under section 13 in respect of the disposal of confiscated articles and payment of rewards to informers, and rules relating to opium warehouses (section 8). We agree with the Financial Secretary to the Government of India that the general control of the Supreme Government might be substituted for specific sanction in respect to such rules.

189. In concluding this chapter, we recommend that Indian Civilians destined for the Financial Secretariats of the principal Provinces should undergo some training in the Imperial Financial Secretariat. Such training would materially assist these officers in their work in the Provinces, and would tend to reduce friction, by making them better acquainted with the circumstances which lead the Government of India occasionally to reject or modify proposals made by the Local Governments. Such a course of training has already been adopted in respect of the Legislative Department.

PUBLIC WORKS.

Organization of the Imperial and Provincial
Public Works
Departments.

190. The Government of India, and each of the major Provinces, have a civil Public Works Department, dealing with matters relating to irrigation, buildings and roads.* With the exception of main lines of communication, which are usually a direct provincial charge, the financial responsibility for ordinary road work has, however, been generally transferred to rural boards, whose functions will be dealt with in Part III.

191. The Government of India Public Works Department, whose Secretariat officers are drawn from the ranks of the Department itself, is under the Member of Council in charge of the Revenue and Agriculture portfolio. In Madras and Bombay the Public Works Department is usually under the Governor: elsewhere it is always, like other Secretariat Departments, under the Head of the Province.

Burma there are two Chief Engineers, one for irrigation and the other for buildings and roads; while in the Punjab, where irrigation has been specially developed, there are now two Chief Engineers for this branch and one for buildings and roads. In Eastern Bengal and Assam, and in the Central Provinces, there is only one Chief Engineer. The division of functions which exists in most Provinces as between the Chief Engineers, extends also to the district staff in the United Provinces and the Punjab. Elsewhere the general practice is to use the same officers for irrigation, buildings and roads.

193. Each Province is divided into Public Works divisions, comprising single civil districts, or portions or groups of districts, as the case may be; and each division is in charge of an Executive Engineer, who is immediately responsible for the construction, up-keep and improvement of all works within his charge.

Superintending,
Executive and Assistant Engineers.

Executive Engineers have under them Assistant Engineers who are in training for higher functions, and a subordinate staff, the principal members of which are styled subordinate engineers, supervisors, and overseers. These assistants may hold subordinate charge either of a portion of the division or of particular works.

Five or six divisions are grouped into a "circle" in charge of a Superintending Engineer. All important estimates are passed on to him by Executive Engineers for scrutiny, and the inspection of the works and projects in his circle is his primary duty.

194. The Chief, Superintending, Executive and Assistant Engineers form the superior staff of the Department. The majority of them are civil engineers trained and recruited in England; but the staff also includes a proportion of Royal Engineer officers, and a large number of engineers recruited in India. These last are now classed as 'Provincial' engineers, while the others constitute an 'Imperial' service. There are also a considerable number of temporary and non-pensionable engineers, employed (outside railways) chiefly on irrigation works in the Punjab.

195. The 'Provincial' engineers are natives of India (including in this term domiciled Europeans and Eurasians) and are recruited from the Indian engineering colleges, by the grant of a limited number of guaranteed appointments to the most distinguished students of each year, or by promotion from the upper subordinate ranks. This service was organized on its present footing in 1892, in accordance with the recommendation of the Public Service Commission; and its members perform the same duties, and can rise to the same positions, as the officers of the 'Imperial' Service, but draw a lower rate of pay in most grades.

Ibid.,

The 'Subordinate' Public Works service is recruited in India from the local engineering colleges.* It contains a sprinkling of British soldiers who have undergone an engineering course at Roorkee, while the rest are natives of India in the wide sense above referred to, but with a large predominance of the purely Indian element. It is divided into 'upper subordinates,' consisting of subordinate engineers, supervisors and overseers, with pay ranging from Rs. 60 to Rs. 500 a month, and 'lower subordinates,' who are sub-overseers on a pay of Rs. 30 to Rs. 70.

First appointment of 'Imperial' and 'Provincial' officers, etc.

196. Members of the 'Imperial' branch of the Public Works Department are appointed by the Secretary of State, and members of the 'Provincial' branch by the Government of India. On arrival in India (in the case of the former), or on appointment (in the case of the latter), they are posted to the various Provinces. Officers posted to the minor Administrations form a single cadre, and all but short officiating promotions therein are made by the Government of India.* In the other Provinces Executive and Assistant Engineers are borne on separate lists, and promotions are made by the Local Government. But, except in Madras and Bombay, Chief and Superintending Engineers are on a single list for all India, and their posting and promotion are regulated by the Central Government.

The Public Works Accounts branch.

197. The Public Works Accounts branch is under the direct control of the Government of India Public Works Department. Its superior staff, which comprises Examiners and Deputy and Assistant Examiners, is recruited partly by direct appointment in England; and partly by appointment in India—(a) on the result of a competitive examination; (b) by promotion from the subordinate ranks; (c) by the transfer, in exceptional cases, of officers from the engineering establishment. The Examiner of Public Works Accounts in each Province occupies a position somewhat similar to that of the Civil Accountant-General, while at the head of the branch is an Accountant-General, whose functions are in a measure analogous to those of the Comptroller and Auditor-General of the Civil Accounts Department: he is likewise a Deputy Secretary, for accounts matters, in the Imperial Public Works Secretariat. The Comptroller-General has also some control over the Public Works Accounts.

Functions of the Government of India in public works matters, and their general control over Local Governments.

198. The Government of India are thus primarily responsible for accounting and auditing, as also for the allocation of funds for irrigation and other public works projects which are defrayed from current Imperial revenues or borrowed monies; but the actual construction and maintenance of roads, buildings, and irrigation works is carried out by the Provincial Governments, subject to varying degrees of control by the Central authority. This control is mainly exercised by means of general financial or quasi-financial restrictions, involving, in certain cases, the scrutiny of plans and estimates and the sanction of contracts; and is facilitated, in the case of important irrigation projects, by the inspections and reports of the Inspector-General of Irrigation.

Further detailed control.

199. The control of the Central Government does not, however, stop here. The general organization of the Provincial departments is prescribed by the Government of India. The pay of the different grades of officers, the general conditions of their service, and their spheres of action are laid down by the same authority, while, as already pointed out, the most important members of the Public Works staff are, in most Provinces, appointed by the Government of India.

* This cadre has hitherto included, for the present purposes, the major Provinces of Eastern Bengal and Assam and the Central Provinces, but we understand that those Governments have now been authorized to promote their own Executive and Assistant Engineers. 44184.

While, therefore, the Government of India exercise a general supervision and control over the expenditure entrusted to Provincial Governments, they maintain a direct and detailed check over the organization of the Public Works Department, and over matters connected with its personnel.

200. In considering what further delegations can expediently be made to Provincial Governments we have borne in mind the various aspects of the control of the Central Government, as exercised in respect, not only of general financial and technical questions and over accounts, but also in a variety of specific matters.

201. At the outset, however, we would observe that the Public Works Department of the Government of India has been subjected to considerable criticism, and that special emphasis has been laid by important witnesses on the unnecessarily detailed character of its control. The Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces says, "Among the particular Departments of the Government of India which appear to be too rigid in limiting the discretion of the Head of the Province, I consider that the Public Works Department is the worst offender ; they interfere in details to an extent which is often irritating." The Lieutenant-Governor of Burma, again, observes that "the Public Works Department affords very large scope for decentralization. The system is exceedingly elaborate, and simplification and devolution seem to be clearly indicated."

Necessity for decentralization in public works administration.

p. 133.

Vol. III.,
App. II.,
p. 180.

We consider such criticisms to be in a large measure justified, and we think that the time has arrived for a substantial measure of decentralization.

202. This devolution is, however, only possible owing to the altered circumstances of the present day, and the existing system was well adapted to meet the conditions originally obtaining. It is, in fact, largely as a result of the increased efficiency attained through centralization, and by the recruitment of an able civil engineering staff through Cooper's Hill and the local engineering colleges, that a generous measure of delegation can be now recommended.

The circumstances which justified the present degree of centralization no longer apply.

Imperial
Gazetteer,
Vol. III.,
pp. 404-6.

Until Lord Dalhousie replaced the old military boards, which had previously managed public works, by civil Public Works departments in the Provinces and under the Supreme Government—and, indeed, for some time after their abolition—the administration of civil public works throughout India was far from satisfactory. When such works were of small account, and insignificant sums were spent on them, it was inevitable that the small Provincial staffs should often lack the technical and administrative qualities necessary for high efficiency, and in such circumstances close supervision and control by the Government of India was naturally advisable.

But it can no longer be said that the Provincial establishments are organized on too humble a scale to possess the necessary elements for efficient management. In all the larger Provinces, public works outlay is now on a scale that requires and receives the attention of a highly trained and well-equipped staff. We think, therefore, that the control of the Government of India is now much less required to secure efficiency and economy.

Further, when the present system originated, the Provincial Governments had practically no independent financial powers, and they had, until very recently, only five year leases of their revenues. Now, however, the system of quasi-permanent settlements has placed the Governments of the major Provinces in a position to carry out comprehensive public works programmes from their own resources.

203. The Secretary to the Public Works Department of the Government of India appears to recognize the altered conditions, and to support the view that the time has arrived for a substantial devolution of powers to Provincial Governments. We learn from him, for example, that shortly after we were appointed, the Government of India placed some important proposals for decentralization within the Provinces before the Local Governments.

General financial and technical control.

204. Apart from the general financial rules and restrictions as to budget provision, salaries, and other matters connected with establishments referred to in Chapter III., the following special conditions apply to civil works expenditure.

The Government of India must distribute money for irrigation projects financed from loans, or from the Famine Insurance Grant.

(i) In so far as major irrigation works are financed from loans for productive undertakings, or are constructed, as protective works against famine, from what is known as the Famine Insurance Grant, the selection of such undertakings, and the distribution of money for them, are properly vested in the Government of India, though their construction and up-keep are left to the agency of the Provincial Governments.

The Inspector-General of Irrigation.

205. A separate Inspector-General of Irrigation was appointed in 1906, for a period of three years at the outset, mainly in order to assist the Government of India in dealing with irrigation projects of the above description. This office was originally brought into being in 1867, when the policy of developing irrigation works by borrowed money was first set on foot, but its functions became subsequently merged in those of the Public Works Secretary to the Government of India. The impetus given to expenditure on large irrigation projects by the report of the Irrigation Commission of 1901 led to the creation of the present Inspector-Generalship.

It has been suggested that the existing limits, which are of old date, ought to be materially raised in view of the fall in the exchange value of the rupee from 2s. to 1s. 4d., which affects the cost of all articles required from Europe or America, and of the rise in the cost of local labour. We think these considerations sound, and we suggest that the limit of the Local Governments' power of independent sanction, which should apply also to the Government of India in respect to Imperial works, should be raised to 16 lakhs for works proper, or 20 lakhs including establishment charges, etc.†

Proposal to raise the existing limit.

207. (iii) When a scheme requires financial sanction, it is necessary that the plans and estimates should be sent up along with it; but apart from this, the submission of such estimates to the Consulting Architect of the Government of India is at present required in respect of buildings costing more than Rs. 50,000, proposed to be undertaken by a Local Government which has no Architect of its own. The object is to get special expert advice in respect to such works, with a view to economy and the improvement of architectural standards, but the present limit is complained of as unduly narrow.

Local Governments need not refer to the consulting Architect to the Government of India in respect to buildings for which the financial sanction of that Government is not necessary; but in these and other matters they should voluntarily consult the Imperial public works experts in cases of difficulty.

We think it unnecessary to prescribe a rigid money criterion, which must cover many buildings of a commonplace character in regard to which it is unnecessary for the Local Governments to obtain outside advice. It should be left to them to apply to the Consulting Architect to the Government of India in cases in which they may consider his advice desirable. Similarly, too, in the case of other works for which the financial sanction of the Government of India is not necessary, Local Governments should be encouraged voluntarily to consult the Imperial Public Works experts, in cases of doubt or difficulty, as regards plans and estimates in which an outside opinion may seem desirable.

208. (iv.) As regards Public Works expenditure which falls upon Imperial revenues, including, in the major Provinces, that connected with Imperial buildings carried out by Provincial agency, any outlay which is at all considerable (usually in excess of Rs. 20,000) must be first approved administratively by the Government of India. Construction estimates, including establishment charges, etc., can then be professionally passed by the Local Governments up to 2½ lakhs in the case of Madras and Bombay, up to Rs. 62,500 in the Lieutenant-Governor Provinces, and up to Rs. 25,000 in the Central Provinces and the minor administrations.

All major Provinces should have the same powers as Madras and Bombay in respect of the passing of construction estimates for Imperial works.

We agree with the Public Works Secretary to the Government of India that the Lieutenant-Governor Provinces should have the same powers in regard to professional sanction as the two Presidency Governments, since their Public Works establishments now stand on the same footing. For the Central Provinces, Mr. Jacob has suggested a lower limit, viz., Rs. 150,000. But since the principal Public Works officer here is now a Chief Engineer, as in the other major Provinces, we think that it might be placed on the same footing as these, as it already is with regard to the power of sanction of Provincial works.

† In the event of larger financial powers being given to the Provincial Legislatures, as is now proposed by the Secretary of State, Mr. Hitchens would do away with this money limit altogether.

And the powers of the Chief Commissioners of the Frontier Provinces and Baluchistan might be somewhat enhanced

In the Frontier Province and Baluchistan, civil public works are at present in charge of the local military works establishments, and the Commanding Royal Engineer is also Public Works Secretary to the local administration, in which capacity he must necessarily deal, on behalf of the Chief Commissioner, with the professional sanction to estimates. We think that the Chief Commissioner's powers as regards Imperial Civil estimates should be not less than those which his technical adviser possesses in respect of military works. It appears that at present they are somewhat smaller.

The powers of the Provincial Governments in regard to tenders or contracts should be enlarged.

209. (v.) Provincial Governments may not accept tenders, or pass contracts, for the execution of works the estimates of which are beyond their powers of professional sanction. As regards acceptance of tenders and contracts by subordinate engineering authorities, whose powers are now specifically limited, we recommend that a Provincial Government should have full power of delegation, subject to the general principles that the powers of officers to whom such delegation is made shall not exceed their powers of dealing with estimates professionally; that the contract does not involve indefinite legal liabilities, in regard to which the law officers of Government should be consulted; and that great caution should be shown in regard to any delegation of power (such as has been proposed by the Government of Burma) to make a departure from the ordinary rule that tenders should be publicly called for, and the contract given to the lowest satisfactory bidder.

Limited powers of Superintending and Executive Engineers in respect to professional sanction of new works.

210. (vi.) Within the local budget provision available, Superintending Engineers already have full powers in regard to passing repair estimates for their circles; and Executive Engineers can be given such powers within the annual maintenance estimates for their charges. In regard to new works, however, the powers of professional sanction possessed by these officers are very limited. Superintending Engineers are normally entitled to pass estimates for such works up to Rs. 500, but this limit may be extended to Rs. 10,000 by the Local Government, while the similar powers of Executive Engineers are Rs. 200 normally and Rs. 500 if so empowered. It appears that the discretion given to Local Governments to expand the normal powers of these officers has in some Provinces been very sparingly exercised, and there have been complaints, which we consider well founded, as to the unnecessarily rigid limits imposed.*

Local Governments should have full discretion to delegate such powers.

211. In a letter addressed to the Local Governments on the 5th November, 1907, the Government of India have already suggested the grant of largely enhanced powers to these officers, and have indicated that in their opinion the limit of the Executive Engineer's power to sanction new works estimates might be raised to Rs. 2,500, and that of the Superintending Engineer to a lakh or more. These proposals appear to have been generally well received.

But we would go further, and would allow Provincial Governments full discretion in delegating powers of professional sanction to their subordinate officers. They should, we think, bear in mind that the position of a Superintending Engineer ought to be that of a local 'chief' engineer for most engineering matters within his circle, and that the function of the Chief Engineer of the Province should be to deal with the estimates of really important works, and to satisfy himself by local inspection that the engineering establishments under his control are working economically and efficiently.

44482. 212. (vii.) Provincial Governments are under special restriction in regard to works connected with the personal amenities of the Head of a Province. If the expenditure on a Government House, outside ordinary repairs, exceeds Rs. 15,000 in any one year, the Government of India's sanction is required; it is also necessary for construction expenditure in excess of Rs. 30,000 on a "circuit-house", on the ground that when this limit is exceeded, the house must be intended to receive the Head of a Province when on tour. The restriction with regard to Government Houses was, it may be noted, imposed at the suggestion of the then Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal in 1877.
- 6958-64,
11629-35. We agree with the witnesses who object to these restrictions as unnecessarily minute. As regards Council Governments, we accept the proposal that the Local Government should have the same powers in regard to the buildings in question as it has in respect to ordinary official buildings. It should be left to take the final responsibility for alleged unnecessary expenditure, whereas at present it can shelter itself from public criticism behind the sanction of the Government of India, which it is usually difficult for that Government to refuse. The case of other Provinces is different. In a Council Government the Head of the administration has to obtain the assent of one or more colleagues to such expenditure, and the same is the case in the Government of India with reference to outlay on Viceregal residences; but in the non-Council Provinces there is no such check, and this fact places the Head of the Province in a difficult and invidious position when it becomes a question of sanctioning expenditure connected with his own personal convenience. It seems to us, therefore, that a Lieutenant-Governor (or Chief Commissioner) should get the sanction of the Government of India for considerable special expenditure on Government or circuit houses, but that the limit of his own power of sanction might be raised to Rs. 50,000 a year in respect to any one building.
44482. 44706-10.

Council Governments should be relieved from special restrictions in regard to Government and circuit houses, and the powers of other Governments should be enhanced.

- P.W.D.,
Code,

914-9. 213. (viii.) Government officials generally find their own residential accommodation, though they are occasionally given special house allowances in particularly expensive places. The Government has, however, to provide its officers with houses where private enterprise fails to supply the demand, or where special circumstances necessitate an officer's living in immediate proximity to his work. In such cases the Government assesses the rents, as far as possible, so as to avoid loss, the general principle being that it expects a rent which will yield a return of $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the capital outlay in connexion with the house and site, and provide for the normal cost of maintenance. On the other hand, Government servants are protected by a condition which prevents the levying of more than 10 per cent. of an officer's salary in the shape of rent, and the usual rent limit is taken at 8 per cent. The construction of quarters for officials is on the increase, owing to the growing difficulty of obtaining private accommodation, and it has been held necessary to lay down restrictions upon the construction or purchase of such quarters by Local Governments at undue loss. The special sanction of the Government of India has now to be obtained when the cost of a house and site is such that the interest on capital expenditure and the up-keep charges will exceed 8 per cent. of the average salary of the occupant, unless the total cost is within Rs. 5,000 in the case of a Provincial, and Rs. 2,500 in the case of an Imperial, building.

This restriction and some of the subsidiary rules in connexion therewith have been objected to in various quarters, and it is clear that the rules cause much correspondence. In the single Province of Bombay there were over a hundred references on such questions in the space of five years. Some of them might, however, be obviated by greater economy in construction, in consultation with the Provincial or Imperial Consulting Architect, or by a system of grouping (apparently now adopted in Burma) under which houses of the same description are treated and assessed en bloc, so as to cover any specially large expenditure necessitated by local circumstances on one or more of them.

These principles are sound; but Provincial Governments should be able to depart from them in special cases where they are financially responsible.

214. We consider that the general principles upon which rents are at present assessed are sound, both in respect of the financial interests of Government and of its officers; but that, in cases where it is necessary to make some departure from them, discretion should vest in the Provincial Governments where the cost falls, wholly or in part, upon their revenues. They should be able, that is, in special circumstances, to build more expensive houses than the general rule contemplates, to exceed, if necessary, the limit of 10 per cent. of salary now imposed as a maximum rent charge and, in exceptional cases to charge a rent which does not yield the prescribed return on the cost of the building and site.* We consider this preferable to the suggestion of the Public Works Secretary to the Government of India to raise the limit of rent chargeable to 12 per cent. of salary, and to give Local Governments full power in respect to the construction of houses the rent of which would fall within this limit.

The powers thus allowed to Local Governments should also include full authority in respect to additions and improvements, and to the revaluation of buildings and reassessment of rents where circumstances warrant this course. At present such matters have, in large measure, to receive the special sanction of the Government of India or to be reported to them.

Where the cost would fall wholly upon the Government of India, the power to exempt must ordinarily remain with that Government.

215. In the case of houses for officials constructed through the agency of the Provincial Governments, but chargeable to the Government of India, the power to make exemptions from the present rules must ordinarily continue to rest with that Government, but the limit of capital cost within which the Local Governments have

We do not agree with a suggestion made in Bombay, that the capital and revenue accounts in connexion with Government buildings, now furnished by the Provincial Governments to the Government of India, should be done away with. Under the position now suggested, these returns will be of increased value, as enabling the Government of India to see whether the general principles on which rent should be assessed are being substantially adhered to, and to intervene if such a step seems necessary.

The construction and repair of petty buildings belonging to departments of a Provincial Government outside the Public Works Department may be carried out by officers of those departments, on contract or otherwise, without the intervention of the Department of Public Works up to a limit of Rs. 2,500 in any one case. If a work is estimated to exceed this cost its execution must, when possible, be entrusted to the Public Works Department. The Public Works Secretary to the Government of India was not prepared to raise the Rs. 2,500 limit, on the ground that this would tend to loss of efficiency and economy; but we think the matter is one in which a Provincial Government should be able to exercise full discretion.

Local Governments should have full discretion to allow departmental construction and repair of petty buildings.

218. Provincial Governments outside Madras and Bombay have not power to appoint their own Chief and Superintending Engineers. We were told, however, by the Public Works Secretary to the Government of India that, in practice, the recommendations of the Local Governments in regard to the filling up of Superintending Engineerhips are generally accepted, and that they would be departed from only if there were a considerably senior Executive Engineer in another Province whose promotion had been retarded through no fault of his own. But in promoting to Chief Engineerhips, the claims of the cadre as a whole are more carefully examined by the Government of India.

Provincial Governments, outside Madras and Bombay, cannot appoint their own Chief or Superintending Engineers.

The Governments of Burma and the United Provinces desire larger powers in this respect, while the Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces objects to the present system, as tending to make his Province a dumping ground for officers whose time of retirement is at hand or who are merely awaiting transfer to a larger sphere. The Chief Engineers in the Provinces subject to this system were generally opposed to change; but the Public Works Secretary to the Government of India saw no strong objection to the appointment of Superintending Engineers by the Local Governments, though he thought that there ought to be a single list of Chief Engineers for all Provinces including Madras and Bombay.

219. The arguments in favour of the present procedure are that it equalizes promotions throughout the various Provinces, and enables superior officers to acquire a wider experience than they would have if these appointments were localized.

Arguments for and against maintenance of this system.

On the other hand, it may be urged that the Provincial Public Works staffs are large enough to secure continuous promotion and to provide adequately for the filling of the higher posts; that frequent transfers are undesirable; that officers should be kept as far as possible within the same Province; and that Local Governments are the best judges of their own requirements.

The Governments of all major Provinces should have the same powers as Madras and Bombay.

220. We think that these latter arguments are very cogent, and we cannot agree with Mr. Jacob that a Chief or Superintending Engineer has very little concern with the customs and language of the people whom he is called upon to serve. We hold that he ought to have knowledge of these matters, as also of the revenue law and practice of the Province, and such knowledge can only be obtained by long service within it.

As regards possible inequalities of promotion, we notice that the engineering cadres of the United Provinces and the Punjab already exceed those of Madras and Bombay, while the Burma cadre is equal to that of Madras, and that of Bengal does not fall very largely below it.* The cadres of the Central Provinces and Eastern Bengal and Assam are smaller; but in the Central Provinces irrigation works are likely to develop considerably in the immediate future, while there is evidence that the staff in other Provinces, including Eastern Bengal, is undermanned and will have to be increased when circumstances permit. We consider, therefore, that the Governments of the major Provinces should have the power of appointing their Chief and Superintending Engineers which is already possessed by Madras and Bombay. In the event of a suitable incumbent not being available locally, it would of course be open to, and desirable for, a Local Government to apply for an officer from another Province.

We understand, however, from Mr. Jacob, that these appointments might be distributed amongst the Provinces concerned, leaving it with them to arrange with the college direct, and we think it desirable that this should be done.

223. As regards grades, salaries and the abolition of appointments in the 'Subordinate' grades, Mr. Jacob was prepared to allow Provincial Governments to increase the strength of their establishments provided the extra expenditure involved did not exceed Rs. 25,000 per annum, but not to alter grade distribution or rates of pay. We think, however, that the ordinary financial rules, with which we have already dealt in Chapter III., should suffice, and that there is no need for imposing any special restrictions in regard to Public Works establishments which do not apply to Government services generally.

In regard to Public Works establishments, Local Governments should be under no restrictions which do not apply to Government services generally.

Audit and Accounts.

Para. 165.

224. As already stated, we are in favour of the accounting and audit work in regard to Government monies, whether Imperial or Provincial, being in the hands of the Government of India; and we have no observations to make on the system under which work of this character connected with public works is consolidated under a special Imperial accounts agency, beyond stating that, in our opinion, this agency should, except perhaps as regards railway accounting where the work is of a specially technical description, be placed under the Finance Department of the Government of India, which already controls the accounts work in connexion with the Army and with Post Offices.*

With the possible exception of railways, the Public Works Accounts branch should be transferred to the Finance Department of the Government of India.

Nor should Local Governments be concerned, as they now are to a certain extent, with matters relating to the appointment, promotion, and leave of Public Works 'accountants,' a clerical staff for which they are not financially responsible. The officers of the subordinate accounts establishment might ordinarily be appointed and promoted by the local Examiner, and officers of higher rank by the Accountant-General in the Public Works Department, or by the Government of India, according to the character of the appointment.

Local Governments should cease to be concerned with the appointment, promotion, and leave of Public Works accountants.

225. The Government of India at present require periodical reports from Local Governments as to the conduct and ability of the superior Accounts officers. These reports, which are largely drawn up by the Chief Engineers of the Provinces, are naturally a material factor in the future advancement of the officers concerned. Since the Examiners, as auditors, are independent of the Chief Engineers and Local Governments, and may even be compelled to criticize their actions, we think that this system is unsatisfactory, and we recommend that in future such reports be no longer required. The Examiners should submit reports on the officers who work under them, and the Accountant-General would have sufficient knowledge in regard to the Examiners themselves.*

226. We make the above recommendations in order to secure greater independence of audit for the transactions of a department which is responsible for a very large outlay of public money.

The system of Public Works audit might perhaps be simplified.

We think, however, that the actual system of Public Works audit, which has been complained of by some officers as unduly rigid, especially in regard to such matters as vouchers and returns, might perhaps be simplified, though as in the cognate case of the Civil Accounts Department we are not prepared to express any definite opinion on the subject.

Public Works Code.

Character and scope of the Public Works Code.

227. The Public Works Department Code, in its latest edition (the ninth), is comprised in three volumes. Volume I. (420 pages), arranged in 12 chapters and 1392 articles, deals with the organization of the department and the duties of officers; personal matters affecting civil and military officers, e.g., leave, discipline and allowances; office arrangements; designs, estimates and contracts; the execution of works; public buildings; and accounts. Volume II. (188 pages), divided into 19 chapters and 1971 articles, is mainly concerned with audit, budget procedure and reports, but also contains provisions regarding the classification of works, and powers of sanction in respect thereto. Volume III. (297 pages) contains 30 appendices, which are collections of rules on different matters, ranging from rewards for oriental languages to instructions for photo-zincographic reproductions, and from the care and use of cemeteries and churches to the supply of European stores for India.

Under Article 2 of Volume I., no general rulings of other departments are applicable to the Public Works Department except in so far as they are contained in the Civil Service Regulations. In some instances, however, (e.g., Article 1207) relevant articles of the Civil Account Code are quoted in extenso, while in others a Civil Account Code Article is reproduced under a different number in the Public Works Code.

228. The code deals, in short, with all matters which concern Public Works officers and the Governments under which they serve, in regard to executive and accounts work; and a number of its articles have already been referred to above. In regard to the code as a whole, we have received complaints from some of the principal Public Works officers in the Provinces as to the unnecessary stringency and complication of a number of its rules, and the Public Works Secretary to the Government of India admits that a thorough revision of it would be desirable, though he said that his department could not at present spare the staff which would be required to carry this out.

codes, one for Madras, one for Bombay, and one for the rest of India.

229. It is obvious that rules must be laid down by the Government of India in matters where uniformity is required, and it seems to us desirable that such rules should be collected in an accessible form, and classified on intelligible principles. We are, therefore, in favour of the maintenance of a single general code, but this should be of a much simpler character than that now existing. The present code contains matter which we consider to be out of place in such a compilation, e.g., rules on matters which arise only in certain Provinces, as in regard to opium buildings; and rulings which should be entirely matters of executive instruction, e.g., regarding office establishments, correspondence, the training of Assistant Engineers, non-employment of upper subordinates in clerical work, and so on. Moreover, many of the articles are drawn up in a form which appears unnecessarily complicated and involved.

A general code of this character is desirable, but the present code should be materially simplified.

We think that the idea of making the code a general official vade mecum for engineer and accounts officers throughout India should be abandoned; and that it should, as in the case of the Civil Account Code, be revised by a Committee, which should confine its provisions to rulings necessary for general application in the interests of Imperial finance and control. All matters in which such uniformity is not necessary should be excluded, as their inclusion only leads to undesirable rigidity and increases the difficulty of modification. In so far as they cannot be sufficiently dealt with in ordinary executive instructions, these should be embodied in separate Provincial manuals. As instances of such matters, we may specify provisions relating to the duties of the various classes of officers; their financial powers, in so far as it is desirable to give Local Governments full discretion in varying these; and everything connected with the entertainment, discipline and duties of subordinate establishments. Further, when it is necessary that the Public Works Code should embody provisions of the Civil Service Regulations or Civil Account Code, these should be quoted separately under the original numbers of the articles in the codes from which they are taken.

REVENUE AND AGRICULTURE. CONTROL OVER PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS IN MATTERS RELATING TO LAND REVENUE.

Vol. X.,
App. Ib,
p. 188.

230. The Revenue and Agriculture Department of the Government of India was first constituted as a separate Department in 1871, and, after temporary abolition in 1879, was re-constituted in 1881 in pursuance of the recommendations of the Famine Commission of 1878-80. Up to 1905, though possessing a separate Secretary, it was under the charge of the Home Member, but in connexion with the re-arrangement of portfolios which took place in that year, consequent on the creation of a Department of Commerce and Industry, it passed to a separate Member of Council, who was also entrusted with the care of the Civil Public Works Department.

almost exclusively Imperial, and we have no recommendations to make in respect thereto. The rest, namely, Land Revenue and connected subjects, Forests, Agriculture and Veterinary, are mainly administered by the Local Governments under the control of the Government of India, and are dealt with in this, and in the following, chapter.

Subjects connected with Land Revenue.

232. The various groups of subjects coming under, or closely connected with, the general head of Land Revenue may be classified as concerned with—

- (i.) Revenue settlements ;
- (ii.) Collection of land revenue ;
- (iii.) Rent and revenue legislation ;
- (iv.) Disposal of land which is the property of Government, including mining concessions ;
- (v.) Relief of agricultural indebtedness ; and
- (vi.) Famine relief.

p. 190.

Differences between
revenue matters.

233. The most important branch of administration in every Province is that connected with the assessment and collection of land revenue, and with the numerous subsidiary questions arising in regard to land in a country whose main industry is agriculture, and in which the State has always claimed a portion of the produce of the soil. But in these matters the circumstances of the various Provinces are widely different. We do not propose to describe these in detail, but for a clear understanding of our recommendations it is necessary to indicate briefly certain essential distinctions between typical systems of land tenure.

"permanent" and "temporary"
settlement.

In the two Bengals, and in a portion of Madras and the United Provinces, there is a system of "permanent settlement," under which the State has commuted its share of the produce to a fixed sum payable in perpetuity, while elsewhere the system is one of "temporary settlement," under which the State demands are periodically re-assessed after the expiration of a term of years.

Zemindari and
systems.

234. There is another distinction, between zemindari and raiyatwari systems, which lies mainly in the method of assessment, and in the recognition by law of a tenant class in the one case, and not in the other.*

Under the zemindari, or landlord, system, the State demand is assessed on the village or estate, which may be owned by a single proprietor, or by a proprietary body of co-sharers jointly responsible for payment of the revenue. The demand is a definite sum payable either in perpetuity (where the "permanent settlement" prevails), or for a fixed term of years, during which the whole of any increased profits due to extension of cultivation, enhancement of rents, &c., is enjoyed by the individual landlord or the proprietary body. Under the raiyatwari, or peasant proprietary, system, the assessment is on

* The larger Provinces may be roughly classified as follows :—
Zemindari, Bengal and Eastern Bengal, Madras (about one-third) United Provinces, Punjab (proprietary cultivating communities) and the Central Provinces proper ; Raiyatwari, Madras (two-thirds), Bombay, Burma, Assam, and Berar. In the Punjab and the United Provinces, however, the present tendency is for co-sharers to divide their responsibilities and become directly responsible to Government for their separate shares.

each field as demarcated by the cadastral survey. It takes the form of revenue rates for different classes of land, which are settled for a term of years ; and as the occupant may surrender any portion of his holding, or obtain an unoccupied field, the total sum payable by him as revenue may vary from year to year.

In the zemindari system, the basis of the revenue demand is the rent realized by the landlord from his tenants, while in raiyyatwari areas, this factor is largely absent, and the assessment rests on a valuation of the yield of the various classes of soil and other considerations.

235. The character and incidence of land tenures differ again, not only from Province to Province, but in different parts of the same Province, according to local circumstances and traditions, and the methods of the various Native Governments to whose responsibilities we succeeded. Consequently each Province has its own land revenue system, based on a local Land Revenue Code, or specific Acts dealing with land-revenue matters, such legislative provisions being supplemented by standing orders issued by Boards of Revenue, Financial Commissioners or, where these do not exist, by the Provincial Government itself. The control of the Government of India is, in the main, limited to the laying down of certain general lines of policy, accompanied in most Provinces by specific restrictions in regard to particular matters, the more important of which will be discussed below.

General control of the Government of India in land revenue matters.

SETTLEMENTS.

236. In the temporarily settled tracts the most important questions relating to the land are those coming within the scope of the periodical "settlements" of land revenue, which fix, for each district, or other area forming the subject of a separate settlement, the amount of the assessment which the Government will levy on every holding for a period extending generally to 20 or 30 years.*

The character of revenue settlements in temporarily settled tracts.

A settlement may include (a) a survey and demarcation of boundaries ; (b) an enquiry into, and a record of, the rights of various parties interested in the land ; and (c) a revision of assessment—or any one of these operations. During the past twenty-five years measures have been steadily pursued with the object of shortening and simplifying settlement procedure, by the elimination of processes (a) and (b) when a revision of settlements is undertaken. With this object, every Province is provided with a Land Records department for keeping the village maps and records up to date, and preserving the survey boundary marks. Moreover, the complexity of assessment work has been materially reduced—in zemindari areas—by a change from estimated assets during the currency of the settlement to actual rental at its commencement, as the basis of assessment, and—in raiyyatwari tracts—by the acceptance of previous soil classifications unless patently faulty.

*. In the two Bengals the only large temporarily settled areas lie in Orissa, Chittagong, Chota Nagpur and the Darjeeling Terai. But throughout these Provinces there are scattered individual estates, or groups of estates, not under permanent settlement, the assessment levied on which is liable to periodic revision.

Settlement
officers and Settlement
Commissioners.

The Government of India fitly lay down general principles in regard to settlements.

They also occasion, in particular Provinces, where the land revenue system is held to be defective.

Otherwise
Madras and Bombay have practically a free hand in settlement and cognate matters, but the other major Provinces are subject to restrictions in regard to:—
(a) Assessment instructions.
(b) Inception of settlements.

237. Settlement operations of any importance are now everywhere carried out by Indian Civilians, or persons of like status, who are placed on special duty for that purpose; and in most Provinces there is a separate Settlement Commissioner who deals with questions raised in the Settlement officer's reports and proposals.

238. The Government of India, with the concurrence of the Secretary of State, have from time to time laid down general principles in regard to such questions as the duration of the settlements, matters which shall be taken into account in fixing the assessments, and the limit of these, e.g., that the Government demand shall not usually exceed one-half of the net assets which the landholder draws from his holding. These are all matters which have such political importance, as affecting the general well-being of the agricultural population, and also the financial stability of the country, that they are the legitimate subject of control by the Central Government.

239. The Government of India have again, on occasion, intervened in particular Provinces where they thought that the land revenue system was defective. In Bombay, for example, such intervention has of late years led to the adoption of more liberal methods for suspension and remission of revenue in bad seasons, and the establishment of a system of record-of-rights in the land. We have had it from witnesses whose opinion is entitled to much weight, that these changes were generally beneficial, nor has the legitimacy of the Government of India's action in this respect been challenged in the memorandum submitted to us by the Government of Bombay.

In 1872 the Madras Government objected to the intervention of the Government of India in certain settlement proceedings, on the strength of a letter of 1856 from the Supreme Government, which had left to the Governor in Council, subject to the orders of the Court of Directors the final disposal of various questions then being discussed in connexion with a reform of the Madras settlement system. It was, however, ruled by the Government of India, with the approval of the Secretary of State, that such orders did not affect the statutory powers of control vested in the Supreme Government by the Charter Act of 1833.

240. Apart from such general or occasional action by the Government of India, the Governments of Madras and Bombay have practically a free hand in settlement and cognate matters, but the other major Provinces are subject to more detailed control, in the following respects.

241. Assessment instructions.—The general principles of assessment, laid down in the "assessment instructions" of these Provinces, are subject to the approval of the Government of India.

Inception of settlements.—No settlement can be undertaken without the previous sanction of the Government of India, before whom a carefully prepared estimate of financial results must be placed. Instructions to this effect were first issued in 1881, the intention being partly to obtain information of financial importance, but chiefly to prevent expenditure and harassment of the people in cases in which there was no substantial reason for a new settlement. The sanction of the Government of India to the inception of settlements is also required by statutory provision in the Punjab, the Central Provinces and Assam.

242. Confirmation of settlements.—(i.) The Government of the United Provinces and the Punjab are empowered by law to confirm settlements; but under the Punjab assessment instructions, if the reassessment of a tahsil falls short of the original forecast by more than 15 per cent., the sanction of the Government of India has to be obtained unless the deficiency is covered by a surplus in other tahsils concomitantly assessed.

(ii.) The law requires settlements in the Central Provinces to be confirmed by the Government of India; and, under executive instructions, a report has to be submitted to that Government for each tahsil, containing full particulars of the proposed settlement conditions. Should there subsequently be reason to suppose that the financial results will differ by more than 10 per cent. from those sanctioned on the original report, the deviation must be reported and explained. A modification of these orders, which would give the Chief Commissioner greater power to approve of assessment proposals, was under consideration when we took evidence.

(iv.) In Bengal and Eastern Bengal, under orders issued by the Government of India in 1881, settlements require the previous sanction of that Government, before whom a carefully prepared estimate of financial results must first be placed. It was, however, decided in 1887 that these orders should not apply to the petty settlements annually conducted by the Board of Revenue and Collectors without special reference to the Local Government.

243. Settlement calendars.—The Government of India obtain annually from all Local Governments a 'calendar' of land revenue settlements. This return exhibits the term of the current district settlements, the dates on which they will expire, and the amount of the revenue demand. In the case of settlements the term of which has expired, or is within two years of expiry, information is given as to the measures (if any) taken towards revision. The Government of India are thus in a position to check any delay in the revision of expired settlements.

Settlement
their character.

Under the revenue laws, an assessment of which the term has expired remains current until a fresh settlement is made; but in practice such extensions must be regularized by the approval of the authority whose sanction would be necessary for revision of the settlement, viz., the Local Government in Madras and Bombay, and the Government of India elsewhere. Extensions of a time-expired settlement are not infrequently granted in special circumstances, such, for instance, as the recent occurrence of famine.

settlements.

244. Outside regular settlements of districts or portions of districts, and during their currency, small tracts, or individual villages or estates may come under assessment, or revision of assessment, for various reasons. These special, or "summary," settlements, as well as the revision of rents in escheated and other properties held by the Government as an ordinary landlord, are dealt with by Local Governments or subordinate revenue authorities (according to their importance) without reference to the Government of India.

The powers of most Local Governments in respect to land revenue settlements have undergone considerable limitation since 1880.

245. It will be seen from the facts quoted above that, since 1880, there has been considerable limitation of the powers of most Local Governments in respect to land revenue settlements.

The Government of Burma now asks for powers to commence and confirm settlements without reference to the Government of India; and we have had suggestions in the Central Provinces and the Punjab as to the desirability of giving larger powers to Local Governments. The Revenue Secretary to the Government of India admits that no material inconvenience has resulted from the power allowed to the Governments of Madras and Bombay in these matters, and is disposed to give the other Provinces a much freer hand than they at present possess, though not quite such full powers as the Presidency Governments enjoy.

All the major Provinces might now receive the same free hand as Madras and Bombay already possess.

We consider that all the major Provinces might now be placed on the same footing as Madras and Bombay, and that it will suffice if their Settlement proceedings continue to be submitted to the Government of India for information, so that that Government may still be able to intervene, as they have done in time past, when they see reason to suppose that a particular district settlement is not in accordance with the general methods which they desire to see observed.* This was, in fact, the principle laid down by the Government of India themselves, in a despatch of 12th March, 1875, to the Secretary of State, by whom it was accepted. "We consider," this despatch ran, "that while it is necessary that the approval of the Government of India should be obtained before any substantial alterations in the principle of the assessment of the land revenue is introduced in any part of British India, it is not desirable that the Government of India should undertake the function of dealing with the details of the particular settlements carried out in accordance with the principles which have been established, and it will very rarely occur that it will be necessary to interpose to prevent the action of the Local Government with regard to such details."

These observations have now far greater force. The major Provinces are at present all largely interested (generally to the extent of one-half) in the land revenue receipts, and are financially liable for the whole of the expenditure incurred in land revenue administration; and in 1902 the Government of India were able to issue a Resolution which contained "an authoritative exposition of the principles on which the land revenue administration in India has been based in the past, and by which it should be guided in the future." Moreover, settlements on a scientific basis have now been generally completed, and those to be made hereafter will be, in the main, merely of a revisory character.

246. The settlement calendars mentioned in paragraph 243 should, however, be retained, for the information of the Government of India, and to permit their intervention if they should consider that resettlements are being unduly delayed.

Settlement calendars should be retained.

44429. 247. Our proposals for relaxation of control by the Government of India over settlement operations do not include the surveys and records-of-rights made under Chapter 10 of the Bengal Tenancy Act of 1885. Under section 101 of that Act, the previous sanction of the Governor General in Council is ordinarily required to an order directing the making of a survey and the preparation of a record-of-rights. The Revenue Secretary to the Government of India, who is himself an experienced Bengal officer, states that any proposal to relax the control of the Government of India in this direction would probably rouse strong feeling among the zemindars of the two Bengals. Further, the cost of the survey and record-of-rights operations now contemplated in those Provinces is estimated to exceed $3\frac{1}{2}$ crores of rupees, which will be gradually advanced by the Government of India, who will themselves bear a substantial portion of the outlay. The Secretary of State has directed that operations of this character shall not be commenced on any large scale until the Government of India have been informed of the proposals and have accepted them.

Necessity for continuing present control by the Government of India over surveys and record-of-rights under the Bengal Tenancy Act.

44049. 248. Duration of settlements.—Thirty years, a period corresponding roughly with a generation, is the normal period of settlement in Madras and in Bombay proper, and in 1895 the Secretary of State decided that the same period should be adopted in the United Provinces. As regards the other Provinces—which are economically less developed, and in which circumstances may occasionally undergo rapid change owing to extension of irrigational facilities, or the occupation of waste lands—it was laid down that 30 years for some districts, and 20 years in most, should be the ordinary term for settlements in the Punjab, and that a 30 years term should not be applied without the sanction of the Government of India. Twenty years was also to be the ordinary term in the Central Provinces, while in Burma, Assam and Sind the terms were to be still shorter.* In Assam, however, the period has now been extended to 20 years for occupied lands, and the Government of Burma was recently asked to consider whether the term of settlement in that Province could not also be extended.

Duration of settlements.

39251. The Punjab Government has suggested to us an enhancement of its powers in this respect, and its Chief Secretary argues that it should be able to sanction 30 year settlements.

249. Here, again, it seems to us that, in the major Provinces, Provincial Governments might have power to increase the normal settlement period up to a maximum of 30 years, or to take a less period than that normally fixed for the Province in districts in which exceptional circumstances justify this course, subject to observance of the following principles which were laid down by the Secretary of State in 1905. "In backward tracts, and under exceptional circumstances, shorter terms may be fixed; and such circumstances and conditions may also justify an abbreviation, in the case of an individual district or portion of a district, of the normal term . . . But it will not be sufficient, for purposes of such justification, merely to show that it is inexpedient to impose at present the full amount of enhancement which a consideration of existing assets would warrant: it will be necessary to go further, and to show also that the present condition of the tract is such, and the development that may be reasonably anticipated so rapid, that at the end of the normal term, if not abbreviated, it will probably be found impossible to secure to Government a reasonably full share of the assets as they may then be found to stand."*

Limitations in regard to enhancement of assessments at fresh settlement.

250. In Bombay, the amount by which assessments may be enhanced at a new settlement is limited to a fixed percentage over the old revenue in regard to (a) tahsils, or groups of villages, (b) individual villages and (c) individual holdings. In other Provinces there are no such specific limitations; but where the increase in the case of an individual land-holder exceeds a certain amount, its application is ordinarily extended over a term of years, and this system applies in Bombay also.

251. The Government of India have now under consideration the possibility of laying down definite rules limiting the amount of increase in assessment which may be imposed at any settlement, and we think that this would be entirely within their functions. The disposal of this matter ought not, however, to delay the grant to Local Governments of a freer hand in regard to Settlement procedure generally.

The general principles of assessment should be embodied in Provincial legislation.

252. We consider that the general principles of assessment, such, for instance, as the proportion of the net profits on the land which the Government shall be entitled to take, and the period of settlements, should be embodied in Provincial legislation instead of being left to executive order, as is now the case outside Bombay.

Subject to any general principles which the Government of India may prescribe, Local Governments should have discretion in the levy of water rates.

253. Where settlements of land revenue are based on special irrigational facilities, their confirmation is subject to the rules applicable to ordinary land revenue settlements: thus settlements in Sind are confirmed by the Government of Bombay without reference to the Government of India. In most Provinces, however, rates for the use of canal water are levied independently of the land revenue. In Madras, Bombay, Bengal and Burma the Local Governments are empowered to fix such rates without reference to the Government of India.† Under the Northern India Canals and Drainage Act, which applies to the United Provinces, the Punjab and the Central Provinces, rules regulating such charges require the previous sanction of the Governor-General in Council. In the Central Provinces there are at present no irrigation canals; in the United Provinces the irrigation revenue has now been almost wholly provincialized; while in the Punjab it is shared between the Provincial and the Central Governments. The Revenue Secretary to the Government of India justifies the present control of his Government over water rates by this circumstance in the latter Province, but the same division of receipts exists in Bombay and Burma. The levy of water rates seems to us to be a matter to be left to the Local Governments, subject to any general principles, which the Government of India may from time to time prescribe.

254. Rules in connexion with the creation and remuneration of settlement appointments were promulgated by the Government of India in 1895-6, after reference to the Secretary of State. Their effect is as follows :—

connexion with the creation and remuneration of settlement
appointments.

As to pay.

(i.) The remuneration of settlement appointments is fixed by definite rules, which allow, within fixed limits, a special addition to the ordinary salary of the officers holding them. No reference to the Government of India or the Secretary of State is required, save when the emoluments of an officer exceed Rs. 2,000 a month.

As to time.

(ii) The Supreme Government, and the Governments of Madras and Bombay, can sanction all settlement appointments without restriction, subject only to a half-yearly report to the Secretary of State.

C. S. R.
Art. 78 (a).

(iii) Other Provincial Governments can do the like only in respect of officers whose emoluments do not exceed Rs. 250 a month, or who are employed on settlements of which the cost is chargeable to private parties. Otherwise their power of appointment is limited to six months. The Government of India have to be referred to in respect of longer periods, as also for any extension of a settlement appointment beyond the term originally sanctioned.

255. The Governments of Burma and Eastern Bengal and Assam ask for larger latitude in regard to the sanction of settlement appointments, and the same view has been put before us in the Central Provinces, while the Revenue Secretary to the Government of India states that he also would welcome an extension of the powers of Provincial Governments.

In these respects the Governments of all the major Provinces should possess the powers already granted to Madras and Bombay.

Even allowing for the larger powers in respect to the creation of temporary appointments which these Governments will obtain under our financial proposals, rules of the above character appear to us to be unduly restrictive. With the large interest which the principal Local Governments now have in the land revenue, the economical conduct of settlement operations is of even greater importance to them than to the Government of India, and the power which the latter have obtained from the Secretary of State of sanctioning settlement appointments outside the ordinary rules, might now be delegated to the Governments of all the major Provinces, instead of only to Madras and Bombay. They would remain bound by the Rs. 2,000 a month limit of pay referred to above. The Secretary of State's sanction would be needed to this delegation ; and we further suggest that a half-yearly return of settlement appointments, now furnished to him, should be discontinued.

COLLECTION OF LAND REVENUE.

256. On the 25th March, 1905, the Government of India, with the approval of the Secretary of State, issued a general Resolution laying down the conditions upon which suspensions or remissions of the ordinary land revenue demand might be allowed in the case of wide-spread calamity such as general failure of crops, or with reference to local or isolated calamities such as those arising from hail-storms or floods. The object was to simplify the procedure, and to make more liberal provision for the grant of relief of this description in the event of considerable loss of crops. So far, the Resolution was of a distinctly salutary character, and appears to have been generally accepted as such; but complaint has been made in some quarters that the detailed rules which had to be framed for each Province, in order to carry out the general instructions of the Supreme Government, were required to be submitted to the latter authority. It seems to us that this was unnecessary.

Instructions by the Government of India as to the assessment of improvements, etc.

257. Kists.

258. Subject to such general instructions, the Local Governments have a free hand to suspend and remit land revenue for temporary or exceptional causes, and to fix the instalments in which the land revenue demand shall be paid (kists), but where the shifting of a kist date materially affects the periods at which land revenues come in, the Government of India have to be informed.

In land revenue and in other matters, rules made under a local Act should not require the previous sanction of the Government of India.

259. Rules under the Lower Burma Land and Revenue Act require to be sanctioned by the Governor General in Council, whereas in Upper Burma similar rules are only subject to the Governor-General's control. In the latter sub-province, however, rules relating to process serving establishments require the sanction of the Government of India. The same sanction is necessary in Assam, and in the Central Provinces, to rules framed under local land revenue laws.

RENT AND REVENUE LEGISLATION.

Undesirable to grant larger powers to the Bengal Government under sec. 112 of the Bengal Tenancy Act.

260. Proposals for legislation affecting the relations between landlords and tenants, or the occupancy of land, have to be carefully examined and reviewed in the Revenue Secretariat of the Government of India, but are rarely initiated there.

Vol. X.,
App. Ib.
p. 190.

We agree with the Revenue Secretary in rejecting a proposal of the Bengal Government to transfer to itself the powers vested in the Government of India by section 112 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. That section was amended in 1907, with the object of giving the Government fuller powers to settle rents as between landlord and tenant in cases where these had been improperly enhanced; and to withdraw the control of the Government of India, which was specifically inserted in the amending legislation, so soon after such legislation was effected, would be undesirable.

261. By sections 39-41 of the Government of India Act of 1858, all lands and property in the possession of the East India Company became vested in the Crown, the Secretary of State in Council was empowered to sell and dispose of property so held, and expenditure from the revenues of India, both there and elsewhere, was declared to be subject to his control.

Subsequently, by section 1 of the Government of India Act of 1859, the Governor General in Council, and the Local Governments, were, subject to such provisions or restrictions as the Secretary of State in Council might from time to time prescribe, "empowered to sell and dispose of all real and personal estate whatsoever in India for the time being vested in Her Majesty."

Des.
No. 21,
Leg., of 9th July,
1862.

262. In 1862 the Secretary of State directed the Government of India not to "initiate any grants involving loss of revenue, or hold out expectations of such grants being made, without obtaining the previous sanction of Her Majesty's Government."

Necessity for control over the alienation of Government
interests in land by the Indian Governments.

The practice of thus specially referring grants of land to the Secretary of State has, however, long ceased, and save in cases of exceptional importance, these are now communicated to him only through the medium of the printed proceedings of the Government of India. But the principle formulated by the Secretary of State (in the same despatch) that concessions which involve surrender of the Government land revenue, or other interest in land, should be subject to restriction in like manner with the grant of pensions or other direct pecuniary outlay, has always been maintained. That there should be restrictions of this character is only legitimate, having regard to the intimate connexion of the State, in India, with the land, and the fact that a surrender of State rights may often be equivalent to a large pecuniary grant, while the effect of such concessions is obscured by the fact that they do not pass regularly through the public accounts, and are much more difficult to withdraw than money allowances.

263. The existing restrictions are, however, very complicated. Separate, and not altogether consistent, rules have been laid down, from time to time, upon such matters as concessions, grants and leases by the Indian Governments for industrial enterprises; the sale or grant of land for non-agricultural purposes; concessions having for their object colonization or the reclamation of waste lands; the alienation or redemption of the Government land revenue; partial or entire remission of the land revenue demand, and the assignment of land revenue to private individuals or local bodies.

But the existing restrictions are unduly complicated, and the policy of the Secretary of State and the Government of India has not always been consistent.

Further, the policy of the Secretary of State and the Government of India in regard to measures which would have the effect of sacrificing the future interests of Government in land has not always been consistent. Thus, in 1862, the Secretary of State advocated the extension to other Provinces of the permanent settlement prevailing in Bengal, and though this measure was never actually adopted, the idea was not formally relinquished till 1883. In 1858-61, again, the Government of India and the Secretary of State were in favour of a policy permitting the redemption in perpetuity of the existing land revenue demand on occupied lands, and the grant of waste lands free of all future land-revenue charges ; but the scope of these orders as regards redemption was restricted, in 1862, to the case of lands required for dwelling houses, factories, gardens, plantations, and other similar purposes. In 1872 sales of waste land, revenue-free in perpetuity, were forbidden without the previous sanction of the Government of India, except in the case of small plots not exceeding 10 acres in extent ; and in 1897 the limited discretion hitherto allowed to Local Governments in these respects was, subject to certain minor exceptions, withdrawn altogether.*

"Proprietary" and "revenue" rights of Government in vacant
Crown land.

264. For a clear understanding of the present position it is necessary to discriminate between two separate interests which the Government has in vacant Crown lands. The first, which may be styled the "proprietary right," relates to the value which such land would have if held by a private individual, subject to the payment of Government land revenue. The second, which may be termed the "revenue right," is measured by the land-revenue which would accrue were the land in private occupancy for agricultural purposes.

Local Governments have usually a free hand in the grant of land for cultivation : an undesirable exception in the case of Burma.

265. Proprietary rights.—As regards the grant by Government of its proprietary rights in lands at its disposal, Local Governments usually have a free hand in the grant of Crown land for purposes of cultivation subject to the ordinary land revenue assessment, and in raiyatwari Provinces such grants are normal features of the administration. There is, however, an exception, which we consider undesirable, in Burma, where, under the present land revenue laws, special sanction of the Government of India is required to any alteration in the rules governing such grants.

Grant of waste lands on special terms, with the specific sanction of the Government of India, or under the Provincial
waste-land rules.
Local Governments should ordinarily be able to amend these rules.

266. Government waste lands may likewise be granted, upon special terms, in order to develop cultivation, to colonize or settle particular tracts, or to promote the introduction by capitalists of important agricultural products. Leases or grants of this description which involve questions of colonization, or raise important principles of policy, have to be submitted to the Government of India for approval. Other cases are dealt with under Provincial waste-land rules, which are often outside the ordinary revenue law and derive their force from special enactments, e.g., the Government Tenants (Punjab) Act III. of 1893 and the Government Occupants (Sind) Act III. of 1899. Such rules may be issued independently by the Madras and Bombay Governments, but in other Provinces they have to be sanctioned by the Government of India. Thus the Punjab waste-land rules empowered the Financial Commissioner to grant leases of land irrigable from a canal up to 50 acres in each case, and the Commissioner to lease up to the same limit in the case of land not irrigable from a canal. We understand that the Local Government recently desired to increase the limits to 150 and 75 acres respectively ; and as this involved a change in the rules, the modification had to be referred to the Government of India for sanction.

267. The lease or grant of land for industrial purposes is governed by rules laid down by the Secretary of State under the Government of India Act of 1859 referred to in paragraph 261. Under these rules, Local Governments may not make any concession to a joint stock company without the sanction of the Government of India: otherwise, they may grant leases of land (not resumable at six months' notice) up to five years, provided (inter alia) the concession of property or rights involved does not exceed one lakh of rupees in value. The corresponding powers of the Government of India are ten years and 12 lakhs. These rules do not apply to mining concessions, which will be noticed separately.

The Secretary of State's rules in respect to the lease or grant of land for industrial purposes.

268. The sale or grant of land—i.e. of the proprietary rights of Government therein—for non-agricultural purposes is further regulated by instructions laid down by the Government of India in a Resolution of the 6th February, 1872. Under these a Local Government may sell land for its full market value up to Rs. 10,000 in each case, and for between half and full value up to Rs. 1,000, if such sale is for a public purpose: otherwise the Government of India have to be referred to.

Restrictions by the Government of India on the sale or grant of land by Local Governments for non-agricultural purposes.

A Local Government may also grant its proprietary right in land required for the construction, at the cost of local or municipal funds, of a Government school, dispensary, hospital, or other public work up to a total value of Rs. 3,000; while it may make a similar grant for any other public purpose, or to a private person for services to be performed to the State, up to Rs. 500, and, if the service is to be performed to the community up to Rs. 100. In other cases the sanction of the Government of India has to be obtained, and an annual return is required showing the cases in which the Local Governments have exercised the powers conferred upon them.

R. and A.
Pros.,
Oct., 1897,
Nos. 1-6.

269. Revenue rights.—Local Governments may allow the redemption or alienation of the land revenue upon small plots such as building sites, vacant spaces, and gardens or grounds attached to buildings, where the trouble and expense of collecting the assessment would be disproportionate to the amount involved. Such plots are generally known as nazul areas. Similarly it is permissible, in Bengal, to sell petty properties which come into the hands of Government in permanently settled areas: but subject to exceptions of this nature, the previous sanction of the Government of India is required for the sale or disposal of land, revenue-free in perpetuity.

Subject to certain exceptions, the sanction of the Government of India is required for the disposal of land revenue-free.

270. There remains the case of the surrender or suspension of the revenue demand in connexion with land required for public purposes or as a matter of policy or favour.* Lands which are given for specific public purposes, e.g., for roads, or as sites of hospitals or schools, are exempt from assessment to land revenue subject to the conditions—

(i.) That when the value of the land revenue proposed to be remitted, capitalized at 4 per cent., exceeds the limits mentioned in paragraph 268 regarding alienations of land, the previous sanction of the Government of India shall be obtained ; and (ii.) That the exemption shall continue only for such time as the purpose for which the land was granted is fulfilled.

Such exemption is not, however, granted in the case of lands given for markets, cart stands and similar objects, from which an income is raised.

Restrictions on similar grant of land for private purposes.

271. The grant of land, revenue-free, to private persons for a private purpose is now strictly limited and discouraged. Grants of this sort made by previous native rulers, or in the early days of British administration, are of course respected ; but otherwise, the grant to a private person of land revenue-free, or the assignment to him of the land revenue derived from land occupied by others, is confined, save under the special sanction of the Government of India, to the following cases :—

(i.) Special concessions under the waste-land rules, which may allow remission of the land revenue while the land is being cleared, and for a time afterwards.

(ii.) Grants, which are being largely replaced by money payments, for services by village officials.

(iii.) Grants for special services rendered to the police or the criminal administration, subject to a total capitalized value of Rs. 500, or an assignment of land revenue not exceeding Rs. 15 a year, for one life or for a term of 25 years, whichever period may be the longer.

(iv.) The creation, in the Punjab and the Frontier Province, of muajis, or revenue-free holdings, at the re-settlement of a district, to a value not exceeding Rs. 100 per annum in each case, for the term of settlement or the life of the grantee. This concession regularized what had long been the practice of the Punjab Government.*

Certain general principles now suggested in respect of :—

272. We have received suggestions from various Local Governments and witnesses, principally in Madras, Burma, the Punjab and the Frontier Province, as to the desirability of giving larger powers to Provincial Governments in the matter of concessions of Government interests in land. The Revenue Secretary to the Government of India† informs us that the pecuniary limits now imposed on the Local Governments, and referred to in paragraphs 268 and 270, will probably be somewhat raised. It seems to us, however, that this method is an unsatisfactory makeshift, and we prefer to suggest the following general principles for the carrying out of the policy upon which we conceive the present restrictions to be based. It should be understood that where we limit the powers of the Local Governments, it will still be open to them to apply to the Government of India for sanction to special concessions in particular cases.

As regards the assignment of land. 8713-5, Vol. II., App. p. 328, 10660-4, 12136-9, 13043-5, 13986-9, 14155, Vol. III. (a) Alienation of the "proprietary" rights of Government.

273. With regard to the alienation of the proprietary rights of Government—

(i.) In view of the usual tendency of land to increase in value, especially in large towns, there should be no permanent alienation of such rights by Local Governments, save in the case of land granted for cultivation under the ordinary land-revenue or waste-land rules of the Province.

* Grants of land, or of land revenue, are also made within certain limits by the Government of India, to native officers of the Indian Army, on the recommendation of the Commander-in-Chief, upon the score of exceptional and distinguished service.

R. and A. Pros., Nov. 1893, Nos. 35-6.

(ii.) Local Governments should have full power to grant leases of their proprietary rights in land on a true commercial rent, with or without an initial premium, provided the rent charged, over and above the land-revenue assessment*, is liable to revision at stated intervals not exceeding 30 years.

(iii.) They should be allowed to give leases upon favourable terms, or with no charge for proprietary rights, provided the land is to be used for some recognized public purpose, and that it is resumable

(a) If not fully applied to such purpose.

(b) If subsequently required for Government purposes, on repayment of any sum which the Government may have received in respect of the unexpired period of the lease, plus the cost of standing buildings, or improvements made by the grantee.

(iv.) They should also be able to lease land on favourable terms, in consideration of services rendered, or to be rendered, by individuals to the State or the community, other than those contemplated in clause (iii.), provided that,

(a) The terms of such lease shall not exceed the life of the recipient or 30 years, whichever period is greater ;

(b) The full pecuniary value of such concession as deduced by comparing the terms charged with a true commercial rental, shall not exceed Rs. 1,000 for the total period (or estimated actuarial period) of the lease.

Such land should, of course, be resumable at any time if the services in respect of which it is granted are not actually performed.

Para. 267

(v.) Understanding that the restrictions laid down by the Secretary of State's rules of 1894 as regards industrial concessions do not apply to the leases of land for such purposes as shops, factories, &c., which should be governed by our clause (ii.), we do not think it incumbent upon us to criticize the working of these rules.

274. In respect to the alienation of revenue rights—

(i.) No permanent alienation should be allowed, save as at present permitted in the case of nazul areas and petty properties in Bengal, &c.

(ii.) Temporary reduction or suspension of land revenue for the encouragement of agricultural development should be governed by the Provincial waste-land rules.

(iii.) A Local Government should have full power to exempt from assessment all land used for recognized public purposes, so long as it continues to be so used.

(iv.) Temporary exemption from land revenue, or assignment of land revenue rights, may be made in the circumstances, and within the pecuniary limits, specified in clause (iv.) of the preceding paragraph.

275. We consider that, as in the case of the land revenue assessment, the general principles governing the alienation of Government land or Government interests therein should be made the subject of legislation.

276. In Burma, as an exception to the general rule which debars the Indian Governments from granting any special assistance to religious bodies as such, the Local Government and the Financial Commissioner have been allowed to grant land of any description for religious purposes up to the value of Rs. 200, and Deputy Commissioners up to Rs. 100. This exception was made in consideration of the practice of the former Burmese Government and the strong native sentiment on the subject, and of the fact that Buddhist religious institutions are also partly educational in character, primary instruction being to a large extent in their hands. The Local Government has asked for powers up to Rs. 500, to be delegated, as its present power now is, to the Financial Commissioner, and we think that this proposal may be allowed.

MINING CONCESSIONS.

Present restrictions on Local Governments in regard to the grant of mining leases.

277. Mining is a subject now dealt with by the Commerce and Industry Department, but the present restrictions on the powers of the Provincial Governments in regard to the grant of mining concessions may be conveniently considered here. These restrictions are laid down in a Resolution of the Government of India published in 1899, and are, in the main, as follows :

Res. No.
18-17-2 of 20th May,

Local Governments are not empowered to sanction leases to mine for precious stones : the term of any mining lease is limited to 30 years, and no covenant for renewal may be inserted in the lease without the sanction of the Government of India ; the total area for which a Local Government can sanction such a lease to any one person is limited to 10 square miles ; and it has no power to reduce rents or royalties.*

These restrictions, save that regarding the limitation of the powers of Local Governments in the grant of leases for precious stones, are due to the express orders of the Secretary of State, who declined to agree to a proposal of the Government of India in favour of further delegation to Local Governments.

The revision of the mining rules is now under consideration, and the Government of India lately called for a report on the subject from the Director of the Geological Survey, who proposed, as a preliminary step, the appointment of an informal committee whose conclusions will be circulated to Local Governments, commercial associations and other public bodies.

Justification of these by the Director of the Geological Survey.

278. We have had complaints in various Provinces, but principally in Burma, as to the undue restrictions imposed on Local Governments by the existing rules, as to their complexity, and in regard to the delay involved in dealing with applications thereunder ; and larger powers are asked for. On these points, however, we think that the evidence of the Director of the Geological Survey affords a conclusive answer. The sanctioning powers of the Provincial Governments are larger than those of the Governments of any of the self-governing Colonies, while the existing rules make for simplicity, and are recognized by the mining community as being a material improvement on those previously in force. Such delays as have occurred in dealing with applications for concessions have been mainly due to the Local Governments and their officers ; and the continued submission to the Government of India of periodical statements showing the applications for prospecting and mining concessions, and their disposal, is desirable. The adequate development of the mineral resources of India is of Imperial importance. Local Governments have no professional staff competent to advise them in mining matters, and there is always a risk that valuable concessions may be made to speculators or middlemen, or to persons who will work their 'claims' inadequately or wastefully.

279. Sir Thomas Holland has, however, suggested simplification of the existing rules and procedure in such matters as the grant of certificates of qualification in respect to applicants for prospecting licences, the renewal of leases, etc., and these will, no doubt, be duly considered by the Government of India. Apart from such minor improvements, we think that the existing restrictions are desirable in present circumstances. In years to come, if Local Governments are able to obtain the services of competent scientific advisers, and some control over mining concessions is given to the Provincial Legislative Councils, the powers of the Provincial Governments might, no doubt, be somewhat enhanced ; but that is not a matter of immediate practical policy.

Existing restrictions are desirable in present circumstances.

280. On the other hand, in present circumstances, the rules seem to require stiffening in such matters as the power of the Local Governments to grant concessions at low rents or royalties. Sir T. Holland's views on this subject are endorsed by the Secretary to the Government of India in the Commerce Department, who had had recent experience on mining questions, from the Provincial point of view, in the Central Provinces.

In some matters present rules require stiffening.

281. We had some complaints in Burma as to the interference of the Director of the Geological Survey in mining cases which the Local Government has to refer to the Government of India, but these we consider unfounded. In such matters the Government of India must always be largely guided by the views of their responsible scientific adviser, and there is nothing to prevent the Local Governments from consulting the Director on their own account.

The Director of the Geological Survey should be freely consulted by the Local Governments.

The Secretary to the Government of India in the Commerce Department, and the Director himself, are both anxious that such consultation should be freely resorted to.

AGRICULTURAL INDEBTEDNESS.

App. Ib,
p. 191.

282. The problem of agricultural indebtedness, which has been the subject of prolonged consultations with Local Governments, is still under consideration in some Provinces, and has led to important legislation in others. Closely associated with it is the question of providing capital to the agricultural classes on easy terms, and the Indian Governments have recently been occupied in concerting measures for an expansion of the system of State loans and the institution of co-operative credit societies.

The control exercised by the Government of India in regard to State loans to agriculturists and land-holders has already been referred to in paragraph 113.

Ibid.

283. In regard to co-operative credit societies, which are still in an experimental stage, the Government of India determine the limits within which State funds may be advanced for their assistance ; and they convene an annual conference of the supervising Provincial officers, to secure an interchange of views and experiences, and the discussion of the best means of promoting and managing these societies.

In present circumstances, the control of the Government of India in regard to co-operative credit societies should continue.

The Government of Bombay has asked for freer powers in this respect, but we think that the time has not yet come for relaxation of the control of the Central Government.

FAMINE.

284. Measures which increase the security of cultivation against drought, or aid in the distribution of the food supply, such as irrigation and railway schemes, are examined in the Revenue and Agriculture Department with reference to their value as protectives against famine, and a large number of such protective irrigation projects have resulted from the enquiries of the Irrigation Commission of 1901.

Spheres of the Central and Local Governments in regard to famine work.

285. The relative spheres of the Central and Local Governments in regard to work actually bearing upon Famine have been defined as follows by the Revenue Secretary to the Government of India :—

“For the actual administration of famine relief, and the inception of relief operations, the responsibility and authority rest with Local Governments ; but the principles and the system of relief are prescribed by the Government of India, whose approval is also required to the Provincial Famine codes . . . In regard to expenditure and establishments, the rules of those codes allow a considerable relaxation of the ordinary financial restrictions, and in consequence of the scheme recently sanctioned for the apportionment of famine expenditure between Imperial and Provincial revenues, the Provincial Governments have, to some extent, been relieved of the necessity of making special applications to the Government of India for funds on the occurrence of distress.

Ibid.

Para. 62.

“The Government of India and the Secretary of State have to be kept fully informed of agricultural prospects, of impending scarcity, of the action which the Local Government proposes to take to meet it, and of the progress of relief measures and the condition of the people. But while the supply of full information is insisted upon, no interference is exercised so long as the Government of India are satisfied that the emergency is being properly met, and that the relief measures are neither inadequate nor extravagant.”

Minor alterations in the Provincial Famine Codes should be left to the Local Governments.

286. The Famine codes of the various Provinces were first compiled about 25 years ago, on the basis of a general model prepared, after discussion with the Local Governments, by the Government of India in 1883. This embodied the experience gained in the Southern India famine of 1876-8, which was reported on by a special Commission. Since then the codes have been revised more than once in the light of subsequent experience, and the recommendations of the Famine Commissions of 1898 and 1901. The present codes have all been framed on a model prepared by the last-mentioned Commission, and are generally uniform in their main features.

It is, of course, desirable that the Government of India should lay down general principles, and scrutinize the Provincial codes, having regard to the financial interest which they have in the efficient and economical grant of famine relief, as well as to general political considerations ; but alterations in the codes which are not of primary importance might be left to the Local Governments.

287. Finally, it seems desirable to notice that complaints have been made in various Provinces that, in matters connected with land revenue, the policy of the Government of India has been too much dominated in the past by what has been termed the 'Punjab school' of thought. We think it very desirable that, in recruiting for Government of India Secretariats, care should be taken to avoid any predominance on the part of one Province. The tenure of the Government of India Secretariat offices is limited, and an officer having personal knowledge of one Province only, is naturally prone, especially at the outset, to judge cases coming up from other Provinces by the ideas and circumstances obtaining in his own. It seems to us, therefore, of great importance that the Imperial Secretariats should be recruited so as to obtain personal knowledge of as many Provinces as possible. Special Departments no doubt require special qualifications, but it should be possible to obtain these without material infringement of the principle above suggested.

In recruiting for Government of India Secretariats, care should be taken to avoid predominance on the part of any one Province.

FORESTS.

288. The constitution of a regularly organized Forest Department for India, and the appointment of an Imperial Inspector-General of Forests date from 1864. The initial Forest staff was scanty and largely untrained; but the superior officers of the Department are now all men who have received scientific forest training in Europe or in India; and though some witnesses consider the general staff to be still insufficient, it has been largely increased of late years. The Dehra Dun Forest college, which supplies the requisite training for the higher officers recruited in India, was established in 1878. It is under the direct control of the Supreme Government, exercised through the Inspector-General of Forests.

Progress in forest organization since 1864.

289. Forest administration is under the control of the Local Governments; but, except in Madras and Bombay, their Conservators, and the Chief Conservators who exist in Burma and the Central Provinces, are appointed by the Government of India. The Inspector-General of Forests makes extensive inspections, and advises the Provincial Governments and the Government of India with reference thereto. He can also correspond direct with Local Governments and Conservators on technical matters.

Certain differences between Madras and Bombay, and other major Provinces, in respect to control by the Government of India over forest administration.

In Madras and Bombay, the appointment of Conservators of Forests is in the hands of the Provincial Governments, and the functions of the Inspector-General are there purely advisory.

290. In 1865 the first general Forest Act was passed. It applied to all Provinces outside Madras and Bombay, the Governments of which were authorized to extend it to their territories by notification, but did not do so. The present Indian Forest Act (VII of 1878) applies to Bombay, but not to Madras, Burma or Assam, which have separate legislation. Some minor administrations (Baluchistan, for instance) also have their own forest law.

Forest legislation.

Reg. VII., (Assam),
of 1891.

Act V.,
Madras, of 1882;
Act IV.,
Burma, of 1902;

Its general character.

291. The Indian Forest Act of 1878 provides for the constitution of forest and waste land, over which the Government possesses proprietary rights, into two main classes of forests, "reserved" and "protected"; and also for the exercise of control, when necessary in the public interest, or when the owners desire it, over forests and lands which are private property. Government control over reserved forests is much greater than in the case of protected forests, and the main difference between the two may be summed up in the phrase that in the former everything is an offence which is not permitted, while in the latter nothing is an offence that is not prohibited. The Act also contemplated the establishment of "village forests," definitely owned or enjoyed by village communities, which, after settlement as reserved forests, were to be restored to the villagers subject to conditions of management and user laid down by Local Governments. These provisions have, however, remained inoperative.

The principal difference between the India Act and the local laws above mentioned lies in the treatment of unoccupied Crown lands not included in "reserved" forests. The local laws do not class such areas as "protected" forests, but merely subject them to such protective regulations as the Local Government may in each case prescribe.

All accessible Government forests are now under statutory protection of some sort; but in outlying regions (chiefly in Burma and Assam) there are still considerable tracts to which regular forest administration has not yet been extended, and these are known as "unclassed" areas.

Local Governments should have very full liberty in regard to forests.

292. In November, 1907, the total area of lands under the Forest Department was 233,600 square miles, or about 24 per cent. of the whole area of British India. 92,500 square miles were classed as "reserved" forests, 10,000 as "protected," and 131,100 square miles (of which 103,000 were in Burma and 23,000 in Eastern Bengal and Assam) were "unclassed."

The vast extent of the land under forest control, the fact that forest management, however well justified, involves immediate restrictions on the previous rights and practices of the local population, and that forest lands include jungles and grazing grounds intermingled with cultivated areas, all bring the Forest Department into intimate connexion with the life of the people. Having regard to these circumstances, and to the very different conditions in respect of land tenures, and local customs and prejudices, in the various Provinces, it seems to us essential that the Local Governments should have very full liberty in regard to forests. Forest work is, in fact, a branch, though no doubt a specialized one, of the general land-revenue administration; and in regard to the latter, the futility of imposing any rigid or uniform system has always been admitted.

This fact was recognized in 1863-4, but the control of the Government of India in most Provinces has since become closer.

293. This was recognized by the Secretary of State when the Forest Department was first organized, for he took exception to forest work being placed under the Public Works Department of the Government of India, and held that it should be in the same hands as the ordinary land-revenue administration. Further, under his instructions, the Resolution of the Government of

of

Res. No. 4, India appointing an Inspector-General of Forests laid down that forest administration in Madras and Bombay, and in the three then existing Lieutenant-Governorships (Bengal; the North-Western, now the United, Provinces; and the Punjab) should be entirely under the orders of the Provincial Governments, the Inspector-General being merely an inspecting and advisory officer. It was only in the lesser Provinces that the Inspector-General was given any power of direct interference in forest management. The control of the Government of India became closer subsequently, but it is important to note the original intention.

Forest
Code,
Art. 18.

294. The Forest staff throughout the Provinces is controlled by the Local Governments, and consists of 'Imperial,' 'Provincial' and 'Subordinate' branches. The 'Imperial' branch, recruited in England, furnishes the bulk of the superior controlling staff, and consists of Conservators,* and Deputy and Assistant Conservators of Forests. Conservators are on uniform grades of pay throughout India: Deputy and Assistant Conservators were so formerly, but are now paid by a time-scale i.e., their pay is graduated according to their length of service.

service.

Ibid.
Art. 19.

Ibid.
Art. 23.

295. The 'Provincial' service consists of natives of India, who discharge some of the duties originally performed by the 'Imperial' staff; and these are classified, in various grades, as Extra-Deputy and Extra-Assistant Conservators. Eventually, they are to take over one-fifth of the major forest charges formerly held by 'Imperial' officers, and the whole of the minor charges. Their grade pay has hitherto been uniform throughout the Provinces, tempered by local allowances where necessary; but we understand that it is now under consideration to apply a time-scale to them also.

The 'Provincial'
service.

Ibid.
Art. 30.

The officers of the 'Provincial' service are recruited by Local Governments from 'Subordinate' service 'rangers' of long service and tried capacity, irrespective of educational qualifications, and from rangers who have passed through the Dehra Dun Forest college and served for a prescribed period. Candidates may also be appointed direct by the Local Governments on condition that they undergo a period of training at Dehra Dun.†

Since the 'Provincial' service is intended to occupy posts of the same nature as those filled by 'Imperial' officers, and a central Imperial college is maintained for its training, we think that the Government of India have legitimately laid down appropriate general conditions in respect to the qualifications required for this service.

Ibid.
Art. 25.

296. The 'Subordinate' service comprises rangers, deputy rangers, foresters, and forest guards. Their pay varies in the different Provinces, and their recruitment is practically left in the hands of the Local Governments.

297. The forest areas of each large Province are divided into circles, divisions, sub-divisions or ranges, and beats. The circle, of which there may be one or more in a Province, is in charge of a Conservator. In Burma and the Central Provinces it has also been found desirable to appoint a Chief Conservator, who assists the Local Government, as technical adviser, in the conduct of forest administration and the disposal of forest business. A circle comprises a number of divisions, each of which is in charge of a member of the controlling staff. As a rule, most of the more important divisions are under officers of the 'Imperial' service, while the minor charges are officered from the 'Provincial' service. Each division is subdivided into ranges, which are normally under junior 'Provincial' officers, rangers, or deputy-rangers. The range officer is assisted by foresters, and for protective purposes the range is divided into a number of beats in charge of forest guards.

Forest work now under the Revenue and Agriculture Department.

298. Work appertaining to forests was originally dealt with by the Government of India in their Public Works Department, but, as already stated, the Secretary of State was not in favour of this arrangement, and "forests" has now long been one of the branches of the Revenue and Agriculture Department.

Methods by which the Government of India control Provincial Governments in forest matters:—
(a) Under general financial rules.

299. The control of the Government of India over the Provincial Governments in forest matters is exercised in the following ways:—

(i.) Under the general financial rules. Hitherto, for example, these have required sanction of the Government of India for all matters of reorganization or alteration of establishment involving a cost of more than Rs. 25,000 per annum; for the creation, abolition, or enhancement of remuneration of an individual post in excess of Rs. 250 a month; and for the creation, abolition, or alteration of emoluments of any class or grade of officers. The abolition or diminution of such restrictions, which we have suggested in Chapter III, will give materially greater freedom to the Local Governments.

Paras. 120
et seq.

(b) By general Resolutions on forest policy.

300. (ii.) By general Resolutions on forest policy. In 1894, for instance, in view of the discontent which had been aroused by actions taken in connexion with forest reservation, the Government of India issued a Resolution containing a definite statement of their forest policy, of a similar character to the pronouncement made, eight years later, by Lord Curzon's Government on the subject of land revenue assessments.

Res.
No. 22 F., of 19th
Oct., 1894.

This Resolution classifies forest areas as:—

(a.) Forests the preservation of which is essential on climatic or physical grounds.

(b.) Forests which afford a supply of valuable timber for commercial purposes.

(c.) Minor forests.

Forests under class (a) should (it was said) be strictly protected. Those under class (b) should be managed mainly on commercial lines, but every reasonable facility should be given to the people of the neighbourhood for the satisfaction of their agricultural and domestic requirements either free or at low rates. Those under class (c) should be managed mainly in the interests of the population of the tract which supplies its forest requirements from this source, with as little direct official interference as possible; while the same principles applied to class (d), but with even greater force, and such lands should, where possible, be managed through village communities.

In laying down this policy, it seems to us that the Government of India exercised precisely those general powers of supervision and control which are the proper function of a Central administration in regard to matters which are administered by subordinate authorities; but we think that such a pronouncement might well have formed a convenient starting point for decentralization in matters of detail.

301. (iii) Through the medium of the Inspector-General of Forests. The functions of this officer have been described to us, as follows, by the Revenue Secretary to the Government of India :—

(c) Through the Inspector-General of Forests.

Vol. X.,
App. Ib,
p. 190.

“He is the chief adviser of the Government of India and of Local Governments in the management of State forest property. He corresponds direct with local forest officers on purely professional matters on which he may require information or desire to make suggestions, copies of any important letters being communicated to the Government of India and the Local Government concerned. During a large portion of the year he tours through the forests, and records inspection notes which are submitted to the same authorities. When a plan is drawn up for the working of any forest it is prepared in consultation with him and submitted to the Local Government with his criticisms. He is also furnished with annual returns from all Provinces, excepting Madras and Bombay, showing how far the prescriptions of the working-plans are being adhered to. He does not, however, inspect and report on the forests of the Madras and Bombay Presidencies, or criticize their working plans, unless specially invited by the Local Governments to do so.”

General functions of this officer.

We think that the inspection reports of the Inspector-General are of benefit both to the Government of India and Local Governments. The Government of India are responsible for the general forest policy of the country, and are clearly entitled to know how this policy is being carried out. At the same time, it is to the advantage of Local Governments that the wide experience of the Inspector-General should be brought to bear on their local problems. We consider, therefore, that the existing arrangement, whereby the Inspector-General of Forests is debarred from making visits of inspection to the Presidencies of Madras and Bombay without specific invitation from those Governments, should be altered, and that he should have full right of access to all Provinces under the conditions proposed, for Imperial Inspectors-General as a class, in Chapter VIII.

He should no longer be debarred from visiting Madras and Bombay without specific invitation.

302. As regards working plans*, the present position, Working plans. outside Madras and Bombay, is as follows :—

When a working plan is to be prepared, the Conservator concerned submits a preliminary report to the Inspector-General, who communicates his remarks thereon; and the Conservator is expected to consult the Inspector-General on all important technical points connected with the elaboration of the plan. The Inspector-General may issue direct instructions to the Conservator regarding such technical points: otherwise he addresses the Local Government with a view to the issue of such orders as may appear advisable.

Forest
Code,
Arts. 85-

* A working plan is a report describing a forest, and containing a detailed programme of its management for a period which varies, according to circumstances, from 10 to 30 years.

When a working plan has been drawn up, the Conservator submits it to the Inspector-General, who forwards it, with his opinion and remarks, to the Local Government for orders.

To provide that the prescriptions of a working plan are adhered to, Conservators submit abstracts of their 'control books' to the Inspector-General who, if he notices any deviations from the orders sanctioning the working plan, draws the attention of the Conservator to this fact for explanation, or in order that the Local Government's orders may be obtained.

The Inspector-General is assisted in dealing with working plans by one of the professors in the Forest college at Dehra Dun. 16961.

In Madras and Bombay, the Inspector-General of Forests receives copies of working plans for information, but is not consulted thereon unless the Local Government specially desires to obtain his advice. 44097-101.

The Inspector-General should be consulted by Local Governments in the case of plans relating to specially large forests, but otherwise only at their discretion.

303. The Chief Conservator of Forests in Burma considered that that Province might now deal finally with its own working plans, and the Conservator in Bengal complained of the subordination of Conservators to the Inspector-General which the present system involved, and held that the functions of the latter officer should be advisory only. A Conservator of Forests in the Central Provinces, on the other hand, was in favour of maintaining the existing arrangements, while the Inspector-General desired that the system in other Provinces should be applied to Madras and Bombay also. 13184. 16950, 16952-62. 25214-27. 42734.

Having regard to the large number of working plans which are not of first-class importance, and to the present high training and large experience of the superior forest officers in the Provinces, we do not think it necessary that the Inspector-General should be called in as an adviser over every working plan. It is desirable that he should be consulted in the case of plans relating to specially large forests,* but otherwise these should only be referred to him when the Local Government thinks his advice would be advantageous.

Cf. para. 207.

All working plans should, however, continue to be communicated to him for information, and this will give him the opportunity of offering remarks to the Local Governments, when he thinks this desirable, in cases where he has not been specifically consulted.

We think that the submission of control-forms to the Inspector-General is superfluous. 25228.

He should cease to circulate copies of his monthly proceedings to Local Governments and Conservators.

304. We understand that the Inspector-General circulates to Local Governments and their Conservators copies of all his monthly proceedings, and that this practice is not followed by any other inspecting or advisory officer under the Revenue and Agriculture Department. We think it should also cease to apply in the case of the Inspector-General of Forests. Forest Code, Art. 51 (iv).

He should cease to be a de facto Secretary to the Government of India.

305. But in addition to his functions as Inspector-General, this officer is also de facto a Deputy Secretary of the Government of India in the Revenue and Agriculture Department. He notes thereon all forest cases coming up to the Government of India, and his office is included in the Secretariat and manned by Secretariat clerks. 42880

* Sir S. Edgerley dissents from this clause. In his opinion, 'largeness' is not the proper measure of need for outside advice. He would leave the reference to the discretion of the Local Government in all cases. 43013-6.

We think this arrangement undesirable—in the first place, because an expert with the special knowledge of an Inspector-General, can be more usefully employed on technical work than on the ordinary routine of administration, and, in the second, because it is only in very exceptional cases that the highest technical and administrative qualifications are found united in the same person. We hold, therefore, that, in respect of matters of Provincial administration, the Inspector-General of Forests should be merely an adviser to the Government of India and to Local Governments, and that all central administrative functions should be undertaken by the ordinary Secretariat of the Revenue and Agriculture Department. Under our other recommendations the present control of that Department over forest work will be substantially reduced; it should be possible for such work as remains to be transacted in the Secretariat without additional assistance; and the danger of administrative encroachment by the Inspector-General on the proper functions of Local Governments will, we think, be removed.

The departmental officers were generally against change in the present system, on the ground that it affords a wider field of selection and allows Conservators to have experience of more than one Province. The Revenue Secretary to the Government of India shares the latter view, and, while admitting that Burma has a sufficiently large cadre to admit of selection within the Province, he does not think that this condition has been reached elsewhere.

We hold, for the reasons given in Chapter iv., in regard to Chief and Superintending Engineers, that the appointment of Conservators and Chief Conservators of Forests should rest with the Local Government, as soon as the superior staff of a Province is sufficiently large to admit of such a step. That position has been reached in Burma, where the staff is already much larger than in Madras or Bombay, and, we think, in the Central Provinces, the staff of which does not fall much below the Bombay figure. The other major Provinces may not yet be sufficiently advanced for such a change, but as their staff increases, they, too, should be put on the same level as the Presidency Governments.

307. Deputy and Assistant Conservators in the Central Provinces and the Punjab have hitherto been on a single list†, with the result that the Government of India have to interfere in regard to the promotion and posting of these officers. We think that the Central Provinces should have a separate list; and the recently introduced system of a time-scale of pay will facilitate this step.

308. (v.) Through the medium of the Imperial Forest college at Dehra Dun. This institution trains 'Provincial' Forest service officers, and rangers. It is desirable that men whom it is contemplated to appoint to the 'Provincial' service should continue to go through this college, but the training of the 'Subordinate' service might, in time, be left to local Forest schools.

(d) Through the appointment by the Government of India of Conservators and Chief Conservators of Forests outside Madras and Bombay. Other major Provinces should be able to appoint these officers when their superior staff is large enough.

Deputy and Assistant Conservators in the Central Provinces should be borne on a separate list.

(e) Through the Imperial Forest College at Dehra Dun. The training of 'Subordinate' service officers might in time be left to local forest schools.

* See the supplementary memorandum by the Chairman, p. 288.

† The list also includes Baluchistan and the Frontier Province.

(f) Through certain provisions of the Forest laws. Recommendations for relaxation of present restrictions, especially in the matter of disforestation.

309. (vi.) By certain provisions of the Forest laws. 44057.

Under the Indian Forest Act, the previous sanction of the Government of India is required to:—

(1.) The disforestation of any area included in a reserved forest.

(2.) Rules for the management of village forests.

(3.) Rules for protected forests, including regulation of hunting, shooting, and fishing therein, and the extraction of forest produce.

(4.) The levy of duty on timber or other forest produce.

(5.) Rules regulating the transit of forest produce.*

310. The Revenue Secretary to the Government of India thinks that all these restrictions might be withdrawn except in the following cases:—

(a.) While it is not necessary that the Government of India should sanction all rules regarding the levy of duty on lumber, &c., or the transit of forest produce, their sanction should be obtained where Native States are likely to be affected.

With this recommendation we concur, subject to the proviso that Local Governments might deal with questions affecting such Native States as are under their political control.

(b.) While it is desirable to allow Local Governments powers of disforestation in the case of small areas, he thinks that the previous sanction of the Government of India should be required in important cases. The Inspector-General of Forests concurs, and would give Local Governments full powers to disforest up to 200 acres.

The balance of evidence is in favour of granting full powers in respect of small areas to Local Governments; and we have been informed that, in such cases, their proposals are usually approved by the Secretary in the Revenue and Agriculture Department without consulting the Member of Council in charge. We think that in section 26 of the Indian Forest Act, and in the similar sections of local enactments, the words "subject to the control" should be substituted for "with the previous sanction" of the Government of India in respect to disforestation, and that such control need not be specifically exercised in the case of proposals affecting areas of less than 200 acres. Such an alteration would do away with about half the references which have now to be made to the Government of India on this subject. As regards proposals affecting areas of larger extent, the Government of India might settle with each Local Government, having regard to the varying circumstances of the different Provinces, in what cases disforestation papers shall be referred to the Revenue and Agriculture Department before final orders are passed.

In the event of the Indian Forest Act requiring serious amendment, this should be carried out in the Provincial Legislatures.

311. As regards forest legislation generally, we think that if, and when, the existing India Act should be found to require serious amendment, the new legislation should, as has been decided in the case of the Excise law, be undertaken in the Provincial Legislative Councils, so that each Province should have a forest law suitable to its own conditions.

* Restrictions (2), (3), and (5) are not contained in the Madras, Burma, or Assam laws; and restriction (4) does not appear in the Madras Act.

312. (vii.) Through the Imperial Forest Code.

The Forest Code was first published in 1877, and the present (sixth) edition was issued in 1906. The code is continually undergoing alterations, which in recent years have been in the direction of increasing the powers of Local Governments. In particular, the powers of these Governments over the officers under their control have been increased, and they have been given a freer hand to delegate the powers with which they themselves have been invested.

(g) Through the Imperial Forest Code. Scope and character of this code.

The code, which consists of 274 articles, deals with the organization of the Forest Department, the management and working of forests, accounts, office business, annual reports and returns. It applies to all Provinces outside Madras and Bombay. These two Provinces have codes of their own, but they are based upon the general lines of the India code.

There are also Provincial Forest manuals.

Art. 15.

313. The rules laid down in the Civil Service Regulations and the Civil Account Code apply to the Forest Department, and theoretically, therefore, the Forest Code should deal only with matters not covered by these compilations. In practice, however, it has been found impossible to avoid considerable repetition. Where the Civil Account Code and the Civil Service Regulations apply without modification, the Forest Code usually contains a simple reference to the fact, e.g., it states that travelling allowances can be claimed only under the Civil Service Regulations. But where an amplification of their provisions is required, or where it is a question of applying principles embodied in them to the conditions of the Forest Department, it has usually been found more convenient to substitute fresh articles.

Cf. Arts.

Arts. 108-9,

314. The code appears to us to treat of many matters which can more suitably be regulated by the Local Governments; for instance the greater part of Chapter I., which deals with the organization of the Department in all its branches, is out of place in an Imperial code. It is true that the duties of Conservators and other officers are not defined in the Forest Code with the same minuteness as is the case in regard to engineer officers in the code of the Public Works Department, but the provisions which do exist tend to restrict the discretionary power which Local Governments ought to possess in regard to their servants. The same may be said of the limitations on the financial powers of Conservators and other officers, while the articles marginally noted limit the freedom, not merely of forest officers, but of the Local Governments themselves, in such matters as the writing off of irrecoverable arrears, grants of forest produce, and refunds of revenue.

The present code is unduly restrictive of the liberty of Provincial Governments.

211.

The financial powers of Local Governments should not be less in forest matters than they are in other departments, while, as we have already observed in the case of Public Works, the extent to which the powers of a Local Government might be suitably delegated to a Conservator or other officer, is a matter which should be left to the discretion of that Government. Similarly the management and working of forests which is dealt with in Chapter II. of the code, ought, generally speaking, to be regulated by the Local Governments, who should not be hampered by rigid instructions; and the same remarks apply to the chapter on office business.

If an Imperial code is required, it should only contain matters essential for Imperial control.

315. The Revenue Secretary to the Government of India thinks that it would suffice if the Forest Code were to deal with general principles, leaving their application to local conditions to be laid down by the Local Governments in Provincial manuals, and the Inspector-General of Forests holds that much of the present stringency of the code might be expediently relaxed. 44056.

We consider that, as in the case of the Civil Account and Public Works Codes, the Forest Code should only contain matters essential for Imperial control, and that it should be referred to a Committee for revision. It is indeed a question, which such Committee might usefully consider, whether an Imperial Forest Code is required at all, and whether Provincial manuals, supplemented by general Resolutions of the Government of India on forest policy, and by the provisions of the revised Civil Service Regulations and Civil Account Code, might not suffice for all practical purposes.

Allegations as to the undue stringency of the forest audit system.

316. Forest accounts are dealt with by the ordinary Civil Accounts department. Until a few years ago the forest audit work was concentrated in the Comptroller General's Office, but it is now localized in the offices of the Provincial Accountants General. There has been some evidence that the present system of audit is over elaborate, and imposes an undue burden upon the executive staff, but as in the case of Public Works accounts, we are not prepared to express a definite opinion. 44056.

Para. 226.

Connexion of forest and land revenue administration. The special centralization in the former should now cease.

317. Finally, we desire once more to emphasize the fact that, except in the quasi-technical character of forest management, there are many points of similarity between forests and land revenue administration. Both have an intimate bearing on the wants and welfare of the agricultural population, and they are inter-dependent in many administrative details. Both require careful adjustment to diversified local conditions, and Local Governments are as much interested, financially and administratively, in the successful and sympathetic management of the one as of the other. While, however, the intervention of the Central Government in land revenue administration has, with exceptions which we desire to see removed, been limited to the prescription of general principles, in forest matters its control over most of the Local Governments has remained much greater. Now that a settled forest policy has been laid down, and that the Provinces have been provided with well trained staffs, the necessity for this special centralization has ceased to exist. Cf. para. 292.

AGRICULTURE.

Development of agricultural organization.

318. It was not until the Famine Commission of 1880 had emphasized the importance to the State of improving the agriculture of the country, that this subject was recognized as an important branch of Government work. Even then the progress made was slow. By 1884 every major Province had been provided with an Agricultural department under a Director, but the work of these departments was, in the main, confined to the simplification of revenue settlement procedure and the improvement of the land records system. Vol. X., App. Ib., p. 189.

An Imperial Inspector General of Agriculture was appointed in 1901; in 1902-3 it was determined to constitute an Imperial college at Pusa (in Bengal) ; while in 1905-6 the Government of India decided materially to increase the public expenditure on agricultural improvement, and, to this end, made considerable grants to the Provinces, and laid down the general lines of future policy.

319. The Imperial sphere in connexion with agriculture now comprises (a) supervision, (b) higher education, and (c) research and experiment.

Outside the working of the ordinary financial rules, such control and supervision as is deemed necessary by the Government of India is generally exercised after reference to the Inspector General of Agriculture, whose functions are described as follows in a circular letter issued to the Provincial Governments on the occasion of his appointment :—

Functions of the Inspector General of Agriculture.

Oct., 1901.

“ Apart from the prosecution of such independent enquiries as may be desirable, it will be the duty of the Inspector General to guide and co-ordinate the experiments which are being made under the orders of Local Governments, and to publish and criticize their results ; to indicate new lines which enquiry may profitably follow ; and to respond to the requests of private investigators for assistance or advice. It will be open to Provincial Governments to consult him on subjects in which the opinion of an agricultural expert will be of value, and his opinion should obviously be taken on any new schemes of experiment or enquiry which may be in view. In regard to the Government of India, his position will be that of an adviser on matters connected with agriculture. It is not proposed to invest him with any direct authority over Provincial departments of Agriculture ; nor is it anticipated that any such authority will be needed in order to secure the advantages which will result from his guidance. But he will be authorized to correspond direct with the heads of these departments ; and he will, indeed, regard the maintenance of close personal relations with them as essential to the proper discharge of his functions. His duties will, of course, lie more in the field than in the office ; and constant tours will be necessary, not only in order to keep him in touch with other investigators, but to gain that close acquaintance with the agricultural conditions of the country which alone can indicate the scope which exists for improvements and the possibilities of effecting them.”

320. Apart from the general objections to Imperial Inspectors General contained in the Bombay Government's memorandum, the relations thus established between the Imperial and Local Governments were not criticized in evidence, and we believe that they are entirely satisfactory.* There appears to be no unwillingness on the part of Local Governments to consult the Inspector General on important matters, and indeed they seem fully to recognize the value of an independent expert opinion on agricultural questions. That the general relations are so satisfactory is, in our opinion, attributable largely to the proper recognition, on both sides, of the fact that the Inspector General is purely an advisory officer in relation to Local Governments.

Imperial and Provincial Agricultural Colleges.

321. Higher education and research are conducted at the Pusa college, which is not yet, however, in full working order. At the head of the college is a Director, who is, for administrative purposes, under the control of the Inspector General. It is intended that the Imperial college should eventually afford a post graduate course, and an education in the higher branches of agricultural science, each Province being provided with a college of its own for more elementary teaching. The Imperial college will, therefore, be supplementary to those of the Provinces, and will in no way interfere with their development. The Imperial college staff are also engaged in research work, and to this end travel over the Provinces. Local research work is to be similarly carried out by the officers of the Provincial colleges. 44138-40.

The Board of Agriculture; its
character.

322. Co-ordination of Imperial and Provincial research work is now carried out by means of the Board of Agriculture, a body consisting mainly of Provincial Directors of Agriculture, and Imperial and Provincial experts, presided over by the Inspector General. The Board meets once a year to draw up a programme of research work for the year following, and its objects and functions are explained thus in a Government of India letter:— Vol. X.,
App. I.,
p. 189.

“It is not intended that the Board should exercise any executive control over the (Pusa) institute and college, or the departments of Agriculture generally. The object of the annual meetings will be that the agricultural experts, whose work is carried out in different parts of India, should have an opportunity of exchanging ideas with one another; of learning what is being done in various Provinces; of co-ordinating their work; and of advising on agricultural administration generally. These conferences will serve to bring together the scientific and practical experts and the Civilian element in the several Imperial and Provincial departments, and will enable them to arrange a common course of action, having for its object the improvement of the agriculture of the country.” 26494.

This Board appears to us an admirable device to ensure co-operation and co-ordination, while at the same time minimizing the risk of friction and misunderstanding.

The Provincial Agricultural Departments.

323. Provincial Agricultural departments are being organized on much the same lines as the Imperial department, but on a smaller scale as regards the superior agency. The general idea is to establish, in each important and distinctive agricultural tract, an experimental farm, where local agricultural problems of that tract will receive special study. With some differences in details, the Provincial schemes closely resemble each other. At the head of each local Agricultural Department is a Civilian Director*, who, formerly, was also a Director of Land Records or a Commissioner of Settlements. This association of agricultural and revenue work has, however, been abandoned and, except in the United Provinces, the Directorship of Agriculture now forms a separate charge.

For general agricultural administration, a Province is usually divided into two circles, each of which is in charge of a Deputy Director, who supervises the subordinate establishments employed in agricultural enquiries, farm work, and demonstration. On the educational and research side, each major Province is to have its own agricultural college, with a minimum of three European specialists, and a staff of Indian assistants. Local agricultural associations, which the Provincial departments advise and assist, are also springing up throughout the Provinces.

324. While the Provincial Agricultural departments are organized on lines of general similarity, the uniformity is less marked than in the case of the Public Works and the Forest departments, and we understand that the Provincial Governments were allowed their own way in various matters in which they desired to depart from the general schemes prepared by the Government of India.

325. It has been suggested to us in Burma that the Provincial Agricultural department was started at the instance of the Government of India; and that, so far as Burma was concerned, the proposal was premature, and that the money which has been spent on this department might more properly have been devoted to other objects.

Paras. 76-9. As to this, we need only refer to our remarks on the subject of special grants by the Government of India to the Provinces.

326. Under the recommendations we have made in regard to the relaxation of financial restrictions, we think that Local Governments will have adequate scope for developing their agricultural policy in accordance with local requirements, and we have no proposals to make of special application to the Agricultural departments.

No special proposals made in respect to the Agricultural departments.

CIVIL VETERINARY WORK.

Vol. X.,
App. B.,
p. 190.

327. The Civil Veterinary department, which now deals mainly with the promotion of cattle breeding and the prevention of cattle disease, may be said to date from 1892, when an Imperial Inspector General was appointed, while Provincial and local agencies were established shortly afterwards. The superior officers of the department, though most of them serve under the control of the Provincial Governments, are on Imperial lists for the purposes of transfer, leave and promotion,* and are paid from Imperial funds. The cost of the subordinate agencies, whose work these officers supervise, is at present largely defrayed by district boards.

The Civil Veterinary department. Superior veterinary officers serving in the Provinces should be paid by, and recruited for, the Local Governments.

Having regard to the local character of Civil Veterinary work, and to the circumstance that in each Province it is under the general administrative control of the Provincial Director of Agriculture, we think it desirable that the superior Veterinary officers serving in the Provinces should be paid by, and recruited on account of, the Local Governments, as Provincial agricultural experts now are. This provincializing of the staff would eliminate a number of references which now have to be made to the Government of India, and would enable the Veterinary Inspector General to become, in such matters, the advising officer of the Provincial Governments instead of being the head of a centralized controlling staff.

* Since 1904, Local Governments have been authorized to grant leave not exceeding 3 months to officers of the Civil Veterinary department serving under their orders, in cases where it is not necessary to provide a substitute from the Imperial list, on the understanding that the Inspector General is consulted before such leave is granted. (R. & A. Pros, July 1904, Nos. 5-9.)

Correspondence of the Veterinary Inspector General with local authorities.

A suggestion in respect of the Glanders and Farcy Act.

329. The Glanders and Farcy Act permits measures to be taken for the suppression of these equine diseases in areas notified by the Local Government. It can also be, and has been, applied to other horse diseases, but here its application has to be notified by the Governor General in Council. We consider that when once a disease has been notified as proper to be dealt with under the Act, a Local Government ought to have discretion as to the specific application of the law in respect thereto.

Act XIII., of 1899. Ibid sec. 3. Ibid sec. 2 (1)

Each Province should legislate for itself in matters affecting cattle disease.

330. Little progress has yet been made in providing legislative sanction for measures dealing effectively with contagious cattle diseases, owing to popular feeling in regard to such matters as the sanctity of the cow. The fact that feelings of this description vary in different parts of India, indicates that each Province should legislate for itself in matters affecting cattle disease when the Local Government considers that this can expediently be done.

CHAPTER VII.

SUBJECTS DEALT WITH IN THE HOME DEPARTMENT.

Principal subjects dealt with in the Home Department.

331. In a despatch of 9th May, 1907, the Government of India reviewed at some length the work of their Home Department Secretariat, and the Home Secretary's own evidence is accompanied by a full description thereof.

Vol. X., App. XIV., p. 255. Vol. X., App. Ie, p. 199.

The principal subjects on which references are ordinarily made to the Home Department by Local Governments are :—

- (1) Questions of general policy.
- (2) Judicial.
- (3) Local and Municipal.
- (4) Police.
- (5) Prisons.
- (6) Education.
- (7) Medical and Sanitary.
- (8) Public.

The first two of these do not call for remarks ; the third will be dealt with in Part III. ; while 'Prisons' and 'Public' can be dismissed in a few lines.

Vide para. 5.

Some minor recommendations in respect to "Prisons."

332. The lines of prison administration have been definitely settled, and we need only note our endorsement of two proposals made by the Lieutenant Governor of Burma, viz. :—

(i.) That Local Governments should have the power, now vested in the Government of India, to transfer life-convicts, the unexpired portion of whose sentences a Provincial Government desires to remit, from the Andamans to their own Provinces.

(ii.) That Inspectors General of Prisons might determine the allowances to be drawn by Civil Surgeons for the collateral charge of jails. 333. The Public branch deals with large questions of establishment, and matters of such general interest as to demand the attention of the Supreme Government; but it also appears responsible for some unnecessary encroachments on the sphere of detailed administration proper to Local Governments, in regard to points such as the working of the Government Servants' Rules and the prescription of public holidays in the Province. General rules relating to Government servants may rightly be framed by, or under the control of, the Government of India; but we consider that their application to particular cases should be left to the Local Governments, while, in the matter of public holidays, it is unnecessary for the Central Government to assume a power which limits the discretion of the Provincial administration in meeting the reasonable wishes of any class of the population. The Home Department Secretary agreed that delegations of this sort might reasonably be made; but alteration of the present Government Servants' Conduct Rules (1904), would apparently require the sanction of the Secretary of State.

The specific application of general rules relating to public servants should be left to Local Governments, who should also have discretion in the matter of public holidays.

334. Certain special limitations which now apply to the Central Provinces, in regard to the appointment of Commissioners of Division and heads of departments, and the appointment and promotion of Deputy and Assistant Commissioners, when these involve the supersession of some other officer, should, we think, be removed. We likewise think that the powers of Local Governments in regard to the filling up of appointments which have been 'listed,' i.e., transferred from the Indian Civil Service to natives of the country, should be extended as proposed by the Secretary in the Home Department.* We consider further that in the case of a mixed service, such as the Civil Accounts, where the Secretary of State has sanctioned the filling of a certain number of Accountant Generalships by officers of the department who do not belong to the Indian Civil Service, his specific sanction should no longer be necessary in respect to the appointment of individual officers within such limits.

Certain restrictions on the patronage of the Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces are undesirable. Local Governments should have larger powers in regard to "listed" appointments.

References now required to the Secretary of State in regard to Civil Accountant Generalships should cease.

335. As regards the Home Department generally, the relaxation of financial restrictions which we have already proposed in Chapter III. will obviate a number of references which now have to be made to it by Local Governments.

We pass on to the subjects which require more detailed notice, viz., Police, Education, and Medical and Sanitary.

administration, recommended the establishment of a well organized civil constabulary supervised by European officers. The old village police should, the Commission advised, be retained on their existing footing, being brought, however, into direct relationship with the general constabulary. The recommendations of the Commission formed the basis of an Act passed in 1861, which, with amendments, still regulates the administration of the police service throughout the greater part of India. Madras and Bombay have Acts of their own, and the Madras Act was passed two years before that of the Government of India.

Act V. of 1861.

Act XXIV., Madras of 1859; Act IV. Bombay, of 1890.

Other Acts of local Legislatures regulate the police in the cities of Calcutta, Madras, Bombay and Rangoon. Up to 1902, the tendency was towards separation of the special forces employed in these cities from the general Provincial police, and this resulted in a certain want of co-operation which was prejudicial to the suppression of crime. The chief police officers of these towns have now, however, been brought into closer relations with the Inspector General of the district police.

Act III. Madras, of 1888; Act IV. Bombay, of 1902; Act IV. Bengal, of 1866; Act IV. Burma, of 1899. Police Commn. Report, paras. 94-5. G. of I. Res. Nos. 248-59, of 21st March, 1905, para. 65.

Police administration primarily in the hands of Local Governments. Relief of municipalities from police charges.

337. Police administration has always been in the hands of Provincial Governments, subject to such reference as the Police laws, and financial rules, compelled. The service was provincialized by Lord Mayo's scheme of financial devolution in 1870, but part of the cost of town police was for many years afterwards borne by municipalities and cantonments. The later policy of the Government of India has been to relieve towns of such charges, and this reform has now been generally accomplished.

The Police Commission of 1902.

338. With the development of the country, and the facilities which improved communications lent to the perpetration of organized crime, the demands upon the Provincial police forces gradually outgrew their strength and capacity, and in 1902 the Government of India appointed a Police Commission, which they subsequently described as the only possible agency through which a comprehensive scheme of reform could have been worked out. The conditions of police service, machinery and work must, they said, be fairly uniform throughout India; and experience had shown that while several Local Governments had planned reforms in these conditions, they had neither the money nor the authority to work upon comprehensive lines.

Des. No. 19, of 9th May, 1907.

The recommendations of this Commission, and the orders passed thereon by the Government of India in consultation with the Local Governments, have brought about important reforms in the personnel, strength, training and emoluments of police officers. As we shall have occasion later on to make some criticism upon the action taken by the Government of India on the report of the Commission, we desire to say that the general results which followed its appointment appear to have been accepted throughout the country as, on the whole, decidedly beneficial.

Existing police organization :—

339. We have now to consider the police organization as it at present exists, and the control exercised by the Supreme Government in respect thereto.

District police.

The district-police establishment in each Province forms practically a single force. In Bombay constables are enrolled for service in a particular district; but the higher officers are liable to transfer as a normal condition

The police in each Province are under the control of an Inspector General, who is now usually an Indian Civilian, though the post may also be filled by the promotion of a departmental officer. In the larger Provinces there are Deputy Inspectors General, who hold charge of ranges each containing several districts. The police administration of each district is under an officer styled District Superintendent. He is responsible to his departmental superiors for the discipline and internal management of the force under his control; and is the subordinate of the District Magistrate in questions connected with the preservation of the peace, and the detection and suppression of crime. In large districts the Superintendent has one or more assistants, who sometimes help him in the work of the district as a whole, and sometimes hold subordinate charge of a portion of the district.

Recruitment for the highest, or 'Imperial', branch of the Police Department is now usually by open competition in England; but appointments thereto may occasionally be made, in India, by Local Governments, with the sanction of the Government of India.

The 'Provincial' service.

These Deputy Superintendents form a 'Provincial' service, and are obtained partly by direct recruitment, and partly by promotion from the subordinate ranks.

341. Each district is parcelled out, for police purposes, into sub-divisions under inspectors. To keep the police on the alert by constant inspections is the primary duty of the inspector, and he does not, as a rule, personally investigate cases of crime. The inspector's sub-division is split up into lesser areas, each of which contains a police station under the charge of a subordinate officer now uniformly styled a sub-inspector.* This officer is primarily responsible for the working of the police within his charge, and is assisted by a body of head constables and constables. It is his duty to enquire personally into cases of serious crime, and he may be described as the pivot of the whole police system.

increase the number of police stations, and to recruit the majority of sub-inspectors direct, the proportion of vacancies to be filled by the promotion of head constables being fixed separately for each Province. Formerly all grades up to that of inspector were mainly filled by promotion, men rising to them from the rank of constable. The object of these changes is to facilitate the investigation and to procure a better personnel for the more important branches of police work. As direct recruitment is the chief method of filling up the sub-inspectorate, inspectors are now recruited mainly by promotion therefrom, and direct appointment is limited to 10 per cent of the vacancies in this class.

Appointment of a Director of Criminal Intelligence.

345. There remains to be noticed the constitution of a Central Department of Criminal Intelligence. The Government of India already possessed a department of Thagi and Dakaiti, designed to suppress organized crime in Native States, but this was no longer necessary as a separate entity. The head of that department had, however, also discharged functions connected with the collection and distribution of secret and political intelligence, for the continuance of which it was necessary to arrange. Moreover, the conduct of special enquiries into note forging, counterfeit coining, illicit traffic in arms, inter-provincial smuggling, and the operations, in Provinces distant from their homes, of gang robbers and criminal tribes—all of which had been much facilitated by the extension of railways—called for some central agency of information and record, coupled with a small detective establishment. Finally, the Government of India thought it desirable to provide themselves, as a temporary arrangement, with an adviser qualified to assist them in dealing with the extensive and difficult problems of reorganization which the Police Commission's report and the orders passed thereon would involve. For these reasons, it was deemed essential, in 1904, to create a Central Criminal Intelligence department, under a Director whose duties were to include direct communica-

346. The cost of the reforms necessary in police organization, and for improvement in strength and personnel, were estimated by the Police Commission to involve an additional annual charge of about £1,000,000 (150 lakhs). Expenditure so heavy was entirely beyond the resources of the Provincial Governments ; and the Government of India accordingly determined, as funds permitted, to make special grants to them for this purpose. In 1905-6, a recurring grant amounting to 50 lakhs of rupees was distributed among the Provinces ; supplementary grants were made in subsequent years ; and as matters now stand, some of the Provinces have already obtained their full share of the total 150 lakhs, while others have received the greater part.

Grants by the Government of India for the reforms proposed by the Police Commission

347. As regards the relations of the Central and the Local Governments in police matters, the despatch from which we have quoted in paragraph 338 indicates that the Government of India held that the conditions of police service, machinery and work should be fairly uniform throughout India, while, in the same despatch, they represented to the Secretary of State that their control over police matters must remain greater than if the Police Commission had not sat.

348. Since the law of criminal procedure is uniform throughout India, the general lines of organization for the investigation and prosecution of crime must, no doubt, be practically uniform also ; and so far as the 'Imperial' Police service is concerned, we consider that, as in the case of other 'Imperial' services, the general pay and conditions of service in the various Provinces should be as uniform as possible. The 'Provincial' Police service is a new departure ; and here too it may have been desirable, at the outset, to lay down general conditions as to pay and recruitment. But in their orders on the report of the Police Commission the Government of India went much beyond this, for, although permitting some minor departures at the discretion of Local Governments, they laid down general scales of pay and grades for the subordinate police officers from constables up to inspectors. We do not consider that there was any valid reason for such general uniformity : on the contrary, the evidence taken in Eastern Bengal and Assam, Bombay and the Central Provinces, shows that uniformity of pay in the constable and head constable grades has there been detrimental to recruitment. We think, too, that in dealing with the proposals which were submitted by Local Governments for the carrying out of the Commission's schemes, the Government of India were over rigid in matters of detail, and not sufficiently tolerant of departures, which the local authorities thought necessary, from the general scales laid down as to numbers and pay.

Uniformity of pay or grading in the 'Subordinate' police staff unnecessary. In dealing with the Report of the Police Commission, etc., the Government of India were over-rigid in matters of detail.

349. It was doubtless reasonable that the distribution of the funds which the Government of India were able to grant for police reorganization in the various Provinces, should have proceeded on the basis of the strength and average pay of grades recommended by the Police Commission, and thought suitable by the Supreme Government after consultation with the Provincial administrations. That having been done, however, we think that the Provincial Governments should have had latitude to deviate from these general standards, on the understanding that they would be financially responsible for any increase of expenditure involved. The minute criticisms of the Government of India seem to have proceeded, in part, from the impression, which might, we think, have been set right at an earlier stage, that a Provincial Government such as Bombay, which desired an increase of rates of pay and strength of staff as compared with the original proposals, also desired the Government of India to make a corresponding additional grant. Failure to clear up this point at once has led to considerable delay in the reorganization of the police establishments of the Bombay Presidency. We had evidence in other Provinces also as to detailed interference by the Government of India with the proposals made by Local Governments.

Nor do we think that it was necessary for the Government of India to lay down more than very general instructions as to the extent to which inspectors and sub-inspectors should be recruited outside the force. The prescription of specific percentages in regard to such recruitment seems to us to have been an undue curtailment of the discretion of Local Governments.

20 & 23.

Outside general financial rules, the control of the Government of India should be limited to the prescription of general principles and lines of policy.

We hold, in short, that hereafter the Provincial Governments should have the same discretion in regard to the police 'Provincial' and 'Subordinate' services as we have elsewhere recommended that they should possess in respect to such services generally; that in so far as provisions of the existing law or executive instructions prevent this, they should be modified; and that the appointment of the Police Commission, and the orders passed thereon, should not involve any larger permanent interference with the work of Provincial Governments. The control of the Government of India should be limited, that is, to the prescription of general principles and lines of policy, and, subject to such control, Local Governments should only be bound by the general financial restrictions proposed in Chapter III.*

Necessity for withdrawal of restrictions contained in the Police law, and in departmental instructions issued for Burma.

350. It follows that certain provisions of the Indian Police Act, and of local laws, which at present require reference to the Government of India, from most Provinces, whenever any change is necessary in the strength or rates of pay of the district or Presidency police forces, should be altered. We also agree with the Secretary in the Home Department that some restrictions which have been departmentally imposed upon the Burma Government, in respect to issues of clothing, free rations, etc., to the military police in that Province, should be withdrawn.

Any material amendment of the Police law which may be necessary should be carried out in the Provincial Legislative Councils.

351. In reviewing the report of the Police Commission, the Government of India contemplated the enactment of a general Police Act for all India, to deal adequately with present conditions. Such legislation has, however, not yet been carried out, and we consider that, except perhaps as regards matters of Imperial concern such as railways, any material amendment of the Police law ought to be made in the Legislative Councils of the different Provinces.

352. The Lieutenant Governor of the United Provinces complained of encroachment on the Provincial sphere of administration by the Director of Criminal Intelligence, and we have received similar complaints in other Provinces as to what was regarded as the undesirable activity of this officer. In proposing his appointment to the Secretary of State, the Government of India distinctly rejected the suggestion that the functions of the Director should extend to inspection of general police work throughout India, and to the preparation of a general quinquennial review of police administration; and held that his tours in the Provinces should be simply for the purpose of procuring information on the matters for which his post was specially created. Their Home Secretary put the same view before us in evidence, and admitted that, in one case at any rate, the complaint of a Local Government as to undue interference by the Director had been justified. He repudiated the idea that it was legitimate for the Director to suggest action to the Local Governments in matters of police administration, or to induce the Government of India to intervene if such advice was not followed; and he expressed the view that the special connexion of the Director with matters of re-organization consequent on the report of the Police Commission would shortly cease, and that there would be much less friction hereafter with reference to the Director's normal functions. We trust that this will be the case, for while, if confined to these functions, the Director should be a distinctly valuable agency, any attempt to go beyond them would infringe on the proper sphere of the Provincial Governments and their officers.

The Director of Criminal Intelligence should hereafter be confined to the normal functions contemplated for him when he was appointed.

EDUCATION.

353. The Provincial Departments of Public Instruction owe their existence and organization to Sir Charles Wood's Despatch of 1854, and having regard to the vast political importance of a well organized system of education, the Government of India have habitually laid down general instructions as to the conduct of educational work.

The Government of India have habitually laid down general instructions on educational policy.

354. The then existing conditions in regard to education were considered by a Commission appointed by the Government of India in 1882; and in 1901 Lord Curzon convened a conference of the Provincial Directors of Public Instruction, and other educational experts, over which he himself presided. Their deliberations led to:—

The Educational Conference of 1901: its results.

(i.) The appointment of an Imperial Director General of Education, whose function it is to advise the Government of India on all educational matters that come before them. He makes periodical tours in the Provinces for the purpose of conference with Local Governments and their educational officers, and inspects educational institutions; but he has no power to give any executive instructions to Provincial authorities.

The Director General is also at the head of a small educational bureau, which collects information as to the organization of schools in India, their curricula and methods, and obtains similar information in regard to schools in other countries. This bureau has been made some use of by Local Governments and their officers, as well as by the Government of India, while it occasionally publishes special reports dealing with educational matters.

(ii.) The appointment of a Commission to examine the working of the Indian universities, viz., those of Calcutta, Madras, Bombay, Allahabad and Lahore. The result of the Commission's labours was the present Universities Act, which remodelled the governing bodies of the universities, gave them teaching functions, and enabled them to exercise larger control over their affiliated colleges.

Act VIII

(iii.) The issue of a Resolution by the Government of India in regard to the future development of education generally.

H. D. Res.
No 199-
211, of 11th
March,
1904.

The condition and progress of the educational system in India have, in fact, been subject to periodical review every few years by the Supreme Government, who have on each occasion issued such general instructions as appeared to be desirable.

Imperial
Gazetteer,
Vol. IV.,
p. 41C.

355. All these steps we consider to be entirely within the legitimate sphere of the Government of India, who, in recent years, have given liberal pecuniary assistance to the Provincial Governments for educational work.

Evidence as to absence of excessive rigidity in the control exercised by the Government of India over Local

356. In regard to the relations of the Government of India with the Provinces in educational matters, we quote the following from the evidence of Mr. Giles, the officiating Director-General of Education, who had spent nearly the whole of his service as an educational officer of the Bombay Government.

"In educational matters the influence of the Government of India does not [now] tend to excessive rigidity or uniformity. On the contrary, it appears to me that there is every desire to comprehend local conditions, and to facilitate local developments. The Government of India properly lays down general principles to be observed, and so far guides general educational administration, but it does not insist on uniformity for all Provinces, and fully recognizes the desirability and necessity of development in accordance with local needs and conditions. . . . In the past there was a tendency on the part of the Government of India towards rigidity. Such tendency was often due to misapprehension of local aims and conditions. . . . I can bear testimony to the fact that it is at present the desire of the Home Department to hamper local administrations as little as possible, and to give them a free hand so long as they do not depart from standard principles."

Mr. Giles further states that, apart from financial restrictions, the lessening of which we have recommended, he can give no striking instance of references now required from the Local Governments which are really unnecessary.

43576-7.

General agreement in this view, with some exceptions.

357. Speaking generally, we concur in this view; but we have noticed a few cases in which there appears to have been some tendency towards unnecessary uniformity. Thus, as a result of the Educational Conference of 1901, an endeavour was made to introduce a generally uniform code for European schools, and no Local Government can modify any of the provisions of this 2301-4.

code, as finally settled for its Province, without the consent of the Governor-General in Council. This has been made a matter of complaint in Bombay and Bengal, and the officiating Director-General of Education agreed that it was not necessary to hamper Provincial Governments in this way. The general educational codes and rules are already different for each Province, and the Government of India do not attempt to interfere with these so long as the general principles which they have laid down are adhered to.

A case also came before us in which the Government of India had asked the Bengal Government to reconsider the provision of separate playgrounds for two proposed colleges at Ranchi, suggesting that the colleges might have one in common. On such a detail the original view of the local authorities might well have been accepted without further comment.

358. Complaint was made in Burma of an alleged forcing of the general Indian educational system on that Province. As regards the action of the Government of India, the real grievance appears to have been the refusal to create a local university. Burman institutions are now affiliated to the University of Calcutta, and the present Director of Public Instruction considers that this connexion has had a narrowing effect upon education in the Province.

Burma should have a university of its own as soon as circumstances permit.

As secondary and collegiate education has hitherto been very backward in Burma, it was not unnatural that the Province should at the outset be affiliated to an existing university, but we think that a local university should be established as soon as circumstances permit.

359. The backward state of higher education, and the fact that primary education is mainly carried out through the medium of indigenous monastic schools, have hitherto precluded the creation of a large Education Department in Burma, and necessitated the importation of Directors of Public Instruction from other Provinces. The Indian prepossessions of such officers may, no doubt, have led them to give insufficient consideration to the monastic vernacular schools, which have made reading and writing much more common in Burma than in any other Province; and we agree with the witnesses who desire to see these institutions preserved and fostered.*

The monastic schools in Burma should be preserved and fostered.

360. In most Provinces, and especially as regards primary education, district boards and municipalities are responsible for a great deal of the educational work now carried on. Their functions and relations with the Local Government in this respect will be dealt with in Part III.

361. The Education Department of each Province consists of a Director of Public Instruction, with an establishment which includes the inspecting officers of various grades and the teaching staff, from assistant teachers in primary schools up to professors and principals of colleges. This service is divided into :—

(i.) The 'Imperial' (or "Indian") Educational service, which is generally recruited from England.

(ii.) The 'Provincial' service, which includes Indian inspectors of schools, heads of colleges and high schools, and professors; and (iii.) The 'Subordinate' service, which goes down to teachers in village primary schools. The 'Provincial' and 'Subordinate' services are recruited in India, and almost exclusively from natives of the country.

Proposed relaxation of restrictions imposed on Local Governments in regard to the filling up of certain appointments.

362. Subject to the initial recruitment of 'Imperial' educational officers from England, the major Provincial Governments have full power to fill up sanctioned appointments in their educational cadres, and to promote the officers occupying these posts, with the following exceptions :—

(i.) In the Central Provinces the appointment of Director of Public Instruction requires the sanction of the Government of India. The Chief Commissioner should have full powers here. Vol. X., App. X., p. 241.

(ii.) The temporary filling of vacancies in the Indian Educational Service by gentlemen who are not members of the 'Provincial' or 'Subordinate' services requires the sanction of the Secretary of State. We agree with the Home Secretary to the Government of India that this power might be suitably transferred to Provincial Governments. Ibid.

The creation of appointments in the 'Provincial' service, and the alteration of the emoluments of such posts, are subject to the general financial rules which we desire to see relaxed.* Paras. 120 et seq.

The Government of India do not appear to have laid down any rules in regard to the qualifications of officers to be appointed to the 'Provincial' Educational service.

MEDICAL AND SANITARY.

The Indian Medical Service.

363. The superior personnel of the civil Medical and Sanitary departments in India is drawn from the Indian Medical Service. This is an 'Imperial' service, recruited in the United Kingdom; and though the bulk of its members are normally in civil employ, it is primarily a military organization, and its members are commissioned officers of the Army.† Those who are in military employ are concerned with matters affecting the health of the native troops‡, and the officers employed in civil functions form a military reserve which is liable to be utilized as such in the event of war. This enlistment of a single service for military and civil duties is described as an economical arrangement, which provides an adequate military reserve without prohibitive expense. 43086. 43237. Imperial Gazetteer, Vol. IV., p. 459.

Assistant surgeons.

364. The upper subordinate officers of the civil Medical and Sanitary departments are, for the most part, civil assistant surgeons. Each Local Government has its own establishment of these officers, who are trained in the Indian medical colleges, and must possess a university 43086.

degree or diploma. They hold charge of minor hospitals and the principal dispensaries, or are employed in the larger hospitals and in other subordinate appointments ; and the services of many of them are lent to municipalities and rural boards for work in the medical institutions maintained by these bodies. A certain number of civil surgeoncies, originally held by officers of the Indian Medical Service, have also been set apart, in each Province, for tenure by assistant surgeons.

43086. Military assistant surgeons, also recruited and trained in India, are mainly employed on Army work, but some of them are lent to the Local Governments for duties similar to those performed by civil assistant surgeons, with a view to the economical provision of a reserve for military purposes.

The assistant surgeon class, though styled a 'Subordinate' service is really of the same status as the 'Provincial' services in other departments.

43086. 365. The 'Subordinate' service proper consists, in the Civil Medical departments, mainly of civil hospital assistants, who are trained at local medical schools and employed in lower posts than the assistant surgeons. A certain number of military hospital assistants are, however, also placed at the disposal of the Local Governments for civil duty. Hospital assistants.

43086. 366. The medical administration of each Province is under the control of the Local Government, and is directed by an officer of the Indian Medical Service, who holds the rank of colonel, and the departmental title of Inspector-General of Civil Hospitals (Surgeon-General in Madras and Bombay). The selection of these officers now rests with the Government of India. Except in Bombay, district medical and sanitary arrangements are in charge of a Civil Surgeon.* He supervises the medical institutions of the district, which are mostly maintained by the rural boards and municipalities, and assists and advises these bodies, and the Collector, in dealing with sanitary matters. In Bombay the Civil Surgeon is principally occupied with duties at the headquarters station, but occasionally inspects outlying dispensaries, although these are under the direct supervision of the Surgeon-General, while district sanitary work is in the hands of the Deputy Sanitary Commissioners. Director-General of the Indian Medical Service.

370. The Director-General of the Indian Medical Service is the head of the service, and, as such, is responsible for the corps being maintained at its sanctioned strength, and for seeing that the authorized number of officers are at the disposal of the Commander-in-Chief, and of the Local Governments, for military and civil duties respectively. He also advises the Government of India in regard to the transfer of officers from military to civil duties or vice versa, and on the selection of officers for promotion to the administrative grade, which carries with it the rank of colonel.† The Director-General is also the administrative head of what is known as the Indian Subordinate Medical department, which comprises military assistant surgeons and hospital assistants, and he arranges for their training and recruitment, and for their transfer (when required) to civil employ.

The Director-General is directly subordinate to the Government of India in the Home Department, and advises that Department on questions referred by Local Governments in connexion with officers of the Indian Medical Service, the Indian Subordinate Medical department, and the Provincial establishments of civil assistant surgeons and hospital assistants, as well as on questions relating to medical institutions in the Provinces. He tours through India to confer with, and offer advice to, local administrative medical officers, and to visit medical institutions. Finally, he controls the x-ray institute at Dehra Dun, and the medical store depots, which are primarily military institutions, but also supply civil hospitals and dispensaries.

Promotion of Indian Medical Service officers, and of the subordinate staff.

371. The rank or grade promotion of officers in the Indian Medical Service and the Indian Subordinate Medical department is regulated by the Government of India, on the advice of the Director-General, and is mainly according to length of service. The promotion of civil assistant surgeons and hospital assistants also depends upon length of service, except in the higher grades, but is in the hands of Local Governments, though governed by uniform rules laid down by the Government of India. Civil assistant surgeons and hospital assistants have to pass septennial examinations as a condition of promotion. In the case of assistant surgeons in Madras and Bombay, these examinations are conducted by the local Surgeon-General; otherwise there is a common examination under the direction of the Director-General.

of an officer for a Province, or a group of connected Provinces, is ordinarily determined in England at the time he enters the service.

Each Local Government is entitled to a number of Indian Medical Service officers sufficient to fill the total number of cadre appointments in the Province, and to supply a normal reserve of 20 per cent. thereon to fill leave vacancies. Officers filling cadre appointments are placed permanently at the disposal of the Local Government, the normal reserve is temporarily at its disposal, and the transfer of an officer from the temporary to the permanent list requires the concurrence of the Government of India. Local Governments occasionally require special additions to staff on account of famine, plague or other emergency, and such demands are supplied, so far as it is practicable, by the Director-General drawing men from other Provinces, or from the military side.

373. The selection of medical officers to fill posts for which special qualifications are required—such as chemical examiners, alienists, jail officers, sanitary officers, and bacteriologists—is now made in increasing measure by the Government of India. They also appoint to professorships in medical colleges outside Madras and Bombay.

(b) Selection of Indian Medical Service officers to fill special posts.

374. A Local Government must obtain the sanction of the Government of India to the reversion to military employ of an officer whom it deems unfit for civil duties; and leave applications of Indian Medical Service officers have to be counter-signed by the Director-General, in order to enable him to see whether a Local Government is depleting its reserve unduly.*

375. It will thus be seen that Local Governments are under stringent control by the Government of India, both as regards their superior medical staff generally, and in respect to the filling up of particular appointments. In 1899 the Madras Government considered the position so unsatisfactory that it asked for a completely separate cadre of Indian Medical Service officers for duty in that Presidency, from which no officer should be withdrawn without reference to the Local Government, and, in the case of permanent withdrawal, without his replacement by another officer. The Government of India disapproved of these proposals, as being inconsistent with the scheme of a uniform Medical service for military and civil duty throughout India, and involving extra expense as well as grave administrative difficulties.

Suggestions formerly made for separate Medical services in Madras and Bombay.

In 1903, again, the Bombay Government asked for a separate civil Medical service; but the Government of India declined to take up this question, on grounds of policy and expense.

376. No similar proposal was specifically put before us; but various suggestions were made in the direction of giving Local Governments a freer hand in the selection of Indian Medical Service officers for civil employ, in the reversion to military duty of officers not found satisfactory in respect of civil work, and in the selection Suggestions now made for the relaxation of some of the restrictions now imposed on Local Governments in the matter of their medical staff.

* The Director-General states, however, that absence of his counter-signature would not debar the grant of leave to an officer, of officers for administrative and special posts. It was also suggested that junior Indian Medical Service officers might be more profitably employed, in the early years of their service, as supernumeraries in the large civil hospitals, where they could obtain greater facilities for the study of tropical diseases than on military medical work. At present officers are eligible for civil employ after two years' military work, but they do not, as a rule, quit military duty till they have put in not less than six years' service.

The existing character of the Indian Medical Service should be maintained, but suggestions are made for remedying the undue centralization which now obtains.

377. The special restrictions on Local Governments in the matter of their medical personnel might be obviated if superior civil medical work in the Provinces were made over to a separate civil Medical service, military exigencies being met by giving officers of this service some preliminary training with Indian troops, and by rendering them liable to be called up for military duty in case of emergency. We consider, however, that the evidence in no way justifies such a drastic measure, which would revolutionize the character of the present Indian Medical Service, and might lead to serious difficulties in recruitment; and we do not think that the suggestion would adequately provide for military requirements. We do not, therefore, recommend alteration in the existing character of the Indian Medical Service, but we make the following suggestions for remedying the undue centralization which, we think, now obtains.*

(i.) Local Governments should continue to take Indian Medical Service officers who desire civil employ, and have been declared eligible for a particular Province, in order of seniority.

(ii.) Such officers of the Indian Medical Service should, after having undergone such period of military training as the Government of India may consider essential, and as soon as they can conveniently be spared by the military authorities, be sent for civil duty to the Provinces to which they have been allotted. If there is, at the time, no cadre vacancy there, they can be employed as supernumeraries in large hospitals or otherwise. The military authorities would have the first claim to such supernumeraries in the event of a shortage in the military medical cadre.

(iii.) A Local Government should be able to revert an Indian Medical Service officer to military employ if it does not consider him suitable, provided such reversion takes place within three years of his first attachment to the Province for civil employ. We understand that this is the principle now adopted in the case of combatant military officers serving in a civil department, or in some special branch of the Army.

Assuming, as we do, that the initial distribution of Indian Medical Service officers among the Provinces, for eventual civil employ, which takes place before they come out to India, is carried out with reference to the probable needs of each Province, the above proposals are intended to solve the question of the employment of the men not actually required for military duties. These constitute a reserve which should, we consider, be distributed among the Provinces. There will then be no question of referring to the Director General in the case of the grant of leave to members of

* Messrs. Dutt and Hichens prefer a separate civil Medical service, 810-1, (iv.) The selection of Indian Medical Service officers to be full colonels, and for administrative military work, must rest with the Government of India as at present; but, among such officers, the Local Governments should have full freedom of selection for the headship of their civil medical departments.

938-44, (v.) Medical officers employed in jail, sanitary, and medical instruction work, and as chemical examiners and alienists, are all concerned with Provincial administration, and should be selected and promoted by the Local Governments. It will be sufficient for the Government of India to prescribe general qualifications. If a Local Government cannot find a suitable officer in its own Province, it can, of course, apply for a man from another.

20623, (vi.) There is much to be said for the view, put forward by some witnesses, that bacteriological institutes should, in present circumstances, be made entirely Imperial; but this is a matter of administrative expediency upon which we do not pronounce a definite opinion. If, however, Provincial institutes are maintained, the officers working in them should be selected by the Supreme Government; and steps should be taken to co-ordinate the work of the Provincial and Imperial institutes, and employ their labours to the best purpose, by periodical conferences such as those held by the Board of Agriculture.

Complaint was made, in Bombay and elsewhere, of recent orders by the Government of India which took away the discretionary power of Local Governments in matters relating to the acceptance of fees for private work by particular medical officers. We understand, however, that these rules are now under revision; and we need only say that, in our opinion, such matters ought to be decided by the Local Governments, the control of the Government of India, if any such is required, being limited to the prescription of general principles.

379. We consider that Local Governments should have as full power over their civil assistant surgeons and hospital assistants as in regard to other 'Provincial' and 'Subordinate' services; and that there is no necessity to place such officers on rates of pay which are uniform throughout India, or to lay down uniform rules as to recruitment and promotion.* As an instance of the undesirable delays that occur under the present system, we cite the fact that, when we took evidence, a scheme sent up by the Bengal Government for the improvement in pay of hospital assistants had been delayed for 2½ years, and was still under consideration, because the Government of India had to consider the circumstances in other Provinces. In Burma, again, we were informed that the Local Government would have liked to obtain Burman hospital assistants instead of importing men from Madras and the Punjab, but that this would have involved paying more than the general scale permitted.

Unnecessary to place civil assistant surgeons and hospital assistants on uniform pay.

Footnote to para. 128.

* Sir F. Lely and Mr. Dutt dissent, as regards civil assistant surgeons, for the reasons stated previously.

Under present financial rules, reference to the Government of India would still be necessary in regard to the emoluments of senior assistant surgeons, which rise to Rs. 300 a month, and to alterations in grade pay generally; but the proposals we have made in Chapter III. will do away with these restrictions.

The scheduling by the Government of India of particular civil surgeoncies as tenable by assistant surgeons is unnecessary.

380. While the Government of India must continue to regulate the number of civil surgeoncies which may be made over to the assistant surgeon class in each Province, Local Governments should, within such limits, have full power to post assistant surgeons to any particular civil surgeoncy. In other words, the scheduling by the Government of India of particular stations as tenable by assistant surgeons, should be discontinued.

The Director General of the Indian Medical Service should be more freely used by Local Governments as an adviser.

381. We think that the Director General of the Indian Medical Service should be used by the Local Governments as an adviser in medical questions to a greater extent than he is at present, and that his functions in this respect should be of the same character as those which we propose for Imperial Inspectors-General as a class.

The Imperial Sanitary Commissioner.

382. Between 1880 and 1904, the Director General was also Sanitary Commissioner with the Government of India, but in the latter year a separate Imperial Sanitary Commissioner was appointed. His functions were described as being to advise the Government of India upon sanitary and bacteriological questions, and to consult and confer with Local Governments and their Sanitary officers on these matters, but he was not to be allowed to encroach, in any respect, on the administrative authority of the Local Governments and their officials. The Sanitary Commissioner is also in direct charge of the central bacteriological institute at Kasauli.

(i.) That the position of the Provincial Sanitary Commissioners should be improved.

(ii.) That, as a preliminary step towards unifying the Sanitary departments throughout India, Sanitary officers should be directly appointed by the Central Government.

(iii.) That an 'Imperial' service of Sanitary Engineers should be created.

It appears to us that these suggestions trench on the administrative sphere, and were not in accordance with the terms of the Sanitary Commissioner's appointment. His functions in relation to the Provincial Governments should, we think, be of an advisory, and mainly of a technical, character; and his relations with them and with their officers should be regulated by the suggestions we have made in respect to Imperial Inspectors-General as a class. Acting within these limitations, he should prove a very useful adviser to Local Governments as well as to the Government of India.

384. Our recommendation in paragraph 377 (v.) above will cover the appointment by Local Governments of their own Sanitary Commissioners, a power which is now enjoyed only by the Governments of Madras and Bombay. A fortiori they should have a free hand in the selection of Deputy Sanitary Commissioners, which the Imperial Sanitary Commissioner desired to place in the hands of the Government of India.

CHAPTER VIII.

IMPERIAL INSPECTORS GENERAL, ETC.

386. When dealing, in previous chapters, with the various Departments of the Government of India which control and supervise subjects primarily administered by Local Governments, we have had occasion to discuss the position and duties of certain Imperial officers variously known as Directors or Inspectors General.* It is necessary, however, to consider more particularly the functions and position of these officers as a class. Such experienced administrators as the late Lieutenant Governor of the Punjab (Sir D. Ibbetson) and the present Lieutenant Governor of the United Provinces have thought it necessary to sound a note of warning as to the possibility of administrative encroachments by the Imperial Inspectors General, while in Madras and Bombay they are regarded with frank alarm, and the need of limiting their functions has been strongly insisted upon.

387. The principal officers of this class are the following :—

The principal Inspectors General.

Under the Home Department—

The Director General, Indian Medical Service.

The Sanitary Commissioner with the Government of India.

The Director General of Education.

The Director of Criminal Intelligence.

Under the Revenue and Agriculture Department—

The Inspector General of Forests.

The Inspector General, Civil Veterinary Department.

The Inspector General of Agriculture.

Under the Public Works Department—

The Inspector General of Irrigation.

Under the Finance Department—

The Inspector General of Excise and Salt.

Under the Commerce and Industry Department—

The Director, Geological Survey, in respect to mining matters.

42521. The appointments shown in italics were created in, or subsequently to, 1901 ; but one of them, the Sanitary Commissionership, is a revival of a separate post, the functions of which were subsequently merged in those of the Director General of the Indian Medical Service ; and another, the Inspector Generalship of Irrigation, was formerly held by the Secretary to the Government of India in the Public Works Department in addition to his secretariat functions.

Vol. X.,
App. Ic.,
p. 193.

* The difference in title does not connote difference in functions—thus, the Director General of Education has no power to “direct” Provincial educationists—and we shall refer to these officers generically as Imperial Inspectors General.

These officers in no way replace Secretaries to the Government of India.

388. In considering the manner in which the Inspectors General should be utilized, we would lay stress on the fact that they cannot, in any way, replace the Secretaries to the Government of India in the Departments with which they are connected. The Secretary, whose position corresponds generally with that of a Permanent Under Secretary of State in the United Kingdom, must remain the adlatus of the Member of Council in charge of a Department, and the object of creating an Inspector General is to assist him with expert knowledge, and larger personal acquaintance with local conditions than can be possessed by the Secretariat staff.

Their prime function is to act as advisory officers to the Central and Local Governments.

389. The duties of the Imperial Inspectors General are fully defined in the Resolutions of the Government of India constituting their appointments, some of which we have already referred to. Their prime function, as there explained, is to act as advisory officers to the Government of India and also to Local Governments, and it is clearly stated that their appointment is not to involve administrative interference with the latter.

Paras. 185, 205, 301, 319, 328, 345, 352, 354, 370, 382.

Arguments of the Home Secretary as to the administrative utility of Inspectors General.

390. The utility of these officers from an administrative point of view was strongly urged by the Home Secretary to the Government of India. He has suggested to us that, as decentralization progresses, the existing methods of obtaining information as to the proceedings of Local Governments will prove inadequate to enable the Government of India to discharge their responsibilities to the Secretary of State, or to exercise their legitimate functions of control over the Local Governments; and that it is "essential that they should have some machinery for keeping them continuously informed of what is going on in the different Provinces, and to bring to their notice matters which can be learnt only on the spot." He considers that an Imperial Inspector General should be entitled to obtain direct from officers in the Provinces any information which may be necessary to enable him to keep the Government of India informed on matters of general importance relating to his branch of the administration, and that, to that end, every facility should be given him by the corresponding officials of Local Governments. Sir H. Risley would prefer such references to be made formally rather than demi-officially, though he does not attach special importance to this; and he would make it a general instruction that such correspondence should be restricted as much as possible, while he would also forbid periodical returns being called for, except with the sanction of the Government of India. He lays stress, in fact, on the great advantage of the Government of India being able to supplement paper information by the first-hand knowledge of expert inspecting officers.

Other considerations in favour of these officers.

391. Another consideration in favour of Inspectors General is that their knowledge of the various Provinces will occasionally enable them to advise the Government of India against the undue application of a tendency to prescribe for one Province methods that have succeeded in another, which is to a certain extent inevitable in the case of Members and Secretaries of the Government of India whose previous experience has usually been in one Province only. We have already had occasion to note this tendency in respect to land revenue 45549-50.

Para. 287.

matters. An Inspector General's initial experience may, it is true, also have been in a single Province; but his personal contact with diverse conditions elsewhere should soon dissipate any doctrinaire prepossessions in favour of universal application of the methods with which he was primarily familiar.

14664-5.

It may also be contended that the existence of these Inspectors General will permit the delegation to the Provincial Governments of powers which it might otherwise have seemed desirable to keep in the hands of the Central Government.

Vol. VIII.,
App. II.,
p. 232.

392. The Bombay Government challenges the necessity for most, at any rate, of the present Inspectors General, and holds that they should not be permitted to visit the Provinces, or to correspond with Provincial officers, unless authorized to do so by the Local Government. The other Local Governments, however, do not take up this extreme attitude, although they are by no means satisfied with the present position.

The utility of Inspectors General as advisers and inspectors in technical matters is generally recognized.

Vol. IX.,
App. V.,
p. 237.

The late Sir D. Ibbetson drew attention to the danger that the specialization, which has led to the appointment of the Imperial Inspectors General, might result in centralization. Specialization is a necessary development of modern administration, and so far as the Imperial Inspectors General, by inspection and advice, improve the technical efficiency of the administrative departments of the Government of India and of the Local Governments, the evidence we have taken appears fully to recognize the benefit which such officers are able to confer, by assisting administrative officials whose tale of work and previous education does not permit them to be themselves experts in all the subjects with which they have to deal.

393. The Government of India seem, however, to think that specialization must also involve some degree of centralization, while Local Governments evidently regard such a result with grave apprehension.

The Local Governments and their principal officers are, however, very apprehensive of administrative interference by Inspectors General.

The Governments of Madras, the United Provinces and the Punjab, the Chief Secretaries in Bengal and the Punjab, and the Financial Commissioner of Burma all warned us of the danger that the Inspectors General might assume administrative control, and that their activities might undermine the constitutional position of the Local Governments. The Chief Secretaries of Bengal, Eastern Bengal and Assam, and the United Provinces urged that the Local Governments ought to be heard before the Government of India took any administrative decision upon the opinion of these officers, and this view found favour elsewhere. Finally, the Chief Secretary in Madras, and the Financial Commissioner of Burma held that it would be a long time before any Inspector General could obtain such knowledge of the systems of the different Provinces as to render him a thoroughly trustworthy adviser in regard to the very diverse circumstances and conditions of each. This view was shared by the officiating Director General of Education.

394. There was, in fact, practical unanimity among the senior officers of all the Provinces that the sphere of duty of the Imperial Inspectors General should, except in matters of research and enquiry, be limited to consultation and advice, or as some witnesses in Bengal put it, that such officers should not go beyond suggestion and inspection.

Such apprehensions have obscured appreciation of the utility of Inspectors General.

Indeed, the possible dangers to the position of Local Governments from these expert officers loomed so large in some Provinces as to obscure appreciation of the undoubted benefits which might be secured if their sphere of work were clearly and suitably defined, benefits which have, as already stated, been frankly admitted by a number of important officials. We were, in fact, left under the impression that the Provincial Governments had, generally, not consulted the Inspectors General as much as they might with advantage have done.

An agency of this character is necessary, but its existence should not bring about any greater degree of centralization.

395. While admitting the necessity for an agency of this character, and the advantages which may be derived therefrom, we consider that the existence of Imperial Inspectors General need not, and should not, bring about any greater degree of centralization. We think it clear, however, that there has been a tendency in that direction, and this requires to be checked, not merely by stricter observance of the instructions already issued, but by a more detailed definition of the functions of Imperial Inspectors General and the manner in which these are to be exercised, and this we proceed to give.

Proper functions of an Inspector General.

396. After consideration of the great mass of opinion placed before us on this subject, we hold that the proper functions of an Imperial Inspector General are :—

(i.) The charge of experiments and research which the Government of India desire to carry out directly, and the supervision and co-ordination of subsidiary research in the Provinces.

(ii.) The establishment of bureaux of information with special regard to the needs of Imperial and Provincial administrative departments, and the dissemination of useful information.

(iii.) The furnishing of advice and information to the Government of India in regard to technical matters of which the Inspector General has special knowledge.

(iv.) The furnishing of full and ready assistance to Provincial Governments and their officers, either in response to enquiry or on his own initiative.

(v.) Inspection, throughout India, in respect to matters falling within his sphere.

Methods in which his functions should be exercised.

397. In order that an Inspector General may discharge these functions, he should have the right of the freest personal enquiry on tour wherever he may choose to go, and to receive every help that local officers can render to him, in furtherance of such enquiry. As a corresponding duty, he should give full notice to the Local Government, as well as to the head of the department with whose work he is concerned, whenever he proposes to visit a Province, informing them of the object of his visit, and enquiring if there is anything to which the Local Government would wish him to give special attention while he is in its territories.

398. On the conclusion of his tour in a Province, he should submit to the Local Government a memorandum stating his conclusions in regard to matters that have come under his notice, and as to which he is entitled to advise, while if he has noticed methods or systems which he considers to be unsatisfactory, he should indicate the remedial action which he deems necessary. When, however, an Inspector General sees reason to write in this latter sense on matters which fall within the sphere of a Provincial Government, he should, if possible, see either the Secretary or the Member of Government in charge of the department concerned before he leaves the Province.

An Imperial Inspector General should send a copy of his inspection notes to the Government of India; but this should be only for information, and that Government should not take any direct action upon them in respect of matters of Provincial administration until the Local Government has had an opportunity of dealing with the case.

The Local Government should include the Inspector General's memorandum, and any ensuing correspondence or orders, in its printed "A" proceedings. As these are forwarded monthly to the Government of India, that Government will, if the memorandum has raised any serious point, be able to ascertain the action taken upon it by the Local Government, and to take such further steps (if any) as may then seem necessary.

399. Encouragement should also be given to Provincial heads of departments to visit centres of Imperial research and enquiry, and every assistance should be rendered to them in respect to the objects of their visit.

Provincial heads of departments should visit centres of Imperial research.

400. It is most undesirable that the Imperial Inspectors General should have any administrative authority in the Provinces, still more that they should be regarded as being in any way the executive heads of the departments with which they are connected. Development of their functions in that direction would give the Provincial departmental officer two masters, and an inducement to look past his own Local Government, and this is evidently one of the points on which Local Governments are most sensitive.

Imperial Inspectors General should have no administrative authority in the Provinces.

34522-31.
Vol. VIII.,
App. II.,
p. 232.

It follows that direct communication between the Inspector General and the heads of Provincial departments should be confined to technical matters, and, even there, should not extend to anything involving criticism of existing methods, suggestions for any new departure, or calls for information which cannot be easily and readily furnished by the Provincial officer. Any communication going beyond this should be addressed to the Local Government. Whether communication between the Inspector General and the heads of Provincial departments should be official or demi-official is a matter which should be settled in accordance with the views of each Local Government. We mention this point as we find that some of the Local Governments received with dissatisfaction a recent change from the demi-official to the official form, sanctioned by the Government of India in the case of the Sanitary Commissioner.

401. Further, in matters touching general administration, all appearance on the part of the Government of India of using their expert advisers to coerce Local Governments into adoption of projected reforms for which these are not prepared should be avoided. These advisers will not be in a position to weigh the local factors which tell for or against administrative changes with the knowledge of the men on the spot and of the Provincial Governments. They may occasionally tender useful information as to steps which have been taken in other Provinces, or bring to notice that an experiment which local authorities meditate has been tried elsewhere and failed; but having furnished information of this sort, they should leave it to the Provincial Government to make such use thereof as it thinks fit, for it may deem that the local circumstances render such a precedent inapplicable. The main function of the Inspectors General with regard to administrative problems is, we think, to keep scientific knowledge up to date and disseminate it, and thus to enhance the appreciation of the technical factors of a problem by Provincial experts and Local Governments, as well as by the Government of India.

Dangers of making use of Inspectors General as a fresh administrative agency.

402. In such matters as police, irrigation, sanitation, excise, education, agriculture and forests, special care is necessary to guard against the danger of making use of the Inspectors General as a fresh administrative agency.* These are branches of work essentially within the domain of Provincial administration, and if the hand of an Inspector General can be traced in imposing policy or in shaping administrative local detail, the Provincial Governments cannot but be quick to feel that the Government of India are setting them aside and giving their confidence elsewhere. Any such impression must at once react on the feeling of responsibility among Local Governments and Provincial departments, and tend to deaden local initiative, producing lifeless uniformity and timidity, or else active hostility to suggestions of the Central Government for which an Inspector General is thought to be responsible. As the machinery for administrative enquiry and action by the Government of India is already ample, no further agency is required here.

Further suggestions for avoiding this risk.

403. Administrative interference by Inspectors General is, in our opinion, the gravest danger of the present system. To guard against it effectually, we think that whenever an Inspector General, in advising on a case, makes any recommendation, or statement of alleged fact, at variance with the report of the responsible Local Government, with the result that a Secretary to the Government of India proposes that the Local Government should be overruled, the case should be sent back confidentially to the latter Government, for consideration of, and comment on, the remarks of the Inspector General and the Secretary, before the Government of India finally deal with it. The reply minute by the Local Government should, in such circumstances, be entirely self-contained, and should be over the signature of the Lieutenant Governor or Chief Commissioner, or, in the case of a Council Government, of the Member of Council primarily responsible for the department concerned.

The fact that this is to be the normal course of procedure will make the Inspector General temperate in criticism, and cautious in his statement of facts, and will tend to prevent the Government of India forming a mistaken appreciation of the problems submitted for their orders. These expert advisers cannot always be relied on for complete accuracy as regards Provincial matters, and may easily be subject to correction in respect thereto by officers with greater knowledge of the Province discussed.

* But in respect to productive or protective irrigation works which are to be financed by the Government of India, the Inspector General of Irrigation must of course advise that Government in all matters which affect the selection of a particular scheme as an object of expenditure, and the amount of outlay thereon. 8316-22, 8379-82, 15052, 27479-86.

404. In short, there is a sphere of most useful work open to the Government of India specialists, in helping all who have administrative responsibility but have not time for comparative study, and in keeping the Central and Provincial Governments apprised of the results of their inspections ; but they should not be allowed to overshadow Provincial experts or to usurp the responsibility of Provincial authorities in matters relating to ordinary administration. On the other hand, the Provincial Governments should consult them fully and freely on any matter in which their advice may be of assistance.

Such specialists should be selected rather for high technical skill than on the ground of administrative ability or departmental seniority.

Concluding remarks as to the proper sphere of work of Inspectors General.

405. We cannot agree with those witnesses who suggest that periodical conferences of the heads of Provincial departments would be a satisfactory substitute for the Imperial Inspectors General. Heads of departments are primarily selected for administrative ability and may lack high technical knowledge, while occasional conferences could not in any case fill the place of a permanent expert adviser of the Government of India, and of Local Governments, on technical matters.

Occasional conferences by heads of Provincial departments would be useful, but cannot replace Inspectors General.

Para. 322.

We consider, however, that the work of an Inspector General might often be usefully supplemented by conferences of this description, over which he should preside. As we have remarked with reference to the Board of Agriculture, a periodical conference of this character ensures co-operation and co-ordination, and reduces the risk of friction and misunderstanding between the Central and Local Governments.

406. The regular touring of the Inspectors General should in no way prevent occasional visits by the Heads of Local Governments to the headquarters of the Government of India, and by Members and Secretaries of the Government of India to the Provincial capitals. We agree with the Lieutenant Governor of the United Provinces that much benefit would accrue from such personal communication in respect to important matters which may be under official discussion, and we should like to see some relaxation of the restrictions which have been placed upon the touring of the Members and Secretaries of the Supreme Government.

Personal communication between the highest officials of the Central and Local Governments should be encouraged.

407. The Government of India have frequently appointed Commissions or Committees to deal with particular branches of administration in the Provinces which appeared to call for general reform or for greater co-ordination, and we consider that the appointment of such bodies has led to good results. When any question of general reform is under consideration, it is much better to proceed by this method than by taking steps on the advice of Imperial Inspectors General. Dangers to be guarded against are, however, the passing of over-detailed orders on a Commission's report, and the assumption of a larger degree of control over Provincial administration in consequence thereof. Any development of policy, or increase in the efficiency of establishments, resulting from a Commission's labours should enable the future control of the Government of India to become more general, and ought thus to promote decentralization rather than lead to increased supervision over the Local Governments.

Commissions and Committees of Enquiry appointed by the Government of India: their utility and possible dangers.

CHAPTER IX.

LEGISLATION, APPEALS, AND REPORTS AND RETURNS, ETC.

LEGISLATION.

The existing outside checks on Provincial Legislation should continue.

408. All Acts passed by a Provincial Legislative Council have to receive the assent of the Governor-General as well as of the Governor or Lieutenant-Governor ; and a Local Government cannot ordinarily place a Bill before its Legislature until it has been examined and approved by the Government of India and submitted to the Secretary of State. Para. 28.

The Bombay Government desires, except where Provincial legislation may affect direct Imperial interests, such as defence, or foreign relations, to eliminate the control of the Government of India over such legislation, preserving only a formal assent thereto by the Governor-General, and a general control by the Secretary of State. Vol. VIII., App. II., p. 234. 35732-9.

We have already expressed the view that the Government of India should exercise a general control over Local Governments in administrative matters, and it follows that they should be in a position to supervise the embodiment of administrative policy in Provincial legislation. Having regard to this, and in view of the grave consequences which might result from hasty or ill-conceived measures, we think that the existing control over Provincial legislation should be fully maintained.

Our proposals and their corollaries will involve much amending legislation.

409. The proposals we make throughout this Report in the direction of decentralization, and specific suggestions by Local Governments and high officials which we have not thought it necessary to discuss in detail, will, if accepted, involve, in present circumstances, an immense amount of continuous amending legislation in regard to sections of particular Acts which vest in the Government of India, in a Local Government, or in a specified subordinate authority, powers the delegation of which to lower agency has now become desirable.

Schedule III., appended to this volume, embodies proposals submitted by certain Local Governments in this direction, arranged in three parts, dealing respectively with Imperial Acts of more or less general application, Imperial Acts of local application, and Provincial Acts.

We do not commit ourselves to an opinion as to the individual merits of these suggestions, save in so far as they are covered by proposals we have ourselves made ; and the schedule does not embody the views of all the Local Governments at the time the Commission assembled*, nor was it framed on consideration of the necessities which will arise if our proposals be adopted, and applied in like spirit to matters with which we were unable to deal in detail. The schedule as it stands is, however, sufficient to indicate the enormous amount of legislative amendment which will arise out of our recommendations.

It will be impossible to deal with these by the specific amendment of every Act affected.

410. To deal with this by the separate specific amendment of every Act affected is, we think, out of the question. Such legislation could not proceed at any uniform rate or in any uniform shape ; and the amount of detail involved, and the absence of finality in respect to a number of proposals for delegation which would be very useful as provisional measures, would clog the Legislatures of India with petty amending Bills for years to come. Further, when there is any question of amending an important Act in some of its details, the tendency is always to postpone such a step until it becomes necessary to effect a general revision of the law. This method of procedure would therefore involve great delay, while its results would be rigid, and incapable of further amendment save by the same cumbrous method, and the progress of the reforms we desire would thus be seriously hampered.

* The Bombay Government, for example, did not submit any such proposals. 35484-7.

411. It appears to us, therefore, that the procedure required must take one of two shapes, viz. :—

(i.) The enactment of a general Decentralization Act, or Acts. These would contain, in schedules, the sections of all the specific Acts in which it is desired to forego the necessity of previous sanction to administrative acts by the Government of India, to substitute the Local Government for the Government of India as the executive authority which can take action in certain cases, similarly to substitute for a Local Government a Board of Revenue or other subordinate authority, and so on.

(ii.) The passing of a general Act of Delegation, which would permit the transmission of executive functions from a higher to a lower authority by notification of the Government of India or of a Local Government, as the case might be. Such an Act would follow the analogy of Act v. of 1868 (India), which permits the Bombay Government to devolve upon the Commissioner in Sind any functions vested in it by Acts of local application, and, with the consent of the Government of India, to make a similar delegation of powers given to it by general Imperial Acts.* There is also a later precedent in the case of Burma, where section 5 of Act XVIII. of 1888 authorizes (subject to the sanction of the Government of India) delegation to the Financial Commissioner of any functions assigned by law to the Local Government.

412. Opinion as between these two courses was fairly evenly divided ; but in favour of the latter we have the Governments of Bombay, Bengal, Eastern Bengal and Assam, and the United Provinces, and the late Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab, while the Chief Secretaries of Burma and the Central Provinces gave a qualified assent to the principle.† Among those opposed to the suggestion were the Members of Council in Madras, the Agent to the Governor-General in Baluchistan, the Commissioner in Sind, and the Home and Revenue Secretaries of the Government of India, the two latter preferring the schedule method.‡

There are two other alternatives :—

(i.) A general Decentralization Act or Acts, with schedules of the specific amendments required.

(ii.) A general Act of Delegation, following the analogy of the Sind Act.

Some witnesses would also limit the delegations permissible by excluding matters relating to taxation, or bearing upon the liberty of the subject*, and others again would provide wide delegating clauses in all future legislation.†

Objections to each course.

413. The objections to a Decentralization Act as described in paragraph 411 (i.) are, that though this would prove a more convenient machinery than the separate amendment of each Act, it would still involve a great amount of labour, correspondence, delay, rigidity, and want of finality, since even if schedules could be made complete as regards present requirements, they would very soon require further amendment.

The objections to a General Delegation Act are—

(a) That it would be giving what might be described as a “blank cheque” to the Executive Government, and would thus involve an abdication by the Legislature of its proper functions.

(b) That, in many cases, the necessity for reference to a Local Government or to the Government of India in particular matters was deliberately inserted in their Acts by the Imperial or Provincial Legislatures, and that modification of such provisions by executive order would be regarded as a breach of faith.

Primâ facie these objections to a Delegation Act are weighty, but we have indicated below how they can be met.

Our reasons for preferring a General Delegation Act.

414. We consider that a general Delegation Act affords the most convenient and elastic machinery for legislative decentralization. The Sind Act above referred to was itself based on the precedent of Act XXXII. of 1867 (India), under which the Governor-General in Council was empowered to delegate the powers of a Local Government to the then Chief Commissioners of Oudh, the Central Provinces and Lower Burma, and we have it from the present Commissioner in Sind that “the Act has undoubtedly proved most valuable, and its working has been entirely successful. A careful search of the Commissioner’s records since the date of its passing has failed to reveal a single instance of complaint against it. It has enabled the Commissioner in Sind to exercise the powers of a Local Government under a number of Acts which have since been passed, or extended to Sind in the natural development of more highly organized conditions of administration.” Other witnesses gave evidence to the same effect, and desired the extension of the Act outside Sind.

The Commissioner in Sind was not in favour of such extension, mainly, it would seem, because he feared that such a step would affect the exceptional position he now holds, and accelerate the tendency (to which he called attention) to place him more on a level with the ordinary Divisional Commissioners of the Bombay Presidency.

As observed in a subsequent chapter, while we desire materially to enhance the status of the ordinary Commissioners, we do not wish to lower the special position of the Commissioner in Sind, nor do we think that the extension of the principle of the Sind Delegation Act to other areas should, or would, have this effect.

The extension of such an Act to Bengal was, it may be observed, recommended by the local Salaries Commission of 1885-6.

Act V. of
Part X.

415. We have also the example of the new Indian Civil Procedure Code, which includes in the body of the Act only general uniform principles of procedure, while minor matters, which were formerly stereotyped in the law itself, are now relegated to rules which each High or Chief Court can frame, or alter, with the assistance of a special Rules Committee, and subject to the sanction of Government. It is, further, the common practice of Indian Acts to allow the executive Government to deal, by rule or notification, with a number of matters touching the specific application of the law.

Analogies in existing Acts, and in the new Civil Procedure Code.

416. We therefore recommend the enactment of a general Delegation Act on lines analogous to that which has worked so well in Sind, so as to enable the transmission of executive powers from a higher to a lower authority by Government notification; but we propose that the exercise of such powers shall be subject to the following safeguards, which we consider will effectively meet such objections as might be reasonably taken to a Delegation Act pure and simple, or to the general application of the Sind Act as it stands.*

(i.) The legislation in regard to which such Act may be used must have been in force for at least five years. This sufficiently meets the objection that where an Act has reserved powers to a particular authority, the Legislature must have intended that they should be kept in those hands. That may have been so at the time the Act was passed; but in the process of years the provisions of an Act become generally understood, and a body of legal and departmental rulings grow up which settles doubtful points and thus enables the delegation of functions to a lower authority.

(ii.) Any proposed notification of delegation of functions under this Act should be published in draft in the Government Gazette, and a reasonable period should be allowed for the submission of objections, as under the procedure in regard to rules and bye-laws laid down by the Indian General Clauses Act.

Act X. of
23.

(iii.) Any proposed delegation of powers vested by an Imperial Act in the Government of India, in a Local Government, or in a subordinate authority, to a lower authority than that mentioned by the Act, must be notified by the Government of India. Further, such draft notification must be placed on the table of the Imperial Legislative Council, and sufficient time afforded for members of that Council to make an interpellation, and if necessary move a resolution, on the subject.†

* Mr. Dutt dissents, and thinks that a General Delegation Act, empowering removal of legislative safeguards by executive orders is bad in principle. A general Act of the kind proposed does not exist in any part of the British Empire, and the numerous delegations proposed by Local Governments clearly indicate the dangers of such an Act in India. All reasonable delegations, requiring amendment of the law, can be effected by a few Amending Acts with schedules, passed by Legislative Councils after due consideration, while to give a "blank cheque" to the Executive would create alarm in India. And it would be considered a breach of faith, Mr. Dutt thinks, if existing Acts be altered under powers now conferred by a General Delegation Act.

† This they will be competent to do under the powers which the Secretary of State now proposes to confer upon them.

If any proposed delegation were found to evoke considerable opposition, the Government should relinquish it, or have recourse to special amending legislation to give it effect.

This procedure is, in fact, analogous to that adopted in the recent Port of London Act, under which acquisition of land for Port purposes, which would formerly have required special private Bill legislation, can be carried out under a Board of Trade order, provided such order has been communicated to both Houses of Parliament and has not evoked a hostile motion there.

(iv.) The same procedure should apply in the case of delegations proposed in respect to Acts passed by Provincial Legislatures. But here the action would be taken by the Local Government—with the previous consent of the Government of India in regard to the delegation of any powers which a Local Act has reserved to the Governor General in Council—and the papers would be placed on the table of the local Legislature.

(v.) Delegations made under this procedure should be capable of withdrawal by executive order if the Local Government, or the Government of India, as the case may be, should see special cause for such action.

Vol. V.,
App. II.,
p. 205.

As thus outlined, the procedure we propose would save much time and trouble in non-controversial matters, and greatly facilitate the adaptation of existing administrative machinery to altered circumstances, while the prerogatives of the Legislatures would be respected by informing them of all action proposed, and requiring their specific sanction to any suggested alteration which had provoked material opposition.

The practice of giving delegation powers in specific Acts should be extended.

417. Wide powers of delegation by means of executive notification have indeed been already granted under specific Acts of the Indian Legislatures, as for instance by those cited in the margin.

Future Acts should, as far as possible, give wide powers of a similar character, and where the Legislature has already assented in advance to such delegation, the more elaborate procedure outlined above would of course be unnecessary.

APPEALS.

418. We deal with the general question of appeals in Chapter XVII., but we have to consider here the extent to which the administrative actions of Local Governments should be subject to appeal to the Government of India, or to the Secretary of State. Such appeals may arise:—

(i.) In the case of Government officers who feel aggrieved by action on the part of a Local Government which affects their position in the public service.

(ii.) From members of the public in matters which affect them individually or generally.

419. There are already certain restrictions in regard to appeals from the decisions of Provincial Governments. Thus the Government of India Petition Rules permit

Vol. X.,
App. XIII.
pp. 245-7.

Restrictions already laid down in regard to appeals to—

Local Governments to withhold memorials addressed to the Government of India in certain cases, of which the following are the most important :—

(a) The Government of India.

Rule 11(7). (i.) In the case of an appeal against the order of a Local Government upholding, on appeal, the dismissal, removal, reduction, or other punishment of a Government servant, or an employé of a local authority, whose salary is not more than Rs. 100 a month.

Rule 11(8). (ii.) When an appeal is made against any decision which by law, or rule having the force of law, is declared to be final.

(iii.) When a petition is an appeal :—

Rule 11(11). (a.) in a case for which the law provides a different, or specific, remedy, or in regard to which the time allowed by law for appeals has expired ;

Rule 11(12). (b.) against an order or decision of the Local Government communicated to the petitioner more than six months previously, and where no satisfactory explanation of the delay in petitioning is afforded ;

Rule 11(10). (c.) against the non-exercise by a Local Government of a discretion vested in it by law or rule ;

Rule 11(6). (d.) from a judicial decision with which the executive has no legal power of interference.

Rule 11(13). (iv.) When no previous application has been made to the Local Government in a matter on which it is competent to pass orders.

Vol. X., App. XIII., pp. 248-51. 420. The Secretary of State's Memorial Rules, again, permit the Indian Governments to withhold transmission of memorials addressed to the Secretary of State, or to Your Majesty, when, inter alia—

(b) The Secretary of State.

Rule XII.(7). (i.) Such memorial is an appeal against an order of an Indian Government regarding the dismissal, removal, reduction, or other punishment of a Government servant, or of an employé of a local authority, whose salary is not more than Rs. 100 a month.

Rule XII.(7). (ii.) When it is an appeal against a similar order of a Local Government, which has been confirmed by the Government of India, in the case of an officer whose salary is not more than Rs. 250 a month.

Rule XII.(6) & (8). (iii.) When a memorial is an appeal from a judicial decision, or against a decision which, by any law or rule having the force of law, is declared to be final.

Rule XII.(10). (iv.) In the case of an appeal against the non-exercise by an Indian Government of a discretion vested in it by law or rule.

In all cases in which a petition to higher authority is withheld by an Indian Government in the exercise of the above powers, the memorialist must be informed of the action taken and the reason therefor ; and periodical lists of petitions so dealt with have to be submitted to the Government of India or to the Secretary of State, as the case may be.

421. The evidence and arguments for and against restriction of the present rights of appeal from the decisions of Local Governments followed, generally speaking, those which we have analysed, in Chapter XVII., with primary reference there to appeals within the Provinces.

While greater finality should be given to the decisions of Local Governments, some right of appeal must remain.

The large right of appeal from the decisions of Provincial Governments which now exists undoubtedly leads to intervention by the Government of India in the details of Provincial administration. The whole object of our recommendations in the preceding chapters has been to give Local Governments larger powers in regard to administrative details, and it follows, therefore, that their decisions in such matters should be given greater finality than at present.

We cannot, however, entirely concur with some authorities who desire that Local Governments should have absolute discretion in regard to the treatment of officers belonging to 'Provincial' and 'Subordinate' services.* We note, too, that some witnesses who claimed very large administrative powers for Local Governments, recognized that personal appeals may legitimately be made to the Government of India.

Our suggestions
in regard to appeals from
servants.

422. The Home and Revenue Secretaries to the Government of India have suggested some expansion of the salary limits within which the decisions of Local Governments in respect to their officers should be regarded as final ; but we think that a better test in regard to the application of such finality is afforded by the status of the officer, and according as the decision passed is an original or an appellate order.

Officers belonging to 'Imperial' services, who are, as a class, appointed in the United Kingdom, must, we think, retain their present rights of appeal to the Government of India, and to the Secretary of State, against orders of a Local Government which affect them prejudicially. We would not, however, allow such appeal in respect of an officer's non-selection for a post to which considerations of seniority do not primarily apply, or against the refusal of a Local Government to grant him any pensionary or other concession which he cannot claim under law or rule.

In the case of officers belonging to 'Provincial' and 'Subordinate' services, we would allow a single appeal, to the Government of India, in cases where a Local Government has passed an original order which materially affects the position of the appellant in the public service, e.g., against orders of dismissal, suspension, degradation, or supersession in respect of promotion which is mainly accorded with reference to seniority ; but where the Local Government has acted as an appellate authority in respect of orders originally passed by an officer subordinate to it, its decision should be considered final. Nor should appeal lie against decisions which we desire to make non-appealable in the case of 'Imperial' officers.

And from mem-
public.

423. As regards memorials by members of the public against administrative actions, we consider that there should be no appeal beyond the decision of a Local Government where such decision has been passed on appeal from a subordinate authority ; but that against original orders of the Local Government there should (subject to the modification proposed in paragraph 425) be the same right of appeal as already exists.

Procedure
where a Local Government
alters the order of a subordinate authority to the disadvantage of the appellant.

424. Where a Provincial Government, on appeal, modifies orders passed by a subordinate authority, such modification is usually to the advantage of the appellant. It may, however, occasionally happen, that the Local Government's order varies the decision to his material disadvantage. Such variation should, we think, be treated as equivalent to an original order by the Local Government, and should be appealable accordingly.

In cases where appeal is allowed to the Secretary of State against the decision of a Local Government, such appeal should not lie until the petitioner has first memorialized the Government of India and obtained their orders. As the Memorial Rules at present stand, a man aggrieved by an action of the Government of Madras or Bombay may, in certain cases, appeal direct to the Secretary of State without any reference to the Government of India. Further, we think that the time limit now imposed in regard to the submission of appeals to the Government of India should apply also to memorials to the Secretary of State.

426. The evidence of the Secretaries to the Government of India goes to show that the number of periodical reports and returns, due to the requirements of the Supreme Government, has not materially increased of late years, although a contrary opinion was expressed by the Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces, who attributed the larger demand partly to the requirements of the Secretary of State and partly to those of the Government of India, while the Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces drew attention to the labour which was occasionally caused in supplying information in answer to Parliamentary questions.
- Within the Provinces, reports and returns have to be submitted by local officers with reference to the requirements of the Provincial Governments and other headquarters offices as well as to those of the Government of India. The complaint made in Madras was rather as to the needless complexity of some returns than of their excessive number. We were told, for instance, of a crop return extending into 150 columns, and the village accounts were mentioned as capable of simplification.
- Similarly, in Bombay, the two Bengals and the United Provinces, the evidence was less of a tendency to add to the burden of reports than as to the desirability of lightening the present load. Allegations as to the increase in the number of reports and returns called for were made mainly in Burma and the Punjab, and such increase was ascribed to the requirements of the Government of India and the Secretary of State, to the necessity of furnishing replies to Parliamentary questions, and to the development of special departments.*
427. It appears to us that reports and returns are unduly numerous, and occasionally too elaborate. In 1900-01 a serious attempt was made, under the auspices of Lord Curzon, to curtail the number and length of the periodical administrative reports submitted to the Government of India by the Local Governments, and the latter were enjoined to make similar enquiries in regard to the mass of departmental literature coming up to them.
- We think, however, that the curtailments of periodical returns thus effected were not drastic enough.
428. It has been suggested that a number of the present annual administration reports might be made triennial or even quinquennial, but we are not in favour of this course. The advance in decentralization which we recommend may make it possible to abolish some of the present returns, or to omit matters which now figure therein ; but in so far as they deal with points on which
- Number, and complicated character, of existing reports and returns.
- The action taken in 1900-01 to reduce reports and returns.
- It is undesirable to make annual administration reports triennial or quinquennial.

* 9972, 13689, 39251, 39577, 41007, 42325.

the Government of India and the Local Governments should be informed, decentralization makes it essential that these reports should be submitted not less frequently than at present. The course proposed is, moreover, open to the objection that where reports are submitted at long intervals, the officer who draws them up will often not have been in charge of his office during the whole period that they cover.

Fresh steps for curtailment of returns, etc., should now be undertaken, and repeated every few years.

429. We consider that the best means of reducing the present burden of returns and reports is to set on foot fresh enquiries similar to those instituted by Lord Curzon, both in the Provinces and with reference to the reports and returns required by the Government of India. Having regard to the tendency to stereotype returns which may only be temporarily required, we think that such enquiries should be repeated every few years.

430. We would likewise draw attention to the waste of time, and the burden on district officers, involved by headquarters authorities calling for reports from all Commissioners or Collectors, upon matters with which they could themselves deal, or on which only a few local officers could give a really useful opinion ; while such calls seem to be passed on, in large measure, by the recipient to officers subordinate to himself. Where advice from Commissioners and district officers is required at headquarters, reports should usually be called for only from a few selected officers.

Increase in Parliamentary questions relating to India. This work might be reduced by expansion of the functions of the Indian Legislatures.

431. Reference has been made above to the burden imposed on Government officials in India by having to supply information, sometimes of a far-reaching character, in answer to questions asked in Parliament. Of late years, consequent on the increasing interest taken by Members of Parliament in Indian administration, the number of references by the Secretary of State to the Government of India has very largely increased, as shown in the following statement furnished to us by the Home Secretary to the Government of India in respect of his Department.

A large number of these communications require reference to Local Governments and their officers.

The expansion of the functions of the Indian Legislative Councils recently announced by the Secretary of State may, we hope, render it possible to reduce the work now thrown upon administrative officers and departments in India by having to furnish answers to Parliamentary questions.

432. We would also draw attention to the gradual increase of Secretariat establishments throughout India. Thus, figures furnished to us in regard to Registrars, superintendents and clerks show that in 1907 the total strength of these officials in the Finance*, Home, Commerce and Industry and Revenue and Agriculture Secretariats of the Government of India amounted to 266, costing Rs. 46,000 a month, whereas in 1897 the same branches of administration required the services of only 141 men, costing Rs. 21,000 a month. Apart from such increases in the clerical establishment, the Finance Department has, during this period, received a Joint Secretary to deal with Military Finance work; the Revenue Department has obtained a Deputy Secretary, and the Home Department an additional Under Secretary; while the Commerce and Industry Department, which was constituted in 1905 with a Secretary and an Under Secretary, has already found the services of a second Under Secretary necessary.

Increase in Secretariat establishments largely inevitable, but our recommendations ought materially to diminish the work in headquarters offices.

The Provincial Secretariats have also expanded during this period.

This increase of establishments represents increase of work which is, no doubt, to some extent inevitable, the material, intellectual and political advance of the country bringing up new questions, or necessitating the reconsideration of old ones, and calling for elaboration and specialization in the various branches of the public services; while there is a growing tendency, on the part of all affected by the actions of Government officials, to appeal to the highest executive tribunal open to them.

Para. 49.

At the same time, as we have already observed, there has been an unmistakable tendency on the part of all Secretariats to interfere in unnecessary detail with the action of the authorities subordinate to them, and the recommendations we make in the direction of decentralization ought to result in a material diminution of work in the headquarters offices.

433. We have already referred to the desirability of reducing the bulk of Imperial Codes such as the Civil Service Regulations and the codes of the Public Works and Forest Departments. We think that Provincial administrative codes and manuals are also too lengthy. We find, for instance, that the manuals issued by the Bengal Board of Revenue on various subjects extend to between 20 and 30 volumes. We have already indicated that codification of rulings is desirable within certain limits, but we consider that these have been exceeded. We could not, of course, examine in detail the numerous and various Provincial manuals, but we were left under the impression that in many respects they limit the discretion of local officers too rigidly. We think that this defect should be remedied, whenever an existing manual comes under revision.

Provincial administrative codes and manuals are too lengthy and rigid.

PART II.

CHAPTER X.

SUGGESTIONS IN REGARD TO THE CONSTITUTION OF PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS, ETC.

Parliament originally contemplated the extension of the Council form of Government, which prevails in Madras and Bombay, to the other large Provinces.

434. We have already explained briefly the constitution of Local Governments, and have drawn attention to the fact that Madras and Bombay are under Governors in Council. Five of the other major Provinces are administered by Lieutenant-Governors without Executive Councils, and the Central Provinces are similarly ruled by a Chief Commissioner.

The Council form of Government, which is the older of the two, has always existed in the Presidencies of Madras and Bombay, and formerly applied in the old Presidency of Bengal from which the Government of India developed. The original intention was that, as large separate Provinces were called into being, this form of administration should be applied to them also. Thus, provision was made by Act of Parliament in 1833 for the creation of a Presidency of Agra* with a Governor-in-Council of its own, and in 1853 for the formation of the then undivided Province of Bengal into a similarly governed Presidency, as also for the creation of a new Presidency of like character. Although these provisions have not been utilized, and the actual step taken was the appointment of Lieutenant-Governors, they have never been repealed, but are merely held in abeyance.

Arguments in favour of present adoption of this course.

435. It has been suggested to us, chiefly by non-official witnesses, that it would tend to stability in administration, and enable larger delegation of power to Local Governments, if Council Governments were substituted for Lieutenant-Governorships. It was represented that when the Executive Government consists of one man who changes every five years, there is greater likelihood of fluctuations in policy and of the undue operation of personal opinions, and, it may be, personal prejudices.

Arguments against.

436. On the other hand, it is urged by experienced officials that there is no need for such a change of system. The arguments on this side of the case are that the Lieutenant-Governor is an able and experienced administrator, who in some instances has previous knowledge not merely of the Province he is called upon to govern but of another, and has had to deal with the larger problems of the Indian Empire, as a member of the Viceroy's Council; and that the concentration of power in a single hand leads to greater promptness and efficiency than exists in Council Governments, where the members may differ seriously among themselves.

Discussions of 1867-8.

437. The question was debated by the Government of India and by the India Council in 1867-8, when the weakness of the then Government of Bengal had been apparent in regard to the Orissa famine, and the Secretary of State had suggested, as a possible remedy, the administration of the Province by a Governor-in-Council, after the model of Bombay and Madras. The resulting discussions were published. On the side of a Governor-in-Council system were Sir Bartle Frere, Sir Henry Maine, and Sir William Grey, himself Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal; while against it was the then Viceroy, Lord Lawrence, whose most weighty support came from Sir W. Muir. The latter, however, admitted that a Lieutenant-Governor was not in so favourable a position as a Governor-in-Council for devolution of powers by the Government of India. "Where (he said) the whole power of Government vests in a single individual, it is never safe to relax a certain measure of oversight. For, however good a thing it is to have the personal activity and responsibility proper to individual action, you are at the same time liable to personal idiosyncrasies, to an over-zeal or activity in some particular direction, and, sometimes, also, to the prevalence of a crotchet, or (but this rarely) to remissness or unwillingness to grapple with some special question, or perhaps to neglect altogether some special department. Therefore, a certain degree of control is indispensable."

The discussion did not lead to any change in system.

45482-92. The Home Secretary to the Government of India declined, under instructions from that Government, to inform us as to more recent discussions, or to give his own views upon the question.

438. The following proposals for change were discussed by other witnesses :—

Suggestions for change made to us.

19712-9. (i.) To retain Civilian Lieutenant-Governors, but to give each two Civilian colleagues, as in Madras and Bombay, though the Lieutenant-Governor should perhaps have larger powers of over-ruling them.

19243,
19268-70,
19403-15,
19440-8. (ii.) To furnish Lieutenant-Governors with subordinate Councils. This view has been best set forth in the evidence of the Chief Secretary in Eastern Bengal and Assam. He suggests that the two members of the Board of Revenue in that Province should not deal merely with revenue matters, but should concern themselves with all branches of the administration, and tour through the Province on behalf of the Lieutenant-Governor, retaining their statutory and appellate powers as a Board in revenue questions. They would, in fact, divide the work of government with the Lieutenant-Governor, and would dispose of minor cases as his deputies, but each would send all important cases to the Lieutenant-Governor, and the latter's orders would be final.

Vide
references against
para. 435.

(iii.) To establish regular Council Governments, as in Madras and Bombay, and in the Supreme Government itself, having at their head Governors who would usually, or often, be appointed from home.

439. With the development of administration in all its branches, the growth of important industrial interests, the spread of education and political aspirations, and the growing tendency of the public to criticize the administration and to appeal to the highest executive tribunals, the Lieutenant-Governors of the larger Provinces are clearly over-burdened. We have had no evidence that the members of the Council Governments of Madras and Bombay have too little to do; on the contrary, the complaint is that these Local Governments are overloaded with work which might be got rid of by devolution of powers. The population of Bengal and of the United Provinces considerably exceeds that of both Presidencies, while Eastern Bengal and Assam has a larger population than Bombay. A fortiori, therefore, Lieutenant-Governors cannot attend to all the work which is supposed to fall upon them, and must delegate to their Secretaries—who are often relatively junior officers—the settlement of a variety of matters which in the case of Madras or Bombay, and analogously in the Government of India, would claim the attention of the members of Government. In so far as this state of things exists, the Secretaries are in the undesirable position of exercising power without responsibility.

Further, even if a Lieutenant-Governor could dispose of all the work demanding consideration at the hands of a Provincial Government, we think that such powers are too wide to be expediently entrusted to one man, however able or zealous.

But are not in favour of some of the above suggestions.

440. We are, however, not in favour of the first suggestion referred to in paragraph 438. A Lieutenant-Governor drawn from the same service as his colleagues, and possibly junior to one or more of them, would not ordinarily command their deference in a degree sufficient to obviate friction.

We are also against the second suggestion. Such a system would, under a strong Lieutenant-Governor, practically convert the members of the Board of Revenue into mere Secretaries, while, under a weak one, there would certainly be delay and dissension.

We prefer the establishment of a regular Council Government as in Madras and Bombay.

441. On the other hand, the advantages of the third suggestion, viz., the establishment of a regular Council Government, are that it affords:—

(i.) Provision for suitable distribution of work, and relief to the head of the Province.

(ii.) Greater continuity of policy, collective consideration of important questions, increased public confidence, and consequently less necessity for outside official control.

(iii.) The introduction of a fresh mind, possessed by a Governor whose position and antecedents would command the deference and support of his colleagues.

But we do not think that the Governor need invariably be appointed from Home.

442. On administrative grounds, and as a means of promoting decentralization, we are therefore in favour of this system; but we do not think that a Governor need invariably be appointed from England. The Governorship of Bombay has occasionally been filled by a distinguished Indian Civilian, and men are from time to time found in that service who could adequately fill such posts in other Provinces. It is therefore, not desirable, absolutely to close such appointments to the Indian Civil Service. The prospective loss to that service of some of the existing Lieutenant-Governorships would be made up, in considerable part, by the creation of new memberships of Council.

Provincial Executive Councils should, moreover, consist of a Governor and not less than four members.

443. We do not, however, suggest that the new Councils should consist merely of a Governor and two Civilian colleagues, as is now the case in Madras and Bombay. The Provincial Executive Councils require expansion to meet the growing mass and difficulty of public business, to secure the representation of fresh interests, and as we suggest in the following chapter, to allow the absorption by Government of such functions, now exercised by Boards of Revenue and Financial Commissioners, as must still be discharged at the headquarters of a Province.

32 & 33
97, sec. 8.

In our opinion, a Provincial Government should consist of a Governor and not less than four members, and of these not less than two should be appointed under the same conditions as now apply to memberships of Council in Madras and Bombay.

We desire to add that this expansion of Provincial Executive Councils would also permit of the strengthening of the administration by the inclusion of specially qualified natives of India.*

444. As regards the possibility that the establishment of Council Governments of this character would tend to greater friction as between the Government of India and the Local Governments, it must be recollected :—

The establishment of Council Governments should not lead to greater friction between the Government of India and the Provinces.

(i.) That hitherto, in many matters, there have been no adequately defined spheres of functions as between the Central and the Local administrations ; and that our recommendations will make such separate spheres more definite, although no system can be wholly free from occasional friction between authorities representing different points of view.

(ii.) That the existing Council Governments in Madras and Bombay have traditions of past freedom from the control of a Central Government. They were originally independent Presidencies, and accepted a subordinate position only gradually and with reluctance, the circumstances being rendered more difficult by the fact that, for a long time, the Governor-General was also Governor of Bengal, and that no Madras or Bombay officials took part in his administration. These considerations would not apply if Lieutenant-Governorships, with no traditions of past independence behind them, were converted into Governorships-in-Council. These Council Governments should have no right of direct communication with the Secretary of State, outside matters of routine, and we think it desirable, in the event of such a change as we have suggested taking place, that such powers of direct reference to that authority as are now enjoyed by the Madras and Bombay Governments should be taken away.

Para. 26.

We would, however, allow a Council Government to submit an appeal to the Secretary of State, through the Government of India, in regard to any important decision of the latter Government, affecting the Province, from which it differed materially.

445. Again, in matters requiring reference to higher authority a Council Government might not be unanimous, and correct decision by the Government of India on difficult and doubtful questions would be facilitated if they were in possession of a minute of dissent, by one or more of the local Council, setting forth a different aspect of the case. A Lieutenant-Governor's letter, on the other hand, need give no evidence of the fact that some of his advisers are not in accord with his views.

446. We recognize, however, that change in the existing system is not equally urgent in the case of all Provinces, and that the time for making such change

Change in the existing system must, however, be largely determined by political considerations.

* The Chairman and Mr. Hichens do not think it desirable to lay down any principle for the allocation of the seats.

must be largely determined by considerations which do not come within the scope of our reference.

Tenure of Civilian Secretariat appointments.

447. The tenure of Civilian Secretariat appointments differs in different Provinces. In Madras and the Central Provinces there is no formal rule, though in the latter a two years' term for Under-Secretaries is said to be applied in practice. In the United Provinces the term is two years for Under-Secretaries, and in Bombay three, but no period is fixed for a Secretaryship.* In Bengal a three years' term is prescribed for both Secretaries and Under-Secretaries, and in Burma the same term apparently applies. In Provinces where there are Commissioners, these are officers of higher pay and standing than the Secretaries (other than the Chief Secretary) to the Local Government, so that, even in the absence of a time limit, these would ordinarily vacate office on promotion to Commissionerships.

An officer should not be allowed to spend too much time in Secretariat or headquarters posts.

448. We have received evidence as to the tendency to keep an officer who has shown himself useful in Secretariat work upon this kind of duty, with the result that the Secretariats are not in sufficient touch with the difficulties of district officers and the needs of the districts, and tend to develop a paper government marked by undesirable uniformity and rigidity. The growth of what has been sometimes termed a separate Secretariat caste was perhaps most marked in times past in Bombay, but here we understand that there is now more interchange of Secretariat and district posts, and in general there is a fairly constant flux and reflux of officers as between these two categories of employment. It must further be recollected that Civilian Secretariat officers are not confined to a single department or set of departments. The Indian Civil Service is looked upon as a corps d'élite for general administrative work, and an officer drawn from it may, in the course of his service, hold various appointments of different character.

It seems clear, however, that steps should be taken to prevent an officer, however useful he may be in that capacity, from spending too much of his time in Secretariat or headquarters service; and the Bombay Government, for example, have proposed that not less than three years should elapse between the same officer's tenure of different Secretariat appointments, and that no officer should be made a Secretary unless he has done 10 years' executive service, of which five have been spent in district work. A somewhat similar suggestion was made in Eastern Bengal, where an official witness suggested that no man should become a Secretary to the Government of India until he had served for three years as head of a district.

Proposals to this end.

449. We think it should be a necessary qualification for appointment to an Under-Secretaryship that an officer has spent at least four years in district work, and that a man should not be made a Secretary unless his actual district service (periods of furlough being excluded) amounts to eight years. District service would include appointments such as that of Settlement officer, but not the tenure of a headquarter post such as that of Director of Land Records or Commissioner of Excise. We regard this district service qualification as more important than the application of the three-year rule for the tenure of a Secretariat appointment. Speaking generally, that is a desirable rule, but it might be rendered nugatory by an officer being transferred from one Secretariat post to another; and sometimes public interests might justify the retention of an officer who had already served three years in the same post. The district service condition we propose would, moreover, meet the tendency to allow officers to oscillate between Secretariat service or special duty under the Government of India and in their own Local Governments, for the rule (which should apply also to the Government of India Secretariats) would render it essential for an officer to have done a certain amount of district service in order to qualify for further Secretariat employment.

450. Evidence has been given as to the tendency of Local Governments to apply the same set of laws or rules to every part of a Province, although the circumstances of its constituent portions may be different, as for instance in Bengal with its natural sub-divisions of Bengal proper, Bihar, Orissa, and Chota Nagpur; in Eastern Bengal and Assam; in the Central Provinces and Berar;* and in Bombay proper and Sind. In the last-mentioned case, for example, we found that the Bombay Land Revenue Code, which was drawn up for a Province of small raiyatwari proprietors, had been applied to Sind where the tenures are materially different. In Burma, again, it has been alleged that Chief Commissioners and Lieutenant-Governors whose service had been mainly spent in India had pressed measures the full benefit of which to Burma was doubtful.

This undesirable tendency to doctrinaire uniformity ought to be materially diminished by bringing the Secretariats more into touch with actual district experience and needs, and by the establishment of Council Governments, whose members will have more collective knowledge of local peculiarities, and more time to apply this knowledge than Lieutenant-Governors can individually possess.

451. We have also had evidence that the specialized departments referred to in Chapter II., occasionally press their own ideas and departmental interests, through their officers at headquarters, without reference, or in opposition, to the views of Collectors and Commissioners, who should be in close touch with the feelings and prejudices of the people. In subsequent chapters we shall suggest measures for securing more harmonious co-operation between these departments and the District Officers, while larger district experience on the part of the Civilian Secretaries will tend to remedy such evils as may still arise from pressure by zealous experts at headquarters.

452. The fact will, however, remain, that, in the Public Works Department, the Chief Engineers are also Secretaries to Provincial Governments. Seeing that this department deals with matters involving large expenditure of money, and requiring an intimate knowledge of the country and the general administration, we think it undesirable that an overburdened Lieutenant-Governor Undesirable tendency to uniformity would be diminished by bringing Provincial Secretariats more into touch with district experience, and by the establishment of Council Governments.

Larger district experience on the part of the Provincial Secretariats will reduce tendency of the special departments to press their own ideas at headquarters.

Our proposals in respect to Executive Councils will remedy defects in the present method of administering the Public Works Department.

* It should be noted, however, that there is a Secretary with special experience of Berar, who deals with matters specifically relating to that sub-province in the Central Provinces Secretariat, and that the Commissioner of Berar has larger powers than those of the Central Provinces proper.

should have to control it with the advice only of departmental officers, and we think it equally inadvisable that the Public Works portfolio should, as is now usually the case in Madras and Bombay, be similarly left in the hands of the Governor. Our proposals for the general institution of Council Governments, with enlarged Executive Councils, will, however, enable this portfolio to be entrusted to one of the ordinary members of Council, as it is in the Government of India; and so long as this is so, we think it an advantage that the Secretaryship should be in the hands of an officer of technical knowledge and experience.

453. We have observed, in Chapter III., that, in the small existing Councils of Madras and Bombay, the Financial portfolio has to be entrusted to hands which also control important spending departments. We do not think it desirable that a Financial Member should be placed in this position, and the enlarged Councils we suggest will also enable this defect to be remedied.

BOARDS OF REVENUE AND FINANCIAL COMMISSIONERS.

All the major
Provinces except Bombay possess a Board of Revenue or Financial Commissioner.

454. In all the major Provinces except Bombay there is a Board of Revenue or a Financial Commissioner, dealing, under the Provincial Government, with all matters relating to revenue administration which are deemed to require the control of a headquarters authority.*

455. In Madras, where there are no Divisional Commissioners, the Board's members exercise powers in regard to excise and revenue settlements which in other major Provinces are (always in the case of excise, and usually in the case of settlement) vested in separate Commissioners. The Board of Revenue here consists of four members, two of whom deal with matters specially appertaining to the land revenue, a third with settlements, agriculture and land records, and a fourth with salt, excise, customs, income tax and stamps.

In the two Bengals and in the United Provinces, the Board consists of two members, one of whom is, generally speaking, in charge of subjects connected with the land revenue, while the other deals with miscellaneous revenue. In the Punjab, Burma, and now in the Central Provinces*, the functions of the Boards of Revenue are discharged by a single Financial Commissioner.† In all these Provinces there are territorial Commissioners, who are subordinate to the Board of Revenue or Financial Commissioner in revenue matters.

* At the time we took evidence there was no Financial Commissioner in the Central Provinces, but one has been subsequently appointed.

Eastern Bengal, and the United Provinces. The appointment of Financial Commissioners is of much more recent date.

In Bombay, development has been upon different lines. A Commissioner of Revenue was there constituted in 1830, and to him was entrusted (as to the Boards in Bengal and Madras) general control over the revenue administration of the Presidency. When further aid was necessary, instead of adding subordinate Commissioners, the course taken was to divide the Province, at first into two, and later into three territorial charges, each Commissioner retaining responsibility for the general administration in his division, whereas, in other Provinces, the Boards of Revenue deal only with revenue matters.

457. The Boards of Revenue originally worked as collective bodies, being, in fact, subordinate Councils for revenue matters. In 1887, however, the Madras Board was reconstituted (under an Act passed in 1883) as a body of Commissioners dealing each with his separate subjects, and the collective action of the Board is now confined to :—

(iii.) Matters involving important questions of principle, or regarding which the opinion of the full Board is expressly called for by Government.

In other Provinces the Boards sit collectively more seldom than in Madras. Under Bengal Regulation III. of 1822, the Lieutenant-Governor can authorize a single member to exercise, either generally or locally, all the duties and powers of the collective Board, and assign any special duty to any member separately "for the greater despatch of business or other cause." A member, sitting singly, cannot, however, (unless specially authorized by the Lieutenant-Governor), reverse or alter a decision or order of a Commissioner or Collector without the concurrence of the other member. Such division of business is now habitually made in the two Bengals, the Board seldom sitting as a whole.

In the United Provinces the distribution of appellate work, and of certain special questions arising in Bundelkhand is territorial ; otherwise it is by subjects.*

In these three Provinces, therefore, apart from informal consultation, which, we understand, is freely resorted to between members who transact their work in the same building, and from statutory provision regarding the disposal of appeals, the collective action of the Board is confined to questions of special importance, in which its joint opinion is asked for by Government, and to matters, such as selections for certain appointments, in which the members are jointly interested.

* The concurrence of both members of the United Provinces Board is necessary to the revision or amendment of a decree of a lower Revenue Court.

General functions of Boards of Revenue and Financial Commissioners.

458. While the details differ in different Provinces, the principal duties of Boards of Revenue and Financial Commissioners are in connexion with such questions of land-revenue, administration as by law, rule, or practice have to be referred to them by subordinate authorities, e.g., settlement, the collection of revenue and local rates, suspensions and remissions, the maintenance of land records, the partition of permanently settled estates, the acquisition of land for public purposes, the grant of loans to landlords and agriculturists, and to co-operative credit societies, and the work of the Agricultural and Veterinary departments.

Similarly the sources of miscellaneous revenue, such as excise, salt, stamps, income tax and customs, fall within their charge. In Madras the control of the Forest Department is directly vested in the Board : in Bengal the Board of Revenue, in subordination to the Bengal Government and the Government of India, supervises the production of opium in the Government opium agencies in Bengal and the United Provinces, and conducts the sales of opium for export.

In short, in regard to almost all matters connected with the land and the collection of revenue, the Boards of Revenue are responsible for the general unity, co-ordination and efficiency of the administration, and they would initiate, or be consulted on, any new departure in policy or method.* They also possess some powers of patronage. They have to refer in more important matters to the Local Governments, but there is a fairly wide sphere within which, subject to appeal to Government, they are the determining authority.

459. The functions of the Board of Revenue as an appellate court in regard to the decisions of the Commissioners, Collectors and other officers subordinate to it in revenue matters, are of the utmost importance, and especially so in the United Provinces where appeals under the Revenue and Rent Acts constitute a severe tax upon its time. In such matters a Board's decisions are usually final, though capable of special revision by the Local Government.

They are also generally Courts of Wards.

460. Except in Burma, where there is no such Court, the Board of Revenue is also Court of Wards for revenue-paying estates, which are managed by Government agency owing to some incapacity of the proprietor.

Office establishments and touring.

461. The Boards have their own office establishments, which are separate from the Government Secretariats, and their members make periodical tours for the inspection of district work; and, in the United Provinces, for the disposal of appeals in situ.

462. The original intention was to confer upon the Boards of Revenue wide authority in regard to revenue matters. Thus in Bengal Regulation 1 of 1829, the Boards then existing in the old Bengal Presidency are described as tribunals for the determination of all questions relative to the assessment of lands under settlement, and for the judicial decision of many other important cases; as the general guardians of the fiscal interests of the State; as directors and superintendents of executive officers; and as the confidential advisers of Government. A Financial Commissioner, again, is described in various Acts as the "chief controlling revenue authority", under the Local Government. Executive orders and statutory restrictions, requiring reference to Government in a great number of detailed matters, have, however, curtailed the Boards' powers and influence, while the fact that they possess very limited financial powers, and have to obtain the specific authority of Government for the creation or modification of appointments, however small, sets a rigid limit in practice to their independent action.

463. A number of witnesses considered that it was unnecessary to have a Board of Revenue in addition to Divisional Commissioners, and that one or other of these should be abolished. We hold that Commissioners should be retained, as a most valuable link in the chain of administration between individual districts and the headquarters administration of the Province. To put the districts directly under the latter in revenue matters, would inevitably lead to further centralization in the Secretariats.

Necessity of retaining territorial Commissioners.

464. Granting the retention of Commissioners, the arguments against the retention of the Boards are that, under the present system, there are really two headquarter Secretariats; that Commissioners can never attain the position of real importance which they ought to possess so long as they are dwarfed by a Board of Revenue; and that the members of the Board are removed from effective contact with district administration, which their touring cannot be sufficient to secure.

465. On the other side it must be noted :—

(i.) That with the abolition of the Board, the work falling on the Government would be greatly increased, and it would be necessary to strengthen the Secretariat establishments materially in order to afford the co-ordination necessary in respect to the revenue administration in the districts. Commissioners and Collectors must work on the same general lines, and these must be laid down for the Province as a whole.

In present circumstances these should remain.

(ii.) That there is a certain amount of work which Commissioners cannot do unless their establishments are considerably increased.

(iii.) That the Board is a valuable co-ordinating and unifying authority, and that its opinions, especially when delivered collectively, must weigh more with Government than those of isolated Commissioners. Under the present system the Board may serve as a valuable breakwater against hasty and ill-considered changes.

(v.) That it is a popular and well-understood body, especially in the two Bengals, where its abolition might give rise to complaint and suspicion.

With the Local Governments constituted as at present, we think that these arguments have much force, and we do not consider that an extension of the present powers of Commissioners need, per se, militate against the retention and usefulness of Boards of Revenue or Financial Commissioners.

466. It may be suggested, however, that an enlargement of the powers of Commissioners might render it feasible to convert the existing Boards of Revenue into single Financial Commissioners, as in Burma and the Punjab. We are not in favour of this idea, because we attach great importance to the deliberative character of the Boards. Their collective opinion on important questions carries greater weight with the public and Government than would the individual pronouncement of a single officer.

Defects of the existing system.

467. We are, however, much impressed by the following considerations :

(i.) Under the existing system, members of a Board of Revenue and Financial Commissioners are confined to revenue matters, and are out of touch with such important branches of the administration as local and municipal government, education, sanitation, and police, while at the same time they may be called on, later, as Lieutenant-Governors, or as members of the Government of India, to deal with these very subjects. 6429-46.

(ii.) Such touring as is done by the members of a Board is primarily in connexion with their own particular subjects. 6170-5, 22792-6, 22005, 31113-8.

(iii.) The existence of a separately organized headquarters office outside the Government Secretariats does, undoubtedly, tend to some re-duplication of work (especially in the matter of office noting) and occasionally to friction. 18612-3, 21882.

(iv.) Proposals submitted by the Board to Government are noted on in the Secretariat without further reference to the former authority, and the Lieutenant-Governor may be materially influenced by the views of the Secretary to Government, an officer junior to the members of the Board.

Undesirable to convert members of Boards of Revenue or Financial Commissioners into subordinate Colleagues, or Secretaries, of Lieutenant-Governors.

468. We have already dealt with a proposal to remedy these defects by converting members of the Board of Revenue into subordinate colleagues of the Lieutenant-Governor, and have indicated that we do not consider this a satisfactory solution. We object still more strongly to a suggestion that the Financial Commissioner in the Punjab should become a Secretary to the Local Government. Paras. 438 (ii) & 440. 39286.

But our proposed Executive Councils would enable the absorption of Boards of Revenue, etc.

469. But if, and when, the Lieutenant-Governorships are, as we have already suggested, converted into Council Governments, we think that it will be desirable to make the Executive Councils sufficiently strong to absorb the existing Boards of Revenue or Financial Commissioners, and to vest in the Government itself such functions now discharged by these as cannot expediently be made over to Commissioners. The Head of the Province would thus share the burden of responsibility with independent and experienced counsellors, who would be more useful in this capacity as dealing with a wider field of administration. At the same time the objections now raised against the re-duplication of work and the existence of two separate office establishments would be met.

We are fortified in this opinion by the fact that a proposal of a similar character was put forward by the Board of Revenue in the United Provinces so long ago as 1893. Vol. VII., App. IV., p. 189.

The Bengal system for bringing the Board of Revenue into closer touch with Government is useful pending the absorption of the Boards in Executive Councils.

470. A system introduced in Bengal by Sir Andrew Fraser, which brings the Board of Revenue into closer contact with the Government without merging it therein, is deserving of attention. Under this system, a matter which the Board has, by law, rule or practice, to submit to Government, is first noted on by the Board's clerical establishment, and is then similarly dealt with in the 14349, 18886-9, 14530-4, 18981-5, 14607-13, 22548, 14686-7, 22588-601, 18611-7, 22672-7.

Government Secretariat. It is then noted on by the Secretary to the Board, then by the Revenue Secretary to Government, and after him by the appropriate member of the Board. In minor matters, if the Board's member and the Revenue Secretary are in agreement, the conclusion arrived at issues as a Government order ; but if they are in disagreement, and in all important matters, the papers are sent on to the Lieutenant-Governor, who passes the final order.

This system has the advantage of enabling the Board's member to have the last word as against the Secretary, and also of giving him an opportunity of weighing the Secretary's arguments before coming to a conclusion. The Lieutenant-Governor, moreover, has both sides of the case fully before him. As at present applied, however, the system does not touch the double noting of two offices, and it has been recognized by the witnesses who spoke in its favour that it must inevitably lead to the Board's office being merged in that of Government.

A system of this description has the approval of various senior officers who have had experience of it, while it meets the wish expressed by the Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces that the Board of Revenue should be brought into closer connexion with Government.

We consider it to be a useful makeshift, pending the more complete absorption of the Board into a Governor-in-Council system.

471. In Madras, where there are no territorial Commissioners, the functions exercised by these officers in other Provinces are, in so far as they have not been left to Collectors, exercised by members of the Board of Revenue, each of whom is a Commissioner for specific subjects throughout the Province.

System in Madras. Its defects.

The defects of this system seem to us as follows :—

(i.) Those noted in respect to the Lieutenant-Governor Provinces as regards duplication of Secretariats, inadequate inspection by touring, and dissociation of the Boards' members from all but revenue duties. This last point applies here with still greater force since, owing to the existence of a larger Board of Revenue, officers reach it earlier in Madras than would be the case in other Provinces, while, in consequence of the existence of a local Council, the likelihood of their attaining a position in which they will have other than revenue work to do is greater. As regards touring again, since each member makes his inspections mainly with reference to the matters he deals with departmentally, there is even less general personal review of the district administration than in Provinces where the Boards are numerically smaller.

Vol. VI.,
App. II.,
p. 134.
6193-8.

(ii.) Owing to the absence of Divisional Commissioners, there is no intermediate officer who can inspect the districts from the standpoint of general administration, and advise junior Collectors ; and the Government lacks an official who can speak with authority as to the general circumstances of a large tract of country. If matters in a district are abnormal or difficult, it becomes necessary to send down a member of the Board for the purpose of special investigation, whereas in other Provinces this function would be usually discharged by the Commissioner on his own initiative.

* Its advantages.

472. On the other hand—

(i.) District decentralization has proceeded further in Madras than in any other Province, and the Collector there occupies a position of higher authority than he does elsewhere. While this may be partly due to the large size of the districts, it may also be fairly ascribed to the absence of territorial Commissioners. 1097, 34731-3.

(ii.) There is a distinct advantage in the grouping together of a number of high officials who, while dealing each with their own subjects, have the opportunity of consultation with one another, and can make collective representations to Government on matters of importance.

(iii.) If the Board in its present shape were done away with, it would be obviously impossible that the Local Government should deal direct from headquarters with all the districts of this large Province, and it would be necessary to establish a system of territorial Commissioners.

Hardly any witness in Madras advocated this last step,* and the Local Government was strongly opposed to it, urging that such a measure would dwarf the authority of Collectors, and would be very expensive. It considered that six Divisional Commissioners would be required, as against four members of the Board, and that it would still be necessary to have special subject-Commissioners for separate revenue, settlements, forests, and inams†. 63, 6486-7, 7712-9, 9907, 9947-9. Vol. II., App., pp. 329.

Were the Madras Government to remain on its present footing, we would maintain the existing system, but would enlarge the functions of the Board.

473. Were the Madras Government to remain on its present footing, we should not be inclined to recommend any material modification of the existing system, which has been long established, and with which the public seem generally satisfied. Moreover, we consider it of distinct advantage that the Commissioners of excise and settlements should, in present circumstances, sit as members of the Board of Revenue. Their presence there facilitates administration in these departments and prevents undue specialization.

But, assuming the retention of the Board, we think it would be desirable that its functions should be enlarged so as to bring within its cognizance matters which in other Provinces are dealt with by Divisional Commissioners, e.g., district board and municipal work.

Expansion of the Executive Council should, however, allow of the absorption of the Board. It would then be necessary to appoint Divisional Commissioners.

474. If, however, as we consider advisable on other grounds, the Executive Council of the Province should be expanded,‡ we think that it would then be perfectly feasible for the Local Government, assisted by special Commissioners of salt and excise and of settlement, to take into its own hands the direct co-ordination and control of the revenue administration, and such matters as the general charge of forests. Divisional Commissioners should then replace the present Board. These should not, however, encroach upon the existing powers of Collectors, but should undertake the functions, not absorbed by Government, now devolving upon the Board in revenue matters. They should also exercise the same functions as we propose for

* The Chief Secretary in the Central Provinces, who formerly served in Madras, was, however, of opinion, from his experience in both Provinces, that the system of Divisional Commissioners was preferable. 24758.

† An inam is a grant of land revenue-free, or on specially favourable terms.

‡ Since the above was written, the Secretary of State has proposed such an expansion.

Commissioners generally in respect to other branches of the administration.

Such Commissioners, together with the Commissioners for special subjects referred to above, should meet periodically for the discussion of important matters, and they should be at full liberty to submit joint representations to Government on questions of policy and procedure.

Given these safeguards—of an enlarged Executive Council more widely representative than it is at present, of a relatively small number of Divisional Commissioners who should not be allowed to encroach upon the functions of the Collectors, and of facilities for discussion and collective representation by these Commissioners—we consider that the change we have suggested should be of advantage both to Government and to the people.

Para. 456.

475. In Bombay there is no Board of Revenue, the place of such a body being occupied, as already explained, by territorial Commissioners who are directly under Government. System in Bombay. Its defects.

Up to the year 1890, the Commissioners of the Presidency proper lived at Poona during the rains, and thus had opportunity for informal consultation among themselves, while the Government could refer to them collectively any question on which their joint opinion was desired. At present the Commissioners live in their own charges, from which the former system was considered to divorce them too completely; and they now only meet collectively at Poona (without the Commissioner of Separate Revenue) for a few days, in order to discuss matters which the Government specially refers to them.

35554-9.

34696,
34751-9,
37222.

The objections taken to the existing system here are that :—

(i.) There is reduplication of work in the various Commissioners' offices.

(ii.) There is an absence of co-ordination and guidance.

(iii.) The Commissioner of Separate Revenue is at present altogether detached from the general district administration, while the position of the Commissioner for settlement and land records is anomalous and unsatisfactory.

(iv.) There is no collective body outside the Government which comprises the best administrative experience of the Province, and can submit proposals or remonstrances to which careful attention must be paid.

We do not consider the present situation satisfactory; and in our opinion the defects in the former Bombay land revenue system might possibly have been remedied earlier had the Commissioners been able to meet more freely, and to emphasize their individual views by collective representations.

476. While we do not propose the establishment of a Board of Revenue in Bombay, we think that the Commissioner system there requires to be buttressed by full and frequent opportunities of collective consultation between the Divisional Commissioners and the Commissioner of Separate Revenue, such as we have suggested in the case of Madras. This will maintain the advantages of the existing Bombay system, which makes the Commissioner reside in the division for which he is responsible, and gives him a position of influence in respect to the general work of administration, while it will at the same time enable free exchange of views by Commissioners and give them a stronger position vis-a-vis of the Local Government. How these should be remedied.

We also look to an expansion of the Executive Council as allowing the Revenue Member of the Local Government to give greater attention to revenue matters, and to afford the further co-ordination which is now effected in other Provinces by a Board of Revenue or a Financial Commissioner.

While Boards of Revenue and Financial Commissioners remain, they should be given wider powers in revenue matters.

477. While Boards of Revenue and Financial Commissioners remain, we consider that they should, as far as possible, be placed in the position originally intended for them—that of exercising wide authority in regard to revenue matters. The further control of the Local Government should be confined, as far as possible, to matters of principle and policy, and the Board should be able to dispose of a number of matters on which reference to Government is now necessary. For instance :—

(i.) While it is for the Government to lay down, generally, the conditions under, and the extent to, which remissions or suspensions of land revenue may be granted, there should be no need for reference to it by the Board as to specific applications of these principles.

(ii.) When powers have been delegated to the Board as a statutory final authority, the Local Government should be very cautious in exercising any right of revision.

(iii.) Standing orders or general circulars of the Board should not require the confirmation of Government (as at present in Madras) except where important matters of principle are involved. 6342-9.

(iv.) Power might be given to the Board to reappropriate within the same major heads (subject to the salaries proviso referred to in paragraph 96), and, within budget limits, to make permanent appointments up to Rs. 50 a month, and temporary appointments up to Rs. 100.

In Chapter III. we have already indicated a variety of matters, such as pensions, and acting and travelling allowances, where larger powers might be delegated to Boards of Revenue, as well as to heads of departments and Commissioners. Paras. 155 et seq.

We deal in a separate chapter with the powers and functions of Boards of Revenue as Courts of Wards.

Detailed suggestions made by Local Governments for the grant of further powers to Boards.

478. Schedule III. appended to this volume includes a number of proposals made by Local Governments for the grant to Boards of Revenue, or Financial Commissioners, of powers now vested in the Local Government by Imperial Acts, such as those relating to customs, stamps, income tax, and court fees, or by the land revenue or other laws of the various Provinces. We are not in a position to examine such suggestions in detail, but we think they should be carefully considered, with a view to delegating to these authorities all powers which can be expediently entrusted to them. Vide para.

It will also be for the Local Governments to revise rules and departmental instructions; in order to give larger powers to Boards of Revenue and Financial Commissioners in matters where such rules or orders are at present unduly restrictive. 6290-3. 6627.

Distribution of the work of a Board of Revenue among its members.

479. The view has been expressed that the distribution of the work of a Board of Revenue among its members might well be left to the Board itself; but having regard to the special considerations which may weigh with Government in the appointment of members for the charge of the different departments, we are doubtful of the expediency of such a change, and we would maintain the existing condition under which the distribution of work among the members is regulated by the Provincial Government. It seems desirable, moreover, that, as in Madras, certain important subjects should be definitely assigned by Government to the disposal of the full Board.

480. The Madras Government has full freedom in respect to the appointment of the members of its Board of Revenue ; but in Bengal, Eastern Bengal and Assam, and the United Provinces their appointment rests with the Governor-General in Council, whose sanction is also necessary to the appointment of the Financial Commissioners of Burma and the Punjab. We consider that, in these important Provinces, the Head of the Provincial Government should now have full powers to appoint members of the Board of Revenue and Financial Commissioners, and the Home Secretary to the Government of India sees no objection to such a change. The same remark applies to the recently created post of Financial Commissioner in the Central Provinces.

CHAPTER XII.

COMMISSIONERS.

481. With the exception of Madras, all the major Provinces possess authorities intermediate between the Collectors of districts and the headquarters administration. These authorities are styled "Commissioners of Division," their charges being divisions of the Province, each containing several districts.

Divisional Commissioners exist in all the major Provinces except Madras.

The establishment of Commissioners in the old Bengal Presidency dates from 1829 ; and in the following year a Revenue Commissioner, whose functions are now distributed between several officers, each of whom has charge of a division, was created for the Bombay Presidency. The appointment of Divisional Commissioners for the subsequently acquired Provinces of the Punjab, Burma and the Central Provinces followed in due course.

Reg. I.,
Bengal, of
sec. 4.

482. The original Bengal Regulation contemplated the exercise by Commissioners of the powers and authority formerly vested in the Boards of Revenue and Courts of Wards, subject to the control and direction of a Sadr or head Board, and to such restrictions and provisions as the Governor General in Council (who then directly administered the Bengal Presidency), or the Sadr Board with his authority or sanction, might prescribe. The almost synchronous Bombay Regulation laid down that the Revenue Commissioner should, under the instructions of Government, have control over the whole revenue administration of the Province.

It will thus be seen that the original intention was to vest Commissioners with very large powers in revenue matters ; and as they had police and judicial jurisdiction also, all local matters with which the administration was at that time concerned were practically within their purview. Their subsequent dissociation from judicial functions* ; the constitution and growth of specialized departments ; the development of the postal and telegraph system; the tendency to codify into Acts, rules, or standing orders matters which would in old times have been left to the discretion of individual officers; the growing tendency to appeal to headquarters against local decisions; and the fact that legislation has often left the Commissioner's powers undetermined, have all, to a large extent inevitably, diminished the powers and position of these officers. In Bombay, however, the Commissioners stand much higher than elsewhere, taking the place, to a large extent, of the Boards of Revenue or Financial Commissioners of other Provinces; and one of these—the Commissioner in Sind—holds a very special position, as the administrator of a sub-province which is, in many ways, distinct from the Presidency proper. He is, as has been aptly remarked by the present Commissioner, practically a minor Local Administration under a major Local Government, and he is the local representative of that Government in regard to the departments working within his jurisdiction. His special position was recognized, 40 years ago, by an Act of delegation already described in Chapter IX. Even in Sind, however, the present Commissioner has brought to our notice a tendency to bring him into line with the ordinary Commissioners of the Province, and it seems clear that his independence is not so large as it was a generation ago.

483. While we have no desire to diminish the status of the Commissioner in Sind, we recognize that his position is a peculiar one, and in the remarks which follow we shall deal with ordinary territorial Commissioners. The powers and functions of these officers vary in different Provinces. As already stated, they stand highest in Bombay, where also they have larger pay and higher precedence, while, from the evidence put before us, we gather that their powers are most restricted in Burma and the Central Provinces. In Bengal their position has, we understand, been of late considerably improved, owing to action taken by Sir A. Fraser.

Vol. IV.,
App. II.,

General duties of
Commissioners.

484. The Commissioner is, or should be, a picked man with long experience of district administration, who can maintain closer personal relations with the officials subordinate to him and the people of his division than is possible for any headquarters authority; while his greater experience and range of view should enable him to assist the Government with more mature and comprehensive views than can be formed by a Collector.

The Commissioner's work is primarily concerned with the administration of the land revenue and connected questions, and he discharges important duties as a court of revenue appeal. Speaking generally, his functions in regard to revenue settlements are mainly advisory; but in regard to the collection of land revenue he has ordinarily certain powers of suspension, and, in some Provinces, of remission also. His powers in regard to the appointment of revenue officers vary in different Provinces—extending in Bombay to the appointment of mamlatdars (tahsildars), while in Burma he can make no appointment outside his own office establishments—and local rules govern his appellate jurisdiction in matters of discipline. Subject to rules and conditions laid down by the Local Government, he can, in large measure, grant loans to landholders and cultivators, and remit them when irrecoverable, while he plays a large part in the management of private estates under the Court of Wards.

In regard to other sources of revenue which are under the direct management of the Collector, such as stamps and income-tax, the Commissioner has considerable powers of control; while in respect to excise and forest administration his position has hitherto varied in different Provinces.

In matters relating to revenue, Divisional Commissioners are under the control of the Board of Revenue or Financial Commissioner of the Province, where such exist.

Recent orders have much diminished the control of the Commissioner over the Police administration. He has little to say in regard to the operations of the Education Department; and is, at most, only consulted in regard to local expenditure proposed by the Public Works Department. He has, however, a very definite position as a controlling, and occasionally as an appellate, officer, in respect to the work of district boards and municipalities, and in this way he has a voice in expenditure upon primary education, sanitation, medical relief, and road work carried out by, or at the expense of, these bodies. His functions in respect to such local bodies will, however, be dealt with in Part III. of our Report.

485. As regards the general adequacy or otherwise of the position of the Commissioner at the present day, the evidence is divergent. Senior and responsible officials*, some themselves Commissioners of divisions, have stated that, apart from specific matters which they mention, these officers have a sufficient voice in the administration of their divisions, and they are supported in this view by a considerable body of non-official opinion†. On the other hand, the Governments of Bengal, Eastern Bengal and Assam, the United Provinces, the Punjab and the Frontier Province, supported by ample evidence both official‡ and non-official§, hold that the general status of the Commissioner has deteriorated and needs material strengthening.

The present position of the Commissioner not satisfactory.

We agree with those who do not find the present position satisfactory.

The personal element must of necessity largely affect the extent of the influence exercised by individual Commissioners, and a witness in Bombay held that Commissioners had powers which they sometimes would not use. In any case, it is an exaggeration to say, as is sometimes done, that the Commissioner is merely a channel of communication between the district officers and the Government; but the scant esteem in which the office may be held is shown by the suggestions of some witnesses for its abolition as unnecessary, and by descriptions of Commissioners as "kings whose subjects are unconscious of their existence," and as wielding "some influence but no control."

Commissioners should have larger powers, and should not become mere inspecting and advisory Officers.

486. We have already indicated that we consider the abolition of Commissionerships to be extremely undesirable. Such abolition would inevitably lead to increased centralization, while a well-devised system of decentralization must necessarily include the devolution of greater powers to these highly paid officers, who are possessed of large experience and ample opportunities for keeping in touch with the people. Para. 463.

Similarly, we reject the suggestion that the Commissioner should be recognized as an inspecting and advisory officer only. His utility in these directions is no doubt great, and the Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces has drawn attention to the assistance which he can thus render to a Collector who is new to his charge ; but there are also many executive functions which Commissioners can beneficially exercise, with consequent relief to the headquarters authorities, and a more expeditious disposal of public business. 23238, 33254, 23637-8, 34278, 26467, Vol. VI., App. II., p. 134.

Position of the Commissioner in respect to special Departments.

Necessity for local co-ordination of the work of special departments.

487. It is not denied that it is open to the Commissioner, even now, to exercise considerable influence, but it requires an energetic and tactful officer to make the best of a position which is not clearly defined and therefore open to challenge. This is particularly the case with reference to the special departments referred to in Chapter II. to whose growth, and fissiparous tendencies from the point of view of general administration, attention has been prominently drawn by the late Lieutenant Governor of Bengal. The technical work of such departments, in respect of which the Commissioner cannot expediently interfere, must inevitably increase ; but along with this there is a grave risk of specialized departments pursuing their own course, without reference to the views of other departments, or to considerations affecting the people as a whole. In a country like India it is specially important to prevent any system of government by professional experts. Measures, for instance, which would commend themselves from a scientific standpoint to a forest expert, might cause grave discontent among hill tribes or the agricultural population of the plains. Similarly, the success of an irrigation work must depend not merely upon engineering considerations, but upon an intimate knowledge of the traditional methods and prejudices of the people, upon which Commissioners and Collectors ought clearly to be consulted. While it is necessarily one of the main functions of a Provincial Government to exercise a general co-ordinating control over the various departments, and to check undue departmental zeal, it cannot, we consider, do this thoroughly in respect of the district administration. It is a distinct weakness in an oriental country that there should be no local officer to whom the people can go with general grievances, and that they should come to regard the Government as a mere collection of scattered and independent departments. It appears necessary, therefore, to have a local co-ordinating authority, and this function should be assigned to the Divisional Commissioner. Paras. 38-40. Vol. IV., App. II., p. 201.

Measure of general control proposed to be given to the Commissioner in respect to such departments.

488. In order to discharge this duty fitly, the Commissioner should be kept in touch with the working and the projects of the special departments throughout his division. Though it is not necessary that the local officers of such departments, e.g. Superintending Engineers, Inspectors of Schools, or Deputy Inspectors General of Police, should be regarded as his subordinates*, he should have the right to call for any information from them which he thinks fit, and to have information given to him spontaneously in regard to any proposed new departure of importance. Any views he may express should receive the fullest consideration both from the departmental heads and the Local Government; and he should, if he thinks this necessary, be able to stop any action of a department within his division which he considers undesirable, reference being thereupon made to the Local Government if the departmental authorities so wish. Such intervention should, however, be sparingly applied and should be limited to questions which affect the people and the general administration.

Vol. IV.,
App. II.,
p. 201.

19012-20.

Minor disputes between departments within the division should be referable to the Commissioner. The tendency to antagonism between various departments is most marked in the subordinate ranks and requires to be checked on the spot. In cases such as have been cited in Bengal, in regard to the prejudicial effect of railway embankments on the drainage of the country, the Commissioner should have power, in default of an amicable settlement, to direct the holding of a joint enquiry by the local representatives of the departments interested. The results of such enquiry and report would ordinarily enable the Government to settle the matter without injurious delay.

489. As an instance of the fissiparous tendencies to which we have alluded, it may be noted that even in Sind, the Commissioner complained of the encroachments of the special departments, and of the ignoring of Bombay Government orders that proposals regarding educational matters in Sind should come through him.

490. The relations between the Commissioner and the special departments have, in several cases, been the subject of recent enquiry, and have undergone various modifications as a result of the general increase of specialization. We have no cut-and-dried solution of the problem to offer, nor would it be desirable, even were it possible, to lay down any rigid system. The object of our proposals is a frank recognition of the fact that the Commissioner should be the administrative head of his division, and that he should be consulted, and have certain powers of control, in respect to the operations of special departments in so far as these affect the general administration or the welfare of the people, while abstaining from intervention in technical details. We recognize, however, that it would be very difficult in many cases to draw a line between technical details and matters of general importance, and, for harmonious working, we must trust in the last resort to common sense, tact, and loyal co-operation as between the different servants of Government.

As will be seen from the following chapter, our remarks also apply in very large measure to the case of Collectors.

491. The chief special departments with which the Commissioner is concerned are those dealing with public works, police, forests, education and excise, and we have now to consider whether the general proposals made above require to be supplemented in order to strengthen his administrative position in regard to these.

* The Chairman and Mr. Hichens think that any such definite subordination would be undesirable, though they agree as to the rest of the paragraph.

Necessity for co-ordination in public works expenditure.

492. Public Works.—The Public Works Department differs from the rest in that its expenditure is largely concerned with the carrying out of works on behalf of other departments, and for this reason it stands in special need of co-ordination. We have had much evidence on this subject, and are satisfied that the existing methods are not wholly satisfactory.

Present position of the Commissioner in respect thereto.

While it seems to be the case in most Provinces, and especially in Burma, that the Commissioner has, at one time or another, an opportunity of expressing his views as to the comparative urgency of proposals for Provincial public works expenditure affecting his division, the actual compilation of the Public Works budget takes place at headquarters, in the Public Works Secretariat, and the order of urgency in regard to particular works may be altered then, or subsequently, without reference to the Commissioner. To quote the Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces, "no doubt the Deputy Commissioners and Commissioners suggest and urge the necessity for certain buildings or roads, and are consulted about the plans or alignments, though even this consultation was neglected in some cases; but after that they know nothing further. The allotment of funds rests with the Chief Engineer and the Superintending Engineers . . . so that it is often impossible for the Deputy Commissioner or Commissioner to say what works are in progress at any given time. He sometimes finds a building completed which he did not know was begun, and that another work which he believed to be in progress has not been started, the money having been directed to some other purpose by some superior authority in the Public Works Department."

p. 135.

This description is no doubt accurate as regards the Central Provinces, but in respect to other parts of India it would be too highly coloured. The Burma system, which is regarded as satisfactory by the Public Works Secretary to the Government of India, entails on the Executive Engineer the necessity of preparing proposals for public works expenditure in each year in consultation with the Collector. The proposals thus arrived at for each district are tabulated, for a division, by the Superintending Engineer, generally after consultation with the Commissioner, and are then forwarded, through the Commissioner, to the Local Government. The Commissioner has thus the opportunity of suggesting alterations, and he decides the preferential order of the works. Money is then allotted by the Local Government according to the civil divisions, and each Commissioner is informed of the works in his division for which provision has been made, while no subsequent alteration in the local list as thus arrived at can be made by the Superintending Engineer without the Commissioner's sanction.

The procedure in other Provinces varies; but it is clear that Commissioners, and officers of other departments, have not a full voice in the preparation of the lists of works upon which the Provincial budget is based, or in regard to subsequent alterations of the budget programme.

493. This has led some witnesses to suggest that, while expenditure on large projects must necessarily be settled at headquarters, and the Local Government must also keep in its own hands a reserve against unforeseen demands, the rest of the existing Public Works budget should be broken up into divisional budgets, in respect of which the Commissioner would have the same power of distribution of funds as the Local Government now possesses. While the Commissioner would in no way interfere with the estimates or professional responsibility of the Public Works officers, it would be for him to decide between the conflicting demands in respect of his division, e.g. he should settle, after hearing the professional departmental officers, whether road A or road B should be taken up first, or whether, funds being limited, it is better to devote immediate expenditure to the building of police quarters, or to new tahsildars' offices. Under this system, each division would have an amount for local public works outlay to which the Commissioner might look with some certainty in normal years, and he would be the co-ordinating authority in respect thereto.

Suggestion to remedy present defects by divisional public works budget.

- The objections raised to this scheme are that :—
- 34983-92. (a.) Such a distribution would increase the difficulty of audit.
27585. (b.) It would not tend to economy, since money might be spent in one division which was more urgently needed in another.
- 17349, 28837-46. (c.) There would be initial difficulty in apportioning the allotment to each division.
- 14738, 14774-82. (d.) Commissioners have not the establishments which would enable them to control financial details.
31283. (e.) Their interests are confined to their own areas, while heads of departments can survey the whole Province.
- 35564-5. (f.) Judicial officers might object to have their building grants fixed by the Commissioner.

Objections raised to this suggestion.

494. While we do not agree with all these objections, we do not think it necessary to split up the public works budget as above proposed, since the co-ordination which we desire can be equally well obtained by the following system.

We prefer to obtain the necessary co-ordination by a procedure we suggest.

The proposals for local public works outlay in the ensuing year should be prepared jointly for each district by the Collector and the Executive Engineer, after consultation with the district heads of special departments. The proposals thus framed should be tabulated for the whole division by the Superintending Engineer, and then placed before a conference, presided over by the Commissioner, and including the Collectors of the districts and representatives of each special department. In that conference the proposals, as finally arrived at, should be tabulated in order of urgency, and should then be forwarded to the Local Government. It would then be the function of the Public Works Secretariat to tabulate these proposals for the whole Province, in consultation with the other branches of the Secretariat and with the heads of Provincial departments. The budget, as thus framed, would eventually be decided on by the Local Government; but on presentation to the Legislative Council, it should be so arranged as to indicate not merely the works on which money was proposed to be spent, but the total allocation of local outlay for each division and district, with a separate schedule for specially large works.*

As regards departure from the budget programme which may become necessary in the course of the year, we consider that any important re-allocation of funds as between specially large works should require the sanction of the Local Government. In regard to local works, any important variation from the divisional programme sanctioned in the budget might be carried out by the Superintending Engineer with the concurrence of the Commissioner. Superintending and Executive Engineers should, of course, be able to carry out petty alterations on their own responsibility, but the main object to be aimed at is to prevent any important departure from the previously arranged programme without reference to outside authority.

and petty works.

495. As regards petty works (mainly buildings), the usual procedure appears to be that Commissioners have small annual grants at their disposal, which they can spend, or allot to Collectors, subject to a pecuniary limit as to the total cost of an individual project.

posed for public

496. We do not think that the system of outside co-ordination which we have proposed in respect to public works expenditure should be applied to the budgets of other departments, since these are confined to their own particular spheres.

Position formerly held by the Commissioner in police matters.

497. Police.—The position held till lately by Commissioners in regard to police administration was a survival from the period when there was no organized department of Police under a Provincial Inspector-General. Bombay was the last Province to appoint an Inspector-General, and its District Police Act still gives recognition to the Commissioner's traditional status. In some other Provinces, although the Indian Police Act gives no specific recognition to Commissioners, the same tradition, coupled with the consideration that a Commissioner should have cognizance of matters relating to his territorial charge, resulted in the issue of rules by the Local Governments which gave Commissioners authority in the police administration parallel to that of the Inspector-General. In Bengal, for example, there was a complicated double line of appeal by police subordinates who had been punished, from the District Superintendent to the Deputy Inspector-General in the one case, and to the District Magistrate and the Commissioner on the other, while in the Punjab the Commissioner was the real Deputy Inspector-General of Police, and the departmental Deputy Inspector-General was merely his professional adviser.

Recent reduction of his powers.

498. The Police Commission of 1902 deprecated interference by the Commissioner in the details of police administration. His responsibilities, they said, should be limited to supervising and advising his District Magistrates in the discharge of their duties. For this purpose he should receive information on all important matters, should discuss police administration when visiting districts, and should bring to the notice of the District Magistrate, or the Inspector-General, any defects which he observed. His advice and suggestions would doubtless be valuable, but his formal and detailed interference was unnecessary.

Police
Commn's.
Report,
para. 120.

* This scheme, which was independently arrived at, would fit in with the proposals in respect of Provincial budgets lately put forward by the Government of India and approved in the Secretary of State's despatch of the 27th November, 1908.

G. of I.
Res. H. D. of 21st
March, 1905,
para. 49.

The Government of India passed the following orders upon these proposals :—

“ The principle determining the Commissioner's position and powers is that it is his duty, as the local head of the general administration, to exercise supervision and control over the action of the District Magistrates in respect of police matters. It follows from what has been said that there is no necessity for conferring on him the powers given by sections 17 to 20 of the Bombay Act. The object of these sections can equally well be attained by executive order. Nor need he be a Deputy Inspector-General. Since the Inspector-General will in future be an Indian Civilian (often of Commissioner's standing) or a picked man from the Department, it need not, in the opinion of the Government of India, be anticipated that well-considered views, expressed by a Commissioner, will be lightly disregarded. The case of the Commissioner in Sind requires special treatment. The Government of India think that he should be given the powers of a Local Government for police purposes, to be exercised subject to the general control of the Governor in Council.”

Rules and instructions have now been issued in the various Provinces embodying the views of the Government of India on the position of Commissioners and District Magistrates in respect to police matters* ; and Commissioners have, in accordance therewith, been deprived of such powers as they formerly possessed in regard to the discipline and promotion of police establishments. These rules had, generally speaking, been very recently applied when we visited the Provinces, with the result that a number of the witnesses seemed imperfectly acquainted with their actual scope and were not very clear as to the exact position of the District Magistrate and the Commissioner under the new system. Some well informed witnesses, however, made suggestions as to the desirability of allowing appeals from the higher police subordinates to go to the Commissioner.

499. If the views of the Police Commission, and the instructions of the Government of India in regard to the position of the Commissioner are fully observed, we agree with those witnesses who hold that no harm will accrue from the dissociation of the Commissioner from his former position of control and intervention in regard to disciplinary details. He should, however, receive prompt information as to the general state of the districts, and the occurrence and investigation of important crimes ; and his opinion should be called for confidentially every year regarding the work and character of the Police Superintendents, and Assistant and Deputy Superintendents, within his division. Moreover, as already indicated, and this remark applies also to the other departments we treat of below, the Commissioner should have the power to veto any local action of the Police authorities which he considers undesirable, pending reference to the Local Government.

Subject to certain remarks, we consider the Commissioner's present position adequate.

500. Forests.—In Madras, where there are no Commissioners, the Forest Department is entirely subordinate to the Board of Revenue, while in Bombay, where there is no Board, each Commissioner is head of the Forest administration within his division, though Conservators Position of Commissioners in respect to forest administration.

* The position of the Collector, as District Magistrate, in respect to the police will be discussed in the following chapter, of Forests have direct access to Government in matters relating to departmental appointments and finance. In the other Provinces, the Inspector-General of Forests has told us that Conservators stand, or should stand, to Commissioners in the same position as district forest officers do to Collectors, that is the Commissioner would have control in matters in which the operations of the Forest Department may affect the rights or interests of the people. It would appear, however, from evidence taken in these Provinces, that the position of Commissioners is not very clearly understood, and that in practice their influence depends a good deal on the personality of individual officers.

Extent to which Conservators of Forests should be subject to the Commissioner's control.

501. We think that Commissioners should, by rule and practice as well as in theory, hold the position attributed to them by Mr. Eardley Wilmot, i.e., that the Conservators of Forests should be subject to their control in all matters in which the operations of the department concern the public. If the Commissioner occupies this position, there will be no necessity, in Provinces where Commissioners exist, to give any special functions to Boards of Revenue or Financial Commissioners in forest questions. As a matter of fact, the only Province outside Madras in which these authorities now have such control is the Punjab, and even there we were told that the Financial Commissioner merely passed on papers to the Local Government.*

Position of Commissioners and Collectors in respect to primary education.

502. Education.—Commissioners and Collectors have at present a considerable voice in respect of primary education, by reason of the control they exercise over the budgets and operations of local boards. We shall deal with their future position in this respect in Part III., where we propose that Collectors and their assistants should preside over the district and sub-district boards, and that Commissioners should have the power of intervention in case of grave neglect, by a local board, of education or any other service assigned to it.

They should have greater influence over secondary and collegiate education.

In regard to secondary and collegiate education, however, and in respect of training and technical schools, they have, except to some extent in the Central Provinces, very little influence or responsibility. Some of the educational officers whom we examined admitted that it might be expedient that Commissioners and Collectors should have a larger interest in these matters.

We consider that each of the Government institutions mentioned, viz., colleges, secondary schools and training and technical schools, should have a board of Visitors, of which the Commissioner, the Collector, and the local Sub-divisional officer, as well as non-officials, should always be members; that the remarks of a member of the visiting board in the college or school inspection book should always receive attention; and that the action taken thereon should be communicated to him. In the event of a member thinking the condition of things such that a mere remark in the inspection book will not suffice, or that the action taken on his remarks is not satisfactory, he should address the Collector or Commissioner on the subject.† Moreover, no new institution belonging to the above category should be started, and no material alteration should be made in the status of an existing institution, without the Collector and the Commissioner being consulted; and Commissioners and district officers should, in the course of their tours, make a point of visiting the institutions in question, and of becoming acquainted with their tone and influence.

503. Excise.—When excise work was merely a branch of the ordinary land revenue administration, it was largely controlled by the Commissioner. Now, however, the inevitable specialization of the department, and the creation of Provincial Commissioners of Excise to supervise and control work in the districts, has very materially reduced the Divisional Commissioner's share in the excise administration. In reviewing the report of the Excise Committee of 1905, the Government of India held that, in respect to excise work, Collectors must be directly under the Excise Commissioner, but that the Divisional Commissioner should be consulted on questions of policy, both by Collectors and by superior authorities. This, we understand, is the position which at that time already obtained, save in the Punjab and Burma, where the Excise Commissioner was mainly an inspecting and advisory officer.

We accept the present position of the Divisional Commissioner, as defined by the Government of India; but hold that Collectors should be able to refer to him any orders of the Excise Commissioner which they deem inexpedient. The Divisional Commissioner could then, if he agreed with the Collector and failed to convince the Excise Commissioner, suspend action by the latter pending reference to the Local Government.

Position of the Commissioner in respect to Land Revenue administration and connected subjects.

504. The directions in which the Commissioners' position is most capable of general enhancement appear to be (a) financial powers, and (b) power to appoint or post the principal land revenue officers within their divisions.

505. We have already recommended that Commissioners, as well as heads of Provincial administrative departments, should be given considerable powers, subject to general existing rules, in such matters as the grant of pensions, the determination of acting or charge allowances, and the passing of travelling allowance charges; and that they should receive, in regard to officers whom they can appoint, a large part of the dispensary powers, which the Civil Service Regulations now vest in the Local Governments, or in the Government of India. We have also suggested that they should have larger discretion in the expenditure of money allotted to them for contingency purposes, and that they should have power, within certain limits, to sanction recurring charges, and such matters as advances for house building and permanent office advances.

We further consider that under the head 'land-revenue expenditure,' which is practically general administration, Commissioners should be able to make reappropriations between one district and another in their divisions, in cases where sums are allocated by districts.

506. We have already alluded to the fact that Commissioners have small discretionary grants for petty public works. In Bengal, of late years, Commissioners have also been given allotments of about Rs. 10,000 per annum, from which they can make grants at their discretion, direct or through Collectors, for purposes of a public nature, or to remedy small defects brought to their notice in the course of their tours. Grants of this sort can be applied to giving some special assistance to deserving local objects. The late Lieutenant Governor of Bengal considers that this system, which has also been applied in Eastern Bengal and Assam, has worked well, by reducing correspondence and adding to the prestige of the Commissioners. He points out, too, that the position of district officers in financial matters is at present anomalous, their powers being exceedingly small in comparison with their functions and responsibilities.

In the United Provinces, Commissioners have small grants for the purpose of entertaining temporary additions to district establishments in times of pressure.

Evidence in favour of extension of this system.

507. The Lieutenant Governor of the United Provinces desires to give Commissioners enhanced financial powers for general purposes, and several important witnesses have indicated the desirability of conferring such powers in the following directions :—

(a) For general purposes of a public nature, calculated to be of benefit to their divisions, the purpose being intentionally defined in wide terms so as to allow of the exercise of considerable discretion on the part of Commissioners.

(b) For the grant of money rewards to specially deserving persons.

(c) In respect of the creation of minor permanent, as well as of temporary, appointments.*

Our proposals.

508. We think that Commissioners in all Provinces should be provided with funds for the first two purposes ; but it would be necessary, of course, that their discretionary powers in the matter of rewards should be carefully defined.†

We think it specially desirable that Commissioners should be given larger funds than they at present possess for the purpose of making discretionary grants for small works of public improvement. The sums placed at their disposal for expenditure on these and on the other objects referred to in clauses (a) and (b) above should, further, be large enough to enable them to distribute funds of this character to their Collectors, and to keep in their own hands a reserve for direct outlay by themselves. Grants of this description should not be subject to detailed audit. It should suffice for the dispensing officer to furnish the Accounts department with periodical certificates showing how the money has been spent, and accompanied by the payees' receipts.

Commissioners should have powers in regard to the creation of minor appointments.

509. As regards the creation of appointments, some witnesses who would give Commissioners power to add temporarily to the clerical staff, would not extend such liberty to the creation of permanent posts, since this involves a recurring charge upon the Provincial finances which should be dealt with by the Local Governments. We have, however, already suggested the grant of some powers of this description to Boards of Revenue and Financial Commissioners ; and it seems desirable that Commissioners also should have the power of making small additions to revenue establishments, and should not have to apply to a higher authority whenever an additional clerk or peon is required. It appears that, in some cases, such appointments are now sanctioned by Secretaries to 19489-91. Lieutenant-Governors on their own responsibility. We think that, subject to the existence of budget provision, and within a small total money limit for each division, Commissioners might have power to sanction permanent appointments in their own, or subordinate, offices up to a limit of Rs. 25 a month in any individual case, while in regard to temporary appointments, their powers might extend to an individual limit of Rs. 50 a month and to a period of one year.

510. We shall deal in a separate chapter with the powers of Commissioners in respect to suspensions and remissions of land revenue, grant of loans to agriculturists, acquisition of land for public purposes, and Court of Wards matters.

511. In Bombay, Commissioners have full powers in regard to the appointment of manlatdars, subject to conditions of qualification prescribed by the Local Government, and in Madras, where there are no Commissioners, Collectors appoint tahsildars from a list of their nominees which has been approved of by the Board of Revenue. In the two Bengals, the appointment of sub-deputy collectors, whose status and pay correspond largely with that of the tahsildars in other Provinces, is made by the Local Government, although Commissioners are allowed the right of preliminary nomination in respect to a proportion of the vacancies. In the United Provinces the Board of Revenue appoints tahsildars and naib (deputy or assistant) tahsildars; while in the Punjab the Financial Commissioner appoints tahsildars, and the Divisional Commissioner naibs. In Burma and the Central Provinces the appointment of tahsildars (styled myooks in Burma) is made by the Local Government.

Appointment of
tahsildars, etc.

512. A number of witnesses are in favour of the appointment by Commissioners of tahsildars and officers of like standing; but most of the officials* who spoke on the subject were against such delegation, the argument being that Commissioners could already nominate candidates, and that it was desirable that the final selection should be made by a central authority which could take a wider view of things, and obtain better men from the Province as a whole. It was also urged that it was not expedient to split up the 'Subordinate' executive service into divisional cadres.

Evidence for and against this power being given to Commissioners.
We think it should be given.

On the other hand, there were no complaints against the Bombay system, which the senior member of Council there held to have worked well, and in so far as candidates are nominated by Commissioners, it seems better that these should have the final responsibility of appointment. The grant of such power to Commissioners would, moreover, prevent men being sent to parts of the country in which they were strangers, and would generally keep tahsildars and corresponding officers, who should be possessed of great local experience, within the same division; while their appointment by the Commissioner would strengthen his hands, and help to give that additional prestige and influence which we desire to attach to his post. We think therefore that it is quite sufficient for a central Provincial authority to keep in its own hands the appointment of Deputy Collectors, as members of the 'Provincial' service, and that the appointment of tahsildars, as also of deputy or naib tahsildars, should be localized in the hands of Commissioners, subject to such general conditions of qualification as the Government may from time to time prescribe.*

It may be objected that the existence of separate divisional cadres for tahsildars might tend to inequality in promotion. If this proved to be the case to any material extent, there are remedies available, e.g., payment in accordance with a time scale, or occasional transfers by arrangement between Commissioners.

Power of Commissioners to post
tahsildars, etc.

513. As regards transfers, the general position now is that Commissioners have power to post tahsildars and like officers within their divisions; but where there are no divisional cadres and appointments are made by an outside authority, there are also transfers as between one division and another.

The appointment of Deputy Collectors should remain with Government,
except in Sind.

514. The appointment of Deputy Collectors is made in all Provinces by the Local Government, and rightly so. We consider, however, that an exception might be made in the case of Sind, which is practically a small Province within a larger one; and that there the Commissioner should have power, so long as the Sind cadre is kept separate, to promote men of the 'Subordinate' service to Deputy Collectorships, as he can already appoint Subordinate Judges.†

37231-9.

The Commissioner should post Deputy Collectors and Civilians below the rank of Collector within his division.

515. A Commissioner in the Punjab has theoretically the power to transfer Assistant or Extra Assistant Commissioners within his division, though in practice this function is exercised by the Local Government; and the Commissioner in Sind posts Assistant and Deputy Collectors. In the Central Provinces too, the Commissioner sometimes posts Assistant and Extra Assistant Commissioners; but, ordinarily, the posting of junior Civilians and Deputy Collectors is, throughout India, in the hands of the Local Government. There is a considerable consensus of opinion in favour of allowing Commissioners to post Deputy Collectors or Extra Assistant Commissioners within their divisions‡, but some witnesses who are in favour of this course hesitate to extend it to the case of Civilian Assistants to the Collector, and especially to such of these as are in charge of sub-divisions of districts.

We think that the Commissioner should have the right of posting Deputy Collectors, and Civilians below the rank of Collector, for ordinary duties to particular districts within his division. The general position would then be that the Government would assign a number of Assistant and Deputy Collectors for the normal work of each division, and the Commissioner would distribute these among his districts.§ The posting of officers to Collector-

* Mr. Dutt holds that this would lead to a deterioration of the service, and to a greater degree of favouritism, and Mr. Hichens would not lay down a uniform rule for all Provinces.

† Mr. Dutt dissents, and considers that, both in the case of Subordinate Judges and Deputy Collectors, the appointment should rest with the Bombay Government.

ships should of course remain with the Local Government, and the power of transferring officers between one division and another must rest, as at present, in its hands.

Where a Commissioner has power to post an officer of this class, he might also have power to grant him short leave in cases in which the appointment of a substitute is unnecessary. We understand that Commissioners in Bombay already have this power up to a limit of 30 days.

And might give short leave to such officers.

516. The Commissioner in Sind, in the exercise of functions delegated to him by the Bombay Government under Act V. of 1868, has power, in consultation with the Judicial Commissioner, to invest officers with ordinary magisterial powers, and with certain additional functions under the Criminal Procedure Code, e.g., power to commit to the Court of Sessions, to require security for good behaviour, to take action regarding the removal of nuisances, and, in the case of first-class magistrates, to hear appeals. The Bombay Government has suggested to the Government of India that similar powers might be given to its ordinary Commissioners. The United Provinces Government made a somewhat similar suggestion to us, and the proposal is supported by a number of official witnesses here and in other Provinces, on the ground that the gazetting of such powers by Government is at present largely a matter of routine, and is based on the recommendations made by Commissioners.*

The Commissioner should be able to invest officers with magisterial powers.

Subject to such conditions of fitness as the Local Government may prescribe, and to the concurrence of the District Judge or other competent judicial authority, we think that powers of this description might very reasonably be vested in Commissioners.†

30219-23.

517. Except in the United Provinces, there are separate Settlement Commissioners in the major Provinces. The actual district settlements are carried out by Indian Civilians specially deputed for the purpose, and their principal reports pass through the Divisional Commissioner, who has the opportunity of criticizing the general character of the settlement proposed and the rates of assessment suggested. The United Provinces, however, form an exception to this rule, for there, it appears, the Divisional Commissioners have been instructed not to deal with such reports, but to submit them without remark to the Board of Revenue. We consider that the Divisional Commissioner should be in the same position here as in other Provinces.

Commissioners and land revenue settlements.

518. We have received a variety of detailed suggestions from Local Governments and witnesses as regards other powers which may be granted to Commissioners; but we do not propose to discuss these in detail. They should be considered by each Local Government with reference to the circumstances of its Province. The general principle upon which we would insist is that, in matters connected with land revenue and general administration the Commissioner should be given all powers which cannot be safely delegated to Collectors and the exercise of which is not an essential function of the headquarters offices. In other words, it should be the denial, and not the grant, of powers to Commissioners that should require special justification. The vesting of Commissioners with such powers will not merely save references, but will facilitate the reform we have suggested in the preceding chapter, viz., the merging of existing Boards of Revenue and Financial Commissionerships in enlarged Executive Councils for the Provinces. The Provincial Governments, even as thus constituted, must be overburdened if they do not delegate to Commissioners all revenue functions which it is not absolutely necessary to centralize at headquarters.

Powers to be given to Commissioners in matters connected with Land Revenue and general administration.

* Some of the witnesses, however, would not give Commissioners the right of conferring first-class powers.

and 474.

Over-ruling of Commissioners
by Local Governments.

519. We consider, further, that in matters which require reference to the Local Government, a Commissioner should not be finally over-ruled, on questions of importance affecting his division, without the concurrence of the Head of the Province.

Each Commissioner should have a gazetted officer as a Personal Assistant.

520. In Bombay proper, each Commissioner has, at the head of his office, two Deputy Collectors as Personal Assistants, and the Commissioner in Sind has, in addition, a Personal Assistant drawn from the Indian Civil Service. In the two Bengals the Commissioner has a Deputy Collector as a Personal Assistant; in other Provinces he appears only to have the assistance of clerical officers. In view of the increased powers and position which we desire to assign to Commissioners, we think that a Commissioner should always have a gazetted officer as Personal Assistant, who should usually be an experienced member of the 'Provincial' service. Civilian Personal Assistants would generally be junior officers, and would be constantly changing.

Improvement of Commissioners'
offices.

521. The remarks made in the following chapter as to the need for improvement in Collectors' offices, apply also to those of Commissioners.

Paras.
558-9.

Conferences of Commissioners and Collectors, etc.

The Bengal
Provincial Conferences.

522. Periodical conferences between Commissioners already take place in Bombay, Bengal and the Central Provinces; and we have had evidence that they would be useful elsewhere, and that the conference system in Bombay should be extended.* This system has been most fully developed in Bengal, under the auspices of Sir Andrew Fraser. A conference lasting about a fortnight is held there every autumn, and is attended not merely by Commissioners of divisions, but by the members of the Board of Revenue, the Secretaries to Government and heads of Provincial departments. Non-officials of standing, such as members of the Legislative Council, are also invited to attend during the discussion of particular subjects in respect of which their views would be useful; and their opinions appear on the records of the conference, though they do not vote as members. The conference is presided over by the senior member of the Board of Revenue, and discusses matters of importance which have arisen, or are likely to arise, within the Province. The minutes of the conference are submitted to the Lieutenant Governor, and before it dissolves, he attends and explains his personal views on all important matters which have come before it.

25077-9. The Central Provinces conferences do not include non-official members, and the Bombay conference is confined to the Divisional Commissioners of the Presidency proper.

523. We recommend the extension to other Provinces of a system somewhat similar to that which has been adopted in Bengal. A conference of this sort, bringing Commissioners into periodical touch with one another and with the officials at headquarters, as also with non-official gentlemen of standing, gives great assistance in the disposal of matters which would otherwise take up much correspondence, and affords opportunity for full and friendly interchange of opinion. We think, however, that the Head of the Province and other members of the Provincial Government, though they might occasionally find it advantageous to attend the conference debates, should not take any regular part in the deliberations, as such action might restrict freedom of discussion. In the event of the abolition of Boards of Revenue and Financial Commissioners, the presiding member of such conferences should be the senior Commissioner.

An analogous system should be adopted in other Provinces.

Paras 474, 476.

524. We have already indicated, in the case of the Madras and the Bombay Presidencies, that the Commissioners of a Province ought to meet periodically for the discussion of important questions, and that they should be able to submit joint representations to the Local Government on questions of policy and procedure. We think that the same course should be adopted in every Province; and the Provincial conferences above suggested, for which all the Commissioners will assemble, will afford opportunity for this.

Commissioners should also meet for the discussion of important matters.

14313.

525. In Bengal the annual Provincial conference of Commissioners, etc., is preceded by conferences of the Collectors of each division, who meet under the presidency of their Commissioner. In the Central Provinces and Sind, mention has also been made of such conferences, but here they appear to be held only occasionally. Some witnesses in Bombay and the United Provinces do not consider such divisional conferences necessary, on the ground that the Commissioner is already in sufficiently close touch with his Collectors; but in Eastern Bengal and Assam it was thought that they would be useful.

There should be a conference for each division on the model of that for the Province as a whole.

It seems to us that if divisional conferences were constituted on the model of those suggested for the Province as a whole, i.e., if, besides Collectors, they included the principal local officers of departments which come into close touch with the people, with admission of non-officials of standing from the different districts during discussion of subjects in which they are likely to be interested, such meetings should be of great service. They would put the Commissioner in fuller possession of the views of the men with whom he has to work, would help to co-ordinate the work of the various departments, would bring the Collectors into touch with each other's views and difficulties, and would lead to closer contact with representative non-official opinion. Such conferences should, we think, be held at least once a year.

526. We regard it as essential, in order to obtain full freedom of view on the part of those attending, that the proceedings of the Provincial and divisional conferences should be private.*

Advisory Councils for Commissioners and Collectors.

Evidence for and against Advisory Councils for Collectors and Commissioners.

527. We have taken a large amount of evidence on this subject. The suggestions made were mainly in connexion with Advisory Councils for Collectors, but most of the witnesses who desired these appeared, by implication if not specifically, to propose them for Commissioners also.

Speaking generally, the bulk of official opinion† was against such Councils, but there were some noticeable exceptions‡. Non-official opinion§, on the other hand, was largely in favour of them, though again, with important exceptions||; while some witnesses, including the Home Secretary to the Government of India, were in favour of Advisory Councils for Commissioners, but not for Collectors.

The Lieutenant Governors of Bengal and the United Provinces are against any such Councils, while the Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces thinks that the development of existing local bodies is more required in present circumstances.

528. Hardly any of the witnesses who advocated such Advisory Councils were in favour of making them purely elected; and though those¶ who would have them partly elected preponderate, a not greatly inferior number, among whom non-officials are largely represented, are in favour of the Councils being altogether nominated.

Opinion as to whether they should be merely advisory.

530. On the question whether these Councils should be merely advisory (i.e. that it should be optional with the Commissioner or Collector to accept their advice or not), or whether their advice should be more or less binding, opinion was fairly evenly divided. The majority, including some prominent non-officials, were in favour of their being purely advisory; but the bulk of the non-official witnesses desired that, where the Commissioner or Collector was at variance with the majority of his Council, he should be bound to accept their decision or refer the matter to higher authority. Some witnesses, however (Mr. Gokhale, for example) discriminated between matters in which the Commissioner or Collector might act on his own discretion, and matters in which he must accept or refer the Council's recommendation ; and Sir H. Risley was prepared to contemplate a somewhat similar division of subjects in the case of the Commissioner's Council, though at the outset he would make this purely advisory.

531. The general arguments adduced in favour of Councils for Collectors were that it was very desirable to associate representatives of the people with the actual work of administration ; and that to do this would not merely popularize the Government, but would permit the delegation of powers which witnesses who hold this view would not give to Collectors acting singly. Also, that such a system would enable the officers of Government, and the Government itself, to get a clearer view of the feelings of the people on matters of policy and administration.

Arguments for and against Advisory Councils for Collectors.

On the other side it was argued :—

(a.) That in most Provinces Collectors already had district boards, the members of which they could consult upon matters of general policy.

Vol. VII.,
App. II.,
p. 167.

(b.) That any Collector worthy of his position would habitually obtain the opinions of non-officials whose views would be of value to him in dealing with any particular matter ; that a new Collector would be guided in the selection of such persons by notes left by his predecessors, and by the darbar list, which is a register of district notables who should be invited to attend public functions ; and that to tie the Collector down to a particular set of advisers, who would be largely drawn from a single class of the community, would be a mischievous step. Still more mischievous would it be to hamper him in the work of administration, which is mainly of a detailed character, by making his actions depend largely on the votes of an irresponsible body.

532. The arguments for and against Councils for Commissioners were generally similar, save that there is no divisional body corresponding to the Collector's district board ; but, with reference to this, it is urged by the opponents of Advisory Councils that the Commissioner is in constant touch with his Collectors and, in the course of his tours, gets full opportunity for gauging representative non-official opinion.

And for Commissioners.

Para. 525.

533. We have suggested above that each Commissioner should convene periodical divisional conferences, to which non-officials of standing from different districts would be invited in respect to subjects in which they are likely to be interested. Such conferences, before which important matters relating to the division would be placed, seem to us to afford a due opportunity of co-ordinating official and representative non-official opinion, while the Commissioner ought in no way to abate the ordinary private consultations with non-official gentlemen which now take place. We are very reluctant to add to the number of Boards and Councils, and we consider that a separate Advisory Council for the Commissioner is not required.

Separate Advisory Councils not necessary for Commissioners.

Nor for Collectors.

534. We also agree with those witnesses who spoke against a separate Advisory Council for the Collector. We consider that the district boards, which include leading officials of the district as well as representative non-officials, afford a convenient instrument for furnishing advice to the Collector upon matters which, although not included in their administrative sphere, affect the district generally, or important portions of its area or people. We understand that some Collectors do already make use of their district boards in this way; but we should like this practice extended.* Consultation with the district board should not, of course, in any way preclude or diminish the Collector's private consultation with influential non-officials. Given these conditions, we see no object in calling a separate Advisory Council into existence; while we regard it as impossible, in present circumstances, that the Collector should share his executive responsibilities with such a body.†

Jirgas in Baluchistan and the Frontier Province.

535. In Baluchistan there is a system of jirgas, which consist of influential members of the local communities, summoned by Sub-divisional or District officers to assist in the disposal of civil and criminal cases. There are likewise Provincial jirgas, which meet twice in the year to deal with more important judicial matters. The Agent to the Governor-General states that these Provincial and local jirgas can be, and are, utilized as advisory bodies in respect to other matters; and the development and continuance of this system will, we consider, keep the local authorities in sufficient touch with public opinion.

There are similar local jirgas in the North-West Frontier Province, but the general opinion is against utilizing them to a larger degree than at present. This Province, however, contains, in its settled areas, district boards, whose members can be consulted by Deputy Commissioners, as proposed above.

CHAPTER XIII.

COLLECTORS.

536. The general functions of Collectors have already been summarized in Chapter II.‡

Para. 31.

Causes which have led to reduction in the powers and functions of Collectors.

Like the Commissioner, the Collector, in former days, was directly concerned with practically all the executive functions of Government within his district, and his position, too, has been materially reduced by the operation of the same causes. We must add to these, in the case of Collectors, the growing tendency of officers to take short leave to Europe, which involves frequent transfers; and weakness of cadres, requiring the appointment of very junior officers to the officiating charge of districts.

Para. 482.

* Mr. Meyer would like to see it made general.

† Mr. Dutt dissents, and thinks that an Advisory Council, with some provision for its giving help to the Collector in his executive work, would make district administration more efficient and popular. The isolation of the district administration, which is virtually a one man rule, is, he thinks, the real cause of much discontent in India, and to invest the Collector with larger powers, as we recommend in this Report, without some provision to associate the people with him in his general work, would create discontent and dissatisfaction among the people.

537. The decay of the old system of patriarchal rule by the Collector is the inevitable accompaniment of the developments which have taken place in the character of the administration, and in the sentiments and education of the people. But it has to be considered whether, having due regard to these considerations, the position of the Collector is at present what it ought to be, and if not, what measures can be taken to restore to him some of the power and prestige which should be possessed by the head of a district. A number of witnesses, including some officials, think that the present powers of Collectors are sufficient, the argument being, in some cases, that the grant of larger powers is in itself undesirable; in others, that Collectors are already over-worked. Other witnesses*, again, hold that what is required is not so much the bestowal of wider powers on Collectors, as the grant of greater finality of decision in matters which they already deal with. There is, however, a considerable body of evidence† in favour of enhancing the position of Collectors. This class of opinion is perhaps most typically summarized in the statement submitted to us by the Punjab Government, which considers that action should be taken, inter alia, in the direction of restoring the influence of Collectors over the special departments, giving greater finality to their orders, and granting them larger financial powers. Some non-official witnesses again, like Mr. Gokhale, would be willing to give larger powers to Collectors if these were in some way associated with representatives of the people in the work of administration.

We have already considered this latter point, while we shall deal in Part III. with the important question of the Collector's position in relation to rural boards and municipalities.

538. The Collector's remaining functions may be roughly discriminated as those falling under matters connected with the land revenue and with criminal and general administration, and those in respect to matters now primarily dealt with by special departments. In these spheres we consider that the Collector's present position ought to be enhanced, and as in the case of Commissioners, we shall deal with the latter first.

It ought to be enhanced.

The Collector in relation to special Departments.

Paras.

539. We are emphatically of opinion that the position of the Collector as administrative head of the district should be recognized by officers of all special departments. What we have said as to the necessity for a unifying influence over the various branches of Government work in a division, applies also, in great measure, to the individual districts; and while we do not suggest that the officers of special departments should, save in so far as is implied in our recommendations which follow, be subordinate to the Collector, the latter ought, like the Commissioner, to be entitled to call for any information which he thinks fit from them, and to have such information given to him spontaneously in matters of importance, while any views he may express should receive the fullest consideration.

The Collector should be recognized as the administrative head of the district, and should have certain powers in respect of special departments.

If this is recognized, and if the specific recommendations we make in regard to the departments which come most closely within the Collector's sphere are accepted, we think that his position will be materially improved; and that the danger, which responsible witnesses have emphasized, of his powers being unduly sapped by the specialized departments, will be obviated.

Relations of the matters;

(a) In Madras.

541. Public Works: Irrigation.—In Madras, except in the case of very minor irrigation tanks, which are under the Collector, the distribution of water rests with the Public Works Department to a point just above that at which it reaches the raiyats' fields; but the Public Works officers have no concern with the supply of water to the fields, or with assessments or remissions. The Madras Government holds this position to be unsatisfactory, and desires that Public Works officers should be subordinate to the Collector in non-professional matters affecting the raiyat, and especially so in regard to the distribution of water and the repair of tanks. It proposes to take this matter into consideration in connexion with the report of a Provincial Committee, which was under consideration at the time we visited the Province. This view of the proper relative position of the Collector and the Public Works officials is supported by a number of official and non-official witnesses, on the ground that, as the Collector is responsible for the realization of the revenue, he should also have a voice in the supply of water, and that the raiyats prefer to come to him and to his Sub-divisional officers with any grievances in this respect.

542. In Bombay, we understand that the expenditure to be incurred yearly on tanks in each district is settled by the Collector and the Executive Engineer jointly, and that, in case of difference, the Collector can refer to higher authority. The Irrigation officers are responsible for the distribution of water, but in certain matters connected therewith appeal from their order lies to the Collector.

Act VII.,
1879, sec. 67.

In Bengal, artificial irrigation from Government sources is of little relative importance in the cultivation of the Province; but where Government canals exist, the distribution of water, and the assessment and collection of water rates, are in the hands of the Irrigation officers.* In the United Provinces the distribution of water to the village, at which point it passes into the hands of the raiyats, is now made by the Irrigation officers, who assess the water rate but do not collect it. They are, however, expected to keep in touch with the Collectors in the discharge of their functions.

In the Punjab the distribution of water and irrigation assessments are entirely in the hands of the Irrigation engineers. The existing system here has been criticized by some witnesses, but the late Lieutenant-Governor, though thinking that it might probably require amendment in some respects, was not prepared to express an opinion on the point, as the matter was under investigation by the Canal Colonies Committee. In Burma there is only one irrigation circle. The Irrigation officers there were formerly the assistants of the Deputy-Commissioner, but are now independent of him as regards distribution of water, and the Province appears to be working towards the Punjab system of making the Irrigation officer the assessing authority also.

In the Central Provinces irrigation is as yet scanty, although it will materially increase hereafter. Here the Collector appears to have no direct voice in the matter of the distribution of water, but can take action on complaints. The Chief Commissioner holds that the Executive Engineer should be the assistant and adviser of the Collector.

543. The Public Works Secretary to the Government of India has expressed a strong opinion against placing Irrigation officers under Collectors. His most important objections to such a step appear to us to be that the intervention of officers lacking technical knowledge would prejudice the continuous development of irrigation work and the economical distribution of water—both matters of prime importance in India. Further that it would be impossible to make irrigation and general administrative charges co-terminous. The Public Works officers whom we examined in the Provinces, and some other witnesses, were also opposed to any further control of the Irrigation staff by the Collector.*

544. As pointed out by the Irrigation Commission of 1901-3, circumstances differ materially in the various Provinces, and it is obvious that, as regards the relations between Revenue and Public Works officers, a system of tank irrigation stands on a different footing from canal systems, since technical considerations are of much less importance in the former case than in the latter. Such relations must, therefore, be left to the Local Governments to determine for each Province. We think, however, that the Collector should always have a weighty voice in a matter of such vital importance to the raiyat as the supply and distribution of irrigation water; and our general proposals above will facilitate this.†

Relations between Revenue and Irrigation officers must be determined by Local Governments.

Para. 539.

545. Public Works: Roads and buildings.—In the matter of roads, the Collector has at present a large amount of control in nearly every Province, as president of the district board. In Madras, Bengal, and Eastern Bengal the road operations of the Province fall almost entirely within the sphere of district and sub-divisional boards. In Burma there are no such boards, but there are special funds in each district, under the management of the Deputy Commissioner, from which petty road work is carried on. In other Provinces the more important roads are Provincial, and in the Central Provinces the Provincial sphere extends to all but unmetalled roads.

opinion as to the defects of the present system in that Province, which we have already quoted in the preceding chapter. Para. 492.

The degree of control he should exercise must be determined by each Local Government.

While the actual degree of control which the Collector should have over the Executive Engineer in such matters should be for the decision of each Local Government, we consider that the Collector's opinion on the relative claims of different roads in respect to outlay on construction and maintenance should carry great weight. The proposals we have made regarding the connexion of officers of other departments with the Public Works programme of the division will tend to ensure this result. Para. 494.
The same remark applies in regard to buildings, and to such irrigation works as will come within the scope of local public works outlay, as apart from large projects.

Recent reduction of the Collector's control (as District Magistrate) over the police administration.

546. Police.—As in the case of Commissioners, the Collector (as District Magistrate) had formerly, in most Provinces, some control over the disciplinary arrangements of the district police, more especially in regard to the appointment, promotion, and punishment of subordinate police officers. Here, too, the Police Commission of 1902 held that such matters should be left mainly to the officers of the Police Department. The Government of India, in passing orders on their report laid down that "since the District Magistrate is, and must continue to be, the chief executive authority in the district, and in that capacity is responsible for the peace and good order of his charge, the police must be completely under his control and direction, and he must, subject to the usual control of the Commissioner and the Government, have unquestioned power to employ them as he thinks best for the maintenance of law and order, and the detection and suppression of crime. He should not, however, interfere in matters of departmental management and discipline, except where the conduct and qualifications of a police officer affect the criminal administration of his district. Even then his power of intervention should be exercised, not by issuing direct orders, but by bringing the case to the notice of the superior officers of the police." They added that while it was essential to remove all occasions for the complaint that the District Magistrate's powers had been improperly extended, and the authority of the District Superintendent over his own subordinates unduly reduced, it was equally essential that "the supervision of the District Magistrate over the action of the police should be real, and that there should be no room for doubt as to his full responsibility for the criminal administration of his district."

Police Commn's Report, para. 121. H. D. Res. of 21st March, 1905, para. 48.

In a later paragraph of the same Resolution it was laid down that :— Ibid, para. 50.

(a.) All matters connected with arms, drill, exercise, and internal discipline should be under the District Superintendent of Police.

(b.) The appointment, punishment, and dismissal of inspectors and lower police officials should vest in appropriate officers of the Police Department ; but

(c.) The District Magistrate should be empowered to direct enquiry into misconduct on the part of police officers.

(d.) He should also have the power to call on the District Superintendent for report on, and for the removal of, incompetent subordinates, and to issue orders as to the conduct of particular investigations.

547. As observed in the last chapter, the rules which have been issued by the various Local Governments in furtherance of these general instructions had only lately come into effect when we took evidence in the Provinces, and some witnesses were not very clear as to the exact position of the District Magistrate under the new system.

Subject to certain provisos, we accept the situation now existing.

We accept the situation now created, which relieves the District Magistrate of a considerable amount of detailed, and not altogether appropriate, work which formerly fell to him in most Provinces; but this remark is subject to the following provisos :—

(i.) That the control of the District Magistrate over the police for general purposes shall be absolute, and that there shall be no room for doubt as to his full responsibility for the criminal administration of the district.

(ii.) That the enquiry into misconduct on the part of police officers which the District Magistrate is empowered to direct, may be carried out, at his discretion, by one of his subordinate magistrates as well as by a police officer.

26962-3,

We consider further that the District Magistrate should be competent, in the interests of his district, to require the transfer of an inspector or a sub-inspector from any one part of it to another. There was some evidence that his wishes in this respect would usually be complied with by the police authorities; but he should have the definite power to enforce them.

Para. 81
of their Report.

548. The Police Commission of 1902 held that the connexion of the District Magistrate with the Police Department should gradually grow less close as the honesty and capacity of the force improved. We cannot subscribe to this opinion: we consider that the present intimate connexion of the District Magistrate with the police administration of his district should in no way be weakened.

Inspection of police stations.

550. Excise.—In all Provinces the Collector is held generally responsible for the district excise administration, which was originally a mere branch of his land-revenue functions, such preventive work as was required being discharged by the agency of the ordinary police. Present conditions, however, require a considerable departure from this system; and it is now recognized that a special Excise Department is necessary for—

(b) Preventive operations, which in present circumstances have increased in importance, and cannot be effectively discharged by the ordinary police.

F.D. Res. of
1907.

In reviewing the report of the Excise Committee of 1905, the Government of India laid stress on the desirability of properly organized excise preventive agencies, and indicated the necessity for an organized and a well instructed distillery staff; but they also laid down that the Collector must continue to be responsible for general excise administration, and that the district head of the specialized staff must be under his control, occupying the same position towards him as the District Superintendent of Police does in regard to police work. Further, in a supplementary letter to the Government of Madras, it was held, in agreement with the Committee, that the excise administration in that Province should be more under the control of the Collector than had hitherto been the case.

We consider that these orders sufficiently safeguard the position of the Collector in regard to the local excise staff, while, as regards his control by the Provincial Excise Commissioner, we would draw attention to what we have said in the preceding chapter.

The Collector and Forest work.

551. Forests.—In Madras and Bombay the District Forest Officer is subordinate to the Collector in all matters in which the operations of the Forest Department affect the people, i.e., in everything except matters of purely technical forestry. In other Provinces the position is theoretically the same; but the subordination of the forest officer is, in practice, neither so complete nor so clearly defined. Thus, speaking generally, Conservators have larger administrative powers, and there is more direct correspondence between them and the district forest officers than in the two Presidencies. Further, where there is any material difference of opinion between the Collector and the Forest Officer, the Commissioner has, in some Provinces at any rate, to be referred to. The evidence in these Provinces is, however, generally to the effect that the existing position has worked in a satisfactory manner.

Matters in which the District Forest Officer should be the Assistant of the Collector.

552. Having regard to the character of forest operations, as described in paragraph 292, we think it essential that, in all matters which bring the forest administration into relations with the agricultural population, the District Forest Officer should be made definitely and clearly the assistant of the Collector; that the latter should be entitled to give him direct orders in regard to such matters; and that all correspondence connected therewith which passes between the District Forest Officer and the Conservator should go through the Collector. In all questions relating to technical forestry, the District Forest Officer should, however, deal with the Conservator direct.†

The control, appellate or otherwise, to be exercised by the Collector over the subordinate forest establishments is a matter which should be left to the discretion of the Local Governments.

Minor forest areas and pasture lands.

553. Minor forest areas and pasture lands are already, to a certain extent, under the control of the Land-revenue authorities, and we have had some evidence that in respect to such lands, their control ought to be complete.* We recommend the adoption of this course, as being in accord with the spirit of the Government of India Resolution of the 19th October, 1894, which distinguishes between these areas, and forests the retention of which is essential on climatic or physical grounds or as affording a valuable timber supply.

the bulk of the original work in the districts may be done locally by Sub-divisional officers and tahsildars, and that the position of the Collector shall be mainly that of a supervising, controlling and appellate authority. Under the full operation of this system in Madras, and owing to the absence of Commissioners, the position of the Collector in this Province is higher than it is elsewhere. We consider that the existence of Commissioners should not prevent the position of the Collector in other Provinces being raised, while we have already remarked that the establishment of territorial Commissioners in Madras should not lead to encroachment upon the existing powers of Collectors there. The development of the sub-divisional system in all Provinces will relieve Collectors of much detailed work which they now have to perform, and will thus give them time for the consideration of larger problems, and justify the grant to them of a variety of powers hitherto reserved to Commissioners or to higher authority.

In Chapter xv. again, we have made recommendations which will give to the Collector an assured position, and as a rule considerably larger powers, in such matters as remissions and suspensions of land revenue, agricultural loans and Court of Wards administration.

555. We have received a variety of specific suggestions in other matters, which we do not deal with in detail. Generally speaking, these are questions which must be decided according to local conditions, and regarding which the Local Governments must necessarily have large discretion. The general presumption should, however, be that, in matters which come up to him, the Collector should be the deciding authority; and this should be more especially the case in questions upon which his opinion would usually be decisive. We recognize that there are matters, financial and otherwise, in which Collectors cannot be given a free hand; but the general rule should be to give them powers whenever it is not clearly established that these must be reserved to a higher authority.

556. There are, however, some points on which we consider it desirable to offer specific suggestions.

Financial powers.—There is a considerable consensus of evidence, including suggestions by the Lieutenant-Governors of Bengal and the United Provinces, that Collectors should have at their disposal moderate grants for discretionary expenditure on matters such as petty public works, rewards to deserving persons, or small special grants for local objects. The proposals we have made in the preceding chapter will sufficiently meet this suggestion.

557. There is also much evidence in favour of giving Collectors funds from which they might employ temporary establishments to meet occasional press of work.

In Schedule II. we have suggested the expansion of the contract contingency system in Collectors' offices, and its extension to non-recurring expenditure on mechanical office assistance such as copying. The entertainment of temporary establishments for other clerical purposes might be met from discretionary grants which the Commissioners would distribute among the districts according to their needs. Within the limits of the grant thus allotted to him,

The general development of the sub-divisional system will relieve Collectors of much detailed work and justify the grant to them of powers hitherto reserved to higher authorities.

the Collector might appoint temporary clerks, provided that any appointment in excess of Rs. 25 a month, or lasting for more than six months, should require the sanction of superior authority. It is not desirable that the Collector should be able to create permanent clerical appointments, and speaking generally, this power has not been asked for.

Desirability of improving the procedure in Collectors' offices.

558. We had evidence in some Provinces as to the desirability of improving the procedure in Collectors' offices, and some witnesses were in favour of the more extensive employment of shorthand writers and typewriting facilities. We consider that where work in a district is so heavy as to justify the grant to a Collector of a shorthand writer, such assistance should be readily given, while typewriting machines and typists should now be regarded as essential office requisites. In the two Bengals an enquiry which has, we understand, been recently made into the working of district office system, has shown that considerable improvements in organization are possible, and the same condition of affairs would, we think, be found to apply, and to call for remedy, elsewhere.

Powers of the Collector over his office establishment.

560. Appointments.—In Bengal and Burma we understand that the Collector has full power with regard to all sanctioned appointments under his control.* The same applies to Madras, but the dismissal or reduction of the sherishtadar (the clerical head of the Collector's office) rests with the Board of Revenue. In other Provinces the general position is that the appointment of sherishtadar, and occasionally that of a head clerk or corresponding officer, lies with the Commissioner; but in the Central Provinces, the Commissioner's sanction is required to the appointment of all clerks on Rs. 25 and upwards. This latter restriction should certainly be withdrawn. As regards the appointment of sherishtadars and head clerks, opinion as to keeping the nomination to such posts in the hands of Commissioners is divided. There is much to be said in favour of allowing the Collector a free hand in the selection of his own office establishment: on the other hand there is the danger of prolonged tenure of office in a district making a sherishtadar too powerful there; and this can be remedied by giving the Commissioner the nomination, which will carry with it the power of transfer to another district. There is also the point that occasionally, as in Bombay, officers of this description are graded with the tahsildars. The respective power of Collectors and Commissioners in regard to sherishtadars and head clerks are, we think, for each Local Government to determine with reference to the circumstances of the Province.

The appointment and transfer of tahsildars and deputy tahsildars should be made by the Commissioner.

561. We have already recommended that the appointment of tahsildars and deputy tahsildars should be made by Commissioners. In the United Provinces, Collectors can transfer these officers within their districts, while in Madras, where there are no Commissioners and the Collector appoints, his power of transfer is limited by the fact that pay goes according to the taluk, and the moving of a tahsildar from a more to a less highly paid taluk would, therefore, ordinarily be a punitive measure, against which appeal would lie to the Board of Revenue. Elsewhere, the general position seems to be that Collectors have not power to transfer their tahsildars, and we are not prepared to recommend any change in this respect, in view of the fact that reference by the Collector to a higher authority acts as a check on frequent transfers.

562. Settlement.—In Assam a great deal of what is called settlement work, e.g., the assessment of lands not dealt with at a general land-revenue settlement, grant of assessed lands, and transfer of pattas (the raiyat's title deeds), is really the ordinary everyday work of a raiyatwari Province; but this is generally done in the first instance by settlement establishments consisting of sub-deputy collectors with kanungos and mandals working under them. These are under the double control of the Collector and the Director of Land Records, the latter having a voice in regard to their appointment, promotion, or punishment. This double system seems to us wrong, and we think that the Collector should have full control over such establishments. It is also unnecessary, as is at present done, to send up cases regarding "annulment of settlement," i.e. the realization of arrears by sale of the raiyat's occupancy right in land, for the Commissioner's sanction. The Sub-divisional officer might ordinarily deal with this matter.

Certain "settlement" establishments should be under the control of the Collector in Assam.

26870-1.

563. In the Central Provinces, revenue inspectors are appointed and transferred, even within a district, by the Director of Land Records who, in this Province, is also Commissioner of Settlements. Speaking generally, we think that district land-records establishments, and officers who are doing work in connexion with assessments outside a special settlement, should be regarded as integral members of the district staff; and in regard to such establishments the position of the Director of Land Records should be that of an inspecting and advisory, but not of a controlling, officer. The Collector should of course take due notice of any criticisms which the Director may have to offer as to the work or conduct of any individual officer.

District land records establishments, &c., should be integral portions of the Collector's staff.

564. In the Central Provinces, the United Provinces, and the Punjab, Settlement officers do not submit their reports through the Collector, though he may be informally consulted in the course of a settlement. Arguments adduced in favour of this practice were that the Settlement officer might be senior to the Collector, and that there might be several Collectors in a district during the course of a settlement. It seems to us that while the Collector cannot profitably deal with the technical minutiae of settlements, the main results of the settlement scheme, which vitally affect the landholders of the district, are matters upon which his opinion and criticism should be on record; and that the Settlement officer's preliminary proposals and final report in respect of assessments should be submitted through the Collector.

in matters affecting village officers, while the original decision should be that of the Sub-divisional officer. In Bombay matters relating to the dismissal of hereditary village officers, and the forfeiture of property attaching to the office, have now to go to the Local Government.

Appeals from the orders of Sub-divisional officers.

566. The delegation to Sub-divisional officers of a large amount of the original work, now done by Collectors in most Provinces, will render it easier to make the orders of the Collector on appeal in such cases final ; and we consider that when any appeal is made from the orders of a Sub-divisional officer, it should be to the Collector, and not, as now in some Provinces, direct to the Commissioner. We have, however, dealt with the general question of appeals in a subsequent chapter. We also deal separately with the question of making Collectors more fully fit for the larger position we propose for them, by eliminating incapable officers, and by reducing transfers and thus increasing local knowledge.

Evidence as to over-heavy districts. This matter is primarily for the consideration of the Provincial Governments.

567. We have received much evidence*, chiefly in Madras, the two Bengals, and the Central Provinces, to the effect that Collectors have larger charges than they can properly administer. A scheme for reducing the size of district and sub-district areas in Madras was under consideration when we took evidence ; and the Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces stated that the division of over-heavy districts there would be gradually undertaken as funds permitted. In other Provinces, the Local Governments, and most responsible officers under them, did not think that any general increase in the number of districts was at present required, although there were particular districts in which such a change was, or would shortly be, necessary. In view of the detailed local considerations involved, which we have not had an opportunity of examining, we are not prepared to express any opinion on this point, which is primarily one for the consideration of each Provincial Government.

Suggestions for giving Collectors Personal Assistants.

568. There was some evidence in favour of lightening the Collector's work by giving him a Personal Assistant, by which we mean an official of the standing of a Sub-divisional officer, but not in charge of any sub-division, who would be told off to assist the Collector in the general work of the district. This request was made by some officers in Burma, where matters are at present unduly centralized in the hands of the Deputy Commissioner, as is also the case in the Punjab, where a similar proposal was made by the Financial Commissioner. In Bengal and Eastern Bengal, where the principal sub-division of the district is in the hands of the Collector, and the revenue work of the other sub-divisions is largely concentrated at headquarters, the Collectors have been assisted by Joint Magistrates, but the complaint here was that the present number of such officers was too few. Some witnesses in the United Provinces also wished for an increase in the number of Joint Magistrates ; and some officers in Bombay proposed Personal Assistants for their Collectors.

569. In most Provinces the work of Collectors will be largely decreased by our proposals for an extension of the sub-divisional system, for making the Sub-divisional officer a Collector of first instance within his charge, and for giving Collectors final powers in a variety of matters upon which they have hitherto had to make references to higher authority. We shall also have occasion, in Part III., to recommend, as a general rule, the dissociation of Collectors from the chairmanship of municipalities. We do not therefore consider that the provision of Personal Assistants to Collectors will usually be necessary. There may, nevertheless, be cases in which temporary causes, such as famine, require the Collector to receive for a time the special assistance of an officer competent to discharge a large portion of his ordinary work; and the same may be the case in a district which has become normally too heavy for a single Collector, but in which circumstances do not permit, or are not yet ripe for, a reduction of the district area. In such instances the appointment of an experienced Personal Assistant to the Collector would be of distinct advantage.

570. We had a large amount of evidence in various Provinces as to the desirability of increasing the existing district staff; but as this was based upon present circumstances and methods, the necessity for such a course cannot be fully gauged until the effect of our proposals for decentralization has been considered. At the same time we are satisfied that in any case an increase in the cadres is of primary importance in several Provinces, and we think that the Indian Governments should take this question up without delay.

CHAPTER XIV.

SUB-DIVISIONAL, AND OTHER SUBORDINATE DISTRICT, OFFICERS

Sub-divisional Officers.

571. A Sub-divisional officer may be either an Indian Civilian (or officer of like standing), or an officer of the 'Provincial' service (a Deputy Collector or an Extra Assistant Commissioner).

31.

Bd's. S. O.,
No. 126.
Ibid
No. 148.

572. In Madras every district is parcelled out into sub-divisions, each Sub-divisional officer residing permanently within his charge, the limits of which can only be altered by Government. Subject to certain specific restrictions and limitations, he exercises within his charge the ordinary powers of a Collector in revenue matters, the District Collector acting as a supervising, controlling and appellate authority. Thus the tahsildars' work is, for nearly all purposes, under the Sub-divisional officer, and appeals from their orders go to him. The Sub-divisional officer can appoint menial servants such as peons, and junior clerks up to Rs. 30 a month*, and he has power in regard to the appointment, punishment and suspension of village officers. As a magistrate, he is responsible for the criminal work in his sub-division, and ordinarily exercises first class powers himself, and hears appeals against the decisions of second and third class magistrates.

divisional system :—
(a) In Madras.

* Sub-Collectors—the highest grade of Civilian Assistants to the Collector—have somewhat higher powers in this respect than other Sub-divisional officers.

In short, the essential feature of the Madras system is that each sub-division is treated as a miniature district, and the Sub-divisional officer as the subordinate Collector thereof; and the raiyats, though allowed to appeal to the Collector, are taught to regard the Sub-divisional officer as the authority who will inquire into their complaints, and grant them redress. Madras Regulation VII. of 1828 gives to the Sub-divisional officer the general powers of a Collector within his charge, so that no specific delegation is required in such matters; and it is only where the term "District Collector" is used in subsequent Acts that the Collector's legal powers do not pass on automatically to the Sub-divisional officer.

Bd.'s S.O.
No. 116.

(b) In Bombay.

573. In Bombay proper sub-divisional charges are not rigidly fixed, but can be altered for revenue purposes at the Collector's discretion*, and the Sub-divisional officer does not permanently reside within his sub-division. He spends seven months of the year on tour there, but resides during the remaining period at the district headquarters. In Sind sub-divisional charges are permanently fixed, and the Sub-divisional officer has a house within his charge where he resides for two or three months in the year.

32256-8.

A Civilian Sub-divisional officer usually takes criminal appeals from second and third class subordinate magistrates, but the grant of such powers to Deputy Collectors is, we understand, less a matter of course. In revenue matters the law, as in Madras, contemplates the exercise of the Collector's powers by Sub-divisional officers where these have not been specifically reserved; but it would seem that certain matters of local revenue administration are, by order or practice, kept in the Collector's hands. The Bombay Sub-divisional officers have also less power than their confrères of Madras in regard to such matters as village establishments, for in Bombay the removal of hereditary village officers (and they are mainly hereditary in the Deccan) requires the sanction of the Local Government; nor do they seem to have any powers of appointment in regard to their own establishments, or to be able to transfer clerks from one taluk office to another.

(c) In Bengal.

574. In Bengal, too, there is a definite sub-divisional system. The headquarters sub-division, which is usually the largest in the district, is, however, in the Collector's own charge. Sub-divisional officers live in their sub-divisions, and, as in Madras, these can only be altered by the Local Government; but in the greater part of the Province there is not the same detailed revenue work as exists in temporarily settled areas. A large number of criminal cases which, in Madras or Bombay, would go to lower officers are here dealt with by the Sub-divisional officer, while appeals from the decisions of subordinate magistrates go to the Collector as Magistrate of the district. Nor is there anything corresponding to the tahsils or taluks of other Provinces. The only administrative unit within the sub-division is the police thana, and although there are sub-deputy collectors, corresponding to tahsildars elsewhere, these are employed in criminal or revenue work at the headquarters of the subdivision or district.†

The revenue work done by the Sub-divisional officers varies according to the circumstances of each district, and its delegation to them is largely at the discretion of the Collector, while matters relating to the realization of land revenue and cesses, and the greater part of the work connected with excise and income tax, are disposed of, under the Collector, at the district headquarters, by Deputy Collectors placed in special charge of these subjects.* In some districts there is also a Joint Magistrate at headquarters (a member of the Indian Civil Service), who takes charge of the Collector's office work while the latter is on tour, and at other times deals with such branches of work, magisterial or revenue, as the Collector may assign to him.

575. The position in Eastern Bengal is the same as in Bengal proper; but in Assam there are the following points of difference :—

(d) In Eastern Bengal and Assam.

24222-3.

(i.) Sub-deputy collectors have been recently appointed, in some districts, to revenue charge of areas within the sub-divisions, which are styled "circles."

(ii.) The general revenue work is more largely discharged within the sub-division by the Sub-divisional officer.

(iii.) In most districts, district officers deal with civil suits also, the Sub-divisional officers being district munsiffs, and Deputy Commissioners Subordinate Judges.

Vol. VII.,
App. I.,
p. 158.

576. In the United Provinces, where the districts are small, the main sub-district unit is the tahsil, which is also a smaller area than in other Provinces. The sub-divisional system is in force, but, with few exceptions, the Sub-divisional officer lives at the district headquarters, and the Collector can vary the area of sub-divisional charges, and change their officers, at his discretion. The Sub-divisional officer is not concerned with the realization of land revenue; but has powers in other land revenue matters, and in regard to income tax and excise. He tries rent and revenue cases, and supervises records and village accounts. As regards revenue functions, however, the Sub-divisional staff are distinguished as first, second and third class officers according to length of service, and the two latter classes have materially less powers than the first. In certain cases appeals against the decisions of first-class Sub-divisional officers go to the Commissioner, or to the District Judge, and not to the Collector.

With few exceptions, and these apparently in the areas in which the Sub-divisional officer is resident in his charge, all appeals from subordinate magistrates go to the District Magistrate; and tahsildars, except where considered fit to be Deputy Collectors, have as a rule only third-class magisterial powers, with the result that much petty criminal work must fall on the Sub-divisional officer.

577. In the Punjab, some thirteen districts each contain a single outlying sub-division, where the Sub-divisional officer resides and exercises general local functions; but even here his powers depend largely upon the confidence which the Deputy Commissioner chooses to repose in him. Elsewhere the Deputy Commissioner deals directly with the tahsildars, and his Assistant and

* The execution of "certificates," i.e., processes for the compulsory realization of cesses and other Government demands, is, however, not infrequently carried out in the sub-divisions.

Extra Assistant Commissioners are employed at headquarters on subjects-work. Thus one would be District Judge with general magisterial powers*; another would be in charge of the district treasury; another revenue Extra Assistant Commissioner; while others might do case work, revenue or criminal.

A good deal of civil case work is still disposed of here by tahsildars and Extra Assistant Commissioners.

(g) In Burma.

578. Districts in Burma, with two exceptions, are split up into sub-divisions, and we understand that the Sub-divisional officers reside in their charges. They do not, however, deal with criminal appeals, which go to the District Magistrate; and in regard to revenue matters they appear to have very little power, one witness describing them as post offices. They take revenue cases, but appeals from the decisions of myooks (tahsildars) go to the Deputy Commissioner, and Sub-divisional officers are likewise unable to revise the orders of village headmen. Their very restricted powers appear to be due, in part, to a former system under which the grade of Extra Assistant Commissioner was attained by seniority, and myooks might be promoted thereto while remaining in charge of townships (corresponding to the tahsils of other Provinces), while a sub-division might be in charge of a myook. Myooks are now, however, only promoted to be Extra Assistant Commissioners when regarded as fit for sub-divisional charge. It is alleged that Deputy Commissioners are largely overworked, and two Commissioners (Mr. Todd-Naylor and Major Maxwell) recently reported on the possibility of relieving them. The recommendations of these officers were, however, more in the direction of providing Deputy Commissioners with Personal Assistants, and of freeing them from detailed treasury and record inspections, than of fuller utilization of the Sub-divisional officers.

In Upper Burma and, apparently, in some places in Lower Burma also, the executive district staff is still concerned with civil suits.

(h) In the Central Provinces.

579. In the Central Provinces proper the sub-divisional system has only recently been introduced; the tahsils are large, and in most instances a Sub-divisional officer is in charge of one tahsil only. As in the United Provinces, Sub-divisional officers live at the headquarters of the district; and where a Sub-divisional officer has been invested by the Local Government with powers to exercise the ordinary functions of a Deputy Commissioner within his charge, appeals from his decisions go straight to the Commissioner. Tahsildars have few original powers in revenue matters, and are, as a rule, merely reporting officers, while, where they have definite powers, appeals from their orders go to the Deputy Commissioner.

Appellate magisterial work is usually dealt with by the District Magistrate; but in some cases Sub-divisional officers are empowered to hear appeals within their charges.

In Berar there are three sub-divisions in which the Sub-divisional officer is permanently resident: in these he has larger powers than elsewhere, and takes appeals from subordinate magistrates. Outside these special areas, the Sub-divisional officer deals only with revenue work, and with such magisterial work as the Deputy Commissioner may assign to him, and he resides at the district headquarters. Revenue appeals from Sub-divisional officers go to the Deputy Commissioner.

38781-91, 38913-6. 580. In the Frontier Province there are some sub-divisions, but in only one of these—Mardan—has the Sub-divisional officer the position of a subordinate Collector in revenue matters. Elsewhere the Sub-divisional officers do case work—civil and criminal, as well as revenue—but in respect to the executive revenue work, such as collection, crop inspection, etc., the tahsildar acts mainly in direct subordination to the Deputy Commissioner, who has an assistant for revenue purposes at headquarters. Except in the case of Mardan, the Sub-divisional officers do not take criminal appeals, which are dealt with by the District Magistrate or the District Judge (whose position is the same as in the Punjab). Tahsildars also do civil work. (i) In the Frontier Province.

38811. 38813. 38810. 581. In Baluchistan the district system is fairly decentralized. One or more tahsils are constituted into a sub-division, which is the charge of a Political officer or an Extra Assistant Commissioner. The Sub-divisional officers live generally in their charges, and exercise the local powers of a Collector. There are two full-time district munsiffs, at Quetta and Sibi; otherwise the district officers, from tahsildars and deputy tahsildars up to Political Agents, exercise civil judicial functions. (j) In Baluchistan.

Vol. IX., App. I., p. 216.

37695-6.

582. The powers of Sub-divisional officers in reference to remission and suspension of land revenue will be discussed in the following chapter, and their position in relation to local boards in Part III.

We have here to consider the following questions:—
(i.) Should there be a sub-divisional system where this has not hitherto applied, i.e., in the greater part of the Punjab and of the Frontier Province?

38916-8, 39552-3, 39652-5, 39682-6, 40335, 42334.

The evidence was generally in favour of such a course, and we are emphatically of opinion that the sub-divisional system ought to be universally applied, as bringing the executive officers of Government into more immediate local contact with the people, and as the most obvious instrument of efficient decentralization. We think that the increased capacity and integrity of the members of the 'Provincial' services fully justify the greater trust in them which the extension of the sub-divisional system involves. For the Civilian, again, who will subsequently become a Collector, the charge of a sub-division is a far better training than dealing, at headquarters, merely with such branches of work as the Collector may assign to him.

The sub-divisional system ought to be universally applied.

14994, 15172-3, 17911, 18468, 19731, 19940-2, 20231, 20417, 23649, Vol. V., App. II., p. 205.

583. It follows that we do not approve of the existing system in the two Bengals, under which the largest sub-division of the district is the direct charge of the Collector. The evidence in these two Provinces is practically unanimous in favour of separate Sub-divisional officers for these areas; and we understand that the Local Governments intend to carry out this change as soon as possible.

Separate Sub-divisional officers should be provided for the headquarters sub-divisions in the two Bengals.

584. (ii.) Should the Sub-divisional officer, as in Madras and in Bombay, be practically a Collector of first instance, having the tahsildars under him, and dealing himself with revenue matters affecting the sub-division which they cannot dispose of?

Difficulty of decentralizing the land-revenue work in the two Bengals. This must be left to the discretion of the Local Governments. In other revenue matters, powers should be delegated as far as possible to Sub-divisional officers.

Taking first the two Bengals, there is a considerable amount of evidence in favour of increasing the powers of Sub-divisional officers in revenue matters. On the other hand, a number of experienced witnesses,* while admitting, in some instances, the theoretical desirability of such a change, were opposed to decentralization, especially as regards work in connexion with the realization of land revenue now conducted at district headquarters. It was said that this involves little labour in a permanently settled Province, and is best done at headquarters, where all the records are kept. The present system is also said to be popular with zemindars whose properties extend to more than one sub-division, and who prefer to keep a single representative for such business at the district headquarters. A change in the present system would further involve much work and expense in connexion with the redistribution of records. On the other hand, it was stated to us by both members of the Board of Revenue in Bengal that the small proprietors of Behar would prefer such realization work to be conducted at a centre nearer to them than the district headquarters, while the Bengal system does not give Civilian officers the same degree of revenue training and experience as that of Madras and Bombay.

We recognize the difficulty of decentralizing land revenue work in these permanently settled Provinces, and do not make any recommendation upon this point, which we would leave to the discretion of the Local Governments concerned. In other revenue matters, however, we consider that the powers of the Collector should be delegated, as far as possible, to Sub-divisional officers. The proposed separation of judicial and revenue duties in these two Provinces will give the executive Sub-divisional officers time and scope for the exercise of larger revenue functions than they at present possess.

Elsewhere petty matters should be disposed of by the tahsildar, and other original matters should usually be dealt with by the Sub-divisional officer, the Collector being mainly an appellate and supervising authority.

585. In other Provinces, we think the general position should be that petty matters, in regard to which his recommendations must in practice generally be accepted, should be disposed of by the tahsildar, subject to appeal to, and control by, the Sub-divisional officer; and that other original cases arising in the sub-division should usually be dealt with by the Sub-divisional officer, the Collector being mainly an appellate and supervising authority who need rarely take up original revenue work. The tahsildar would then be under the Sub-divisional officer, and the latter under the Collector; and the Sub-divisional officer and the tahsildar should be made to feel as fully responsible for the good administration of their charges as the Collector is for that of the whole district.

586. The general trend of the evidence, and of the detailed proposals contained in schedules of suggested delegations presented by Local Governments, is in favour of giving larger powers to Sub-divisional officers. Even in Madras, where the sub-divisional system has been most developed, witnesses have indicated cases in which the powers of these officers seem at present to be unduly restricted. The same conclusion may be gleaned from various proposals contained in Appendix v. of the Bombay Government's Statement; and it applies with much greater force to the other Provinces. We do not, however, think it incumbent upon us to examine the detailed suggestions made. Circumstances must vary in the different Provinces; but the general principle to be applied should, in our opinion, be as stated in the last paragraph.

587. Speaking generally, exceptions to the rule that the Sub-divisional officer should be competent to deal with original revenue work in his sub-division, which the tahsildars cannot dispose of, would arise :—

Exceptions to the general principle that the Sub-divisional officer should deal with revenue work of which the tahsildar cannot dispose.

Vide Chap.
XV.

(1.) Where the Local Government thinks it desirable, on grounds of policy or expediency, that particular matters should be dealt with by the head of the district. This would ordinarily be the case in financial matters, and we have ourselves recognized the desirability of such restrictions in the case of suspensions and remissions of land revenue, and the grant of agricultural loans.

(2.) At the discretion of the Collector, in regard to :—

(a) Matters in which special circumstances seem to require that the decision shall for a time be that of the Collector himself. Orders of this character should, however, be reported to the Commissioner, who will thus have an opportunity of checking any unduly centralizing tendency on the part of particular Collectors.

(b) The withholding of powers from particular Sub-divisional officers, on the ground of want of experience or because an officer falls short of the general standard of efficiency required for full sub-divisional charge. But such withholding of powers should likewise be reported to the Commissioner, who will thus be able to call for an explanation if he thinks this necessary.

The withdrawal from a Sub-divisional officer, of powers which he has already exercised, save temporarily, and in special circumstances such as those referred to in clause (a) above, is a different matter, involving a reflexion on the officer's work, and in this case the previous sanction of the Commissioner should be obtained.

These proposals would meet the views of those witnesses who are in favour of differentiation between particular Sub-divisional officers, and of giving the Collector discretion in the matter of delegation.

588. It follows from what we have said above that we disapprove of the system, which prevails in some Provinces, under which appeals from the decisions of a revenue officer do not go to the authority immediately above him, but to some higher official. Thus in Burma, the Deputy Commissioner takes appeals from the orders of *myooks, and in the United and Central Provinces, appeals from Sub-divisional officers who have been vested with the powers of a Collector go to the Commissioner. In the Central Provinces the evidence was generally in favour of the change we advocate, while those witnesses who objected to it in the United Provinces† did so principally on the ground, which we consider inadequate, that it would overburden the Collector to take up such work. The proposals which we have made in the direction of decentralization, and especially for the grant of larger powers to Sub-divisional officers, should materially reduce the present work of the Collector; and it seems to is essential, both as regards the maintenance of proper discipline, and in order to enable the Collector to gauge the work of his subordinates, that appeals from their decisions should be to him.

Powers of Sub-divisional officers in respect of official staff.

589. We think that, subject to general control by (and appeal to) the Collector, the Sub-divisional officer should deal with the appointment and removal of all village officers and junior clerks in his sub-division. As regards clerks, the exact salary limit to be adopted must necessarily vary in different Provinces. At present Sub-divisional officers have, in some Provinces, no powers of appointment and punishment in respect of clerks, while in Bombay the removal of hereditary village officers requires the sanction of the Local Government. The exercise by Sub-divisional officers of the right of appointment, should, of course, be subject to such general standards of efficiency, educational or otherwise, as may be prescribed.

590. (iii.) Should Sub-divisional officers be vested with powers to hear appeals in criminal cases from second and third-class magistrates in their sub-divisions?

Sub-divisional officers should dispose of criminal appeals.

We think that an officer competent to hold charge of a sub-division should also be generally competent, after he has had some preliminary experience as a first-class magistrate, to hear appeals. We consider, too, that he should discharge this function, as Sub-divisional officers now do in Madras and Bombay, for the reasons we have given in regard to the hearing of revenue appeals. The general evidence, though it is mainly official, indicates no material objection to the general application of this principle.

There is no doubt a distinction between revenue and criminal appeals, in that the latter affect the liberty of the subject; but this is recognized by the fact that the Criminal Procedure Code requires special investment, by the Local Government, of officers below the rank of District Magistrate with appellate powers, and a direction from the District Magistrate that such officers shall hear appeals. Under our proposals, investment with such powers will pass to the Commissioner, in consultation with the District Judge, but the District Magistrate will still have to justify to the Commissioner the grant of powers to Sub-divisional officers.†

591. (iv.) Should Sub-divisional officers reside permanently within their charges?

Arguments for and against permanent residence of Sub-divisional officers within their charges.

The advantages of such permanent residence are that the Sub-divisional officer is brought into more constant and immediate touch with the public and with his own subordinates; that parties to cases, and persons who desire to have access to him, have not to travel to the headquarters of the district, when he is not on tour; and that he acquires a keener sense of responsibility than when

* Sir S. Edgerley dissents as to empowering Sub-divisional officers to appoint clerks, holding that the revenue establishment must be one for the whole district, and that this patronage is therefore best in the hands of the Collector.

Sir F. Lely dissents as to empowering tahsildars to appoint peons.

† Mr. Dutt considers that Sub-divisional officers are, generally speaking, not qualified to be final appellate courts, and that criminal appeals do not add largely to the work of the District Magistrate. To invest Sub-divisional officers generally with appellate powers would, he thinks, endanger the administration of justice and create alarm among the people.

living at headquarters with the Collector. In short, if the Sub-divisional officer is to be regarded as a Collector of first instance, it follows that he should usually reside within his charge.

On the other side, it may be urged that so isolated a life is prejudicial to the Sub-divisional officers, more especially in the case of Europeans, and that where districts are small, as in the United Provinces, there is no real hardship to the people in coming to the district headquarters, which are in some cases easier of access. Further, that it is advantageous, both for their personal training and for the administration of their charges, that Sub-divisional officers should, for a portion of the year, be in close touch with the other principal officials of the district.

In the Provinces in which Sub-divisional officers have not now, as a rule, separate headquarters, evidence* is divided as to the expediency of a change of system; but non-official opinion was mainly in favour of residence in the sub-division. In our opinion it is of primary importance that the Sub-divisional officer should generally be resident in his sub-division; but we see no objection, particularly where districts are small, to his living at the headquarters of the district for some portion of the year, should the Local Government consider this to be expedient. We are not in favour of any system under which an officer is continually changing camp during the time that he spends in his sub-division. A certain period of such touring is of course necessary, but there should also be times at which the Sub-divisional officer will be accessible at some fixed place in his own charge.

The Sub-divisional officer should generally be resident in his sub-division.

592. (v.) By whom should the areas of sub-divisional charges be fixed and altered?

Taking the Provinces in which such charges are at present altered for revenue purposes at the Collector's discretion, the bulk of the evidence in the United Provinces was against change in this respect, while in Bombay opinion was divided. It seems to us, however, essential that if the sub-division is (as we desire) to become a real administrative entity, its area should be fixed and altered only by the Local Government, as is already the case in respect to magisterial sub-divisions. Moreover, so long as revenue officers exercise magisterial powers, the revenue and magisterial sub-divisions should usually be contemporaneous.

Sub-divisions should be fixed and altered by the Local Government only.

593. (vi.) Who should post Sub-divisional officers to their charges?

Para. 515.

32258,
29355.

The posting of Sub-divisional officers to particular districts is now ordinarily carried out by the Local Government, but it should, as we have already recommended, be left to the Commissioner. The same authority should also, we think, post officers to particular sub-divisional charges within the districts. In Bombay and the United Provinces such action is now left to the Collector, but reference to a higher authority is desirable, as a check on too frequent transfers, and to emphasize the importance of the sub-division as a vital administrative unit.

Posting of Sub-divisional officers should rest with the Commissioner.

Where revenue officers now dispose of civil suits they should be relieved of this duty.

594. Civil suits.—As already indicated, there are certain Provinces in which Collectors, Sub-divisional officers and tahsildars are at present concerned with the disposal of civil suits. We think that they should be relieved of this work as soon as circumstances permit.

Tahsildars, etc.

In matters in which the tahsildar's opinion must in practice be usually accepted, he should be the disposing authority.

595. The position of tahsildars varies considerably in different Provinces.* They are, of necessity, the usual reporting officers in revenue matters occurring within their tahsils, and in the Central Provinces they are ordinarily limited to this function. Elsewhere they have some original powers, but there is evidence that these are not sufficient. The position should be, as already indicated, that in revenue matters in which the tahsildar's opinion must in practice be usually accepted, he should ordinarily be the disposing authority, subject to appeal to the Sub-divisional officer. We do not think it possible to go further into details: each Local Government should settle the tahsildar's jurisdiction for itself upon that general basis. This policy is justified by the very considerable improvement in the morale of tahsildars, which education, and a more enlightened public opinion, have brought about during the last generation.

Exceptions to above principle.

596. We do not, however, propose that tahsildars should have financial powers, save as suggested in Chapter xv. in the matter of loans to agriculturists; nor would we give them the power of appointing village officers, or of filling vacancies in their own establishments other than those arising in menial posts. Though the tahsildar's recommendations on these points must necessarily carry great weight, we think that the final responsibility should here rest with a higher authority.

Magisterial powers of tahsildars.

597. Tahsildars usually have magisterial powers of the second class, save in the United Provinces where the majority have third class powers only, while in Bombay and Burma some of them are invested with first class powers. In Madras, tahsildars as a class do not try many criminal cases, this work being disposed of by separate sub-magistrates in most taluks. We think that, as a general rule, tahsildars who discharge criminal functions should have second class powers as soon as they have proved their fitness as third class magistrates. There will also be cases where an experienced and competent tahsildar may expediently be invested with the original powers of a first class magistrate.

Large and various duties of tahsildars.

598. The tahsildar may be described as the non-commissioned officer of the administration. He is the person in closest contact with the people, and to him the Collector and the Sub-divisional officer on the one hand, and the raiyats on the other, look most for information. The tahsildar, again, is not merely responsible for revenue and criminal work; he usually takes a large share in the deliberations of rural boards and municipalities, and in the carrying out of their resolutions; and he is largely utilized in the service of special departments, e.g., those dealing with land records and excise. It is, therefore, essential that he should have time for touring through his charge, and for the adequate performance of the many and various functions which fall upon him.

Evidence received in different Provinces leads us to believe that, in many cases, tahsildars are now overworked, and we consider that where this is so steps should be taken to reduce their burdens. In so far as they cannot be adequately relieved by the grant to them of more final powers, by the transfer of criminal case work to separate magistrates of proper standing, or by the delegation of some of their functions to deputy tahsildars, the necessary remedy is a reduction in the size of the heaviest tahsils.

Steps necessary to relieve over-worked tahsildars.

599. One way of relieving the tahsildar without splitting up the tahsils is to increase the number of naib (or deputy) tahsildars, and to place these officers in subordinate charge of portions of large tahsils, while there might also be a deputy (who, as now in Madras, would be mostly concerned with magisterial work) as an assistant at the tahsil headquarters, who could take the tahsildar's place for treasury and routine work while he is on tour. We consider that naib tahsildars should have definite powers of their own, and should not be merely head clerks to the tahsildar.

Proposed larger utilization of deputy tahsildars.

In vesting naib tahsildars with magisterial powers, care should be taken not to devolve these responsible functions upon men whose pay is insufficient, or whose morale is indifferent; and magisterial work should not be given to anyone below the rank of deputy tahsildar, or drawing less than the pay usually assigned to such officers.

600. The method of recruitment of tahsildars and deputy tahsildars varies in different Provinces. The two extremes are represented by Madras, where these officers, as a rule, begin their careers as clerks on Rs. 15 or Rs. 20 a month, and the United Provinces, where they are separately recruited and the clerical staff is not eligible. The members of Council in Madras admitted that their system was defective, as tending to imbue the tahsildar with habits of corruption in his early years; and it may be added that it makes men tahsildars at an age when they have not many more years of full energy before them. We agree with the Madras members of Council that the 'Subordinate' service should be divided into an upper and a lower class, and that the former, which would include tahsildars and deputy tahsildars, should be separately recruited from young men of good family and character and superior educational attainments. We would not, however, preclude the promotion of specially deserving men from the lower class. Such action would be analogous to that taken, on the advice of the Police Commission, in respect to sub-inspectors of police. Men directly selected to be tahsildars and naib tahsildars should not, of course, be placed in charge of such posts without a period of preliminary apprenticeship in the work they will have to do.

Unsatisfactory

601. In Bengal and Eastern Bengal we were much struck by the fact that, owing to the absence there of charges corresponding to the tahsils of other Provinces, the direct contact of the administration with the people is mainly through the police. The unsatisfactory character of this situation was generally admitted, and the remedies suggested were—

We prefer the latter course as less expensive, and as affording larger scope for the energies of the 'Subordinate' service. Some witnesses doubted whether sufficient local duties could be delegated to sub-deputy collectors, and whether the exercise of criminal powers by men of this class was desirable. In view, however, of the fact that their magisterial powers would not ordinarily go beyond the second class, and of the evidence as to the general improvement of the 'Subordinate' service as a whole, we think that the system we have suggested might advantageously be tried. There will, further, be a wide scope for the utilization of these officers in the development of village organization, to which we refer in a subsequent chapter, and in the conduct of many miscellaneous enquiries which are, at present, most undesirably entrusted to the police.

Honorary magistrates, etc.

The system of appointing honorary magistrates should be extended as far as possible.

602. The Criminal Procedure Code recognizes benches of magistrates who sit collectively for the disposal of cases, and may be vested with first, second or third class powers according to circumstances. Benches of this class exist in all the major Provinces, and sit, generally, at district or subdivisional headquarters, or in the larger municipal towns. Their members are, as a rule, non-officials, but in some places they are presided over by a local stipendiary magistrate, and their powers do not usually extend beyond the second class. In most Provinces persons of standing are also appointed honorary magistrates to dispose singly of cases, and some of these have first class powers. In the Punjab, and, we understand, in Bombay also, men of position are occasionally given honorary jurisdiction in civil suits, while the Lieutenant Governor of the United Provinces informed us that he had under consideration the appointment of honorary Assistant Collectors to deal with rent cases.

We think that the system of appointing non-official gentlemen of position and influence to deal with criminal cases which would otherwise come before the stipendiary courts should be extended as far as possible, both as a means of relieving these courts, and in order to associate the local gentry with the administration. We shall deal in a subsequent chapter with local jurisdiction in the villages in regard to petty litigation, and under the proposals there made, it will probably not be necessary to resort largely to the appointment of honorary district munsiffs, or persons who would similarly take over the case work of the ordinary civil courts.

SUSPENSIONS AND REMISSIONS OF LAND REVENUE, AGRICULTURAL LOANS, ACQUISITION OF LAND FOR ADMINISTRATION.

Para. 258.

603. We have already noticed that Local Governments have been left a practically free hand by the Government of India in the prescription of the kists, or dates of instalments in which the land revenue demand shall be paid. This power is exercised either by the Local Government itself—as in Bombay, Lower Burma, the Central Provinces, and Assam*; or by the Board of Revenue or Financial Commissioner—as in Madras, Bengal, Eastern Bengal, Upper Burma, the United Provinces and the Punjab†. The considerations which should be taken into account in fixing such instalments were summarized by the Famine Commission of 1878–80, and are briefly, that the Government demand should, so far as practicable, be so fixed as to allow sufficient time for the principal crops to be harvested and sold.

In view of the large financial interests involved, we do not consider that the general determination of these instalments should rest with any authority lower than a Board of Revenue or Financial Commissioner. We notice, however, that in Bombay, while the Local Government fixes kists for classes of villages in certain tracts according to the general character of the crops grown, the actual grouping of villages within such classes is made by the Collector with the sanction of the Commissioner, and he may also, subject to the same sanction, alter the dates of payment where they are found unsuitable‡. It was the intention of the Government of India that the circumstances of individual villages should not be lost sight of in the general treatment of larger tracts, and we consider that the Bombay provisions allow a useful elasticity which might be advantageous elsewhere.

604. We do not consider it necessary to pronounce upon the few suggestions which have been made to us for the alteration of specific kists in particular tracts.

Suspensions and remissions of Land Revenue.

Para. 256.

605. Subject to general principles prescribed by the Government of India in 1905, Local Governments have a wide discretion in mitigating the pressure of the land revenue demand in times of calamity, by the suspension or postponement of collections, or by the absolute remission of the sums due. The orders of 1905, while discriminating between widespread calamities such as famine, and local destruction of crops, as by hailstorms or floods, laid down a normal proportion between the extent of the damage done and the degree of relief to be given; and, while directing that suspension should ordinarily precede remission, provided for the automatic remission of revenue arrears which had been under suspension for more than three years, or which exceeded one year's ordinary demand.

Powers of Collectors, etc., in regard to suspensions of land revenue.

606. The detailed rules framed by Local Governments on these general lines exhibit some variations in the powers of sanction of different authorities. Proposals for the suspension of revenue ordinarily originate with the Collector; but in Madras, in Bengal and Eastern Bengal (in temporarily settled and Government estates), in Assam and in the Central Provinces proper, it is only in urgent cases that he is permitted to take action in anticipation of orders. Otherwise the sanctioning authority is, in Madras, the Board of Revenue for suspension within the current revenue year, and the Local Government beyond this; in Bengal and Eastern Bengal, the Commissioner within the current year, and the Board of Revenue beyond this*; in Assam, the Board of Revenue†; in the Central Provinces, the Commissioner, subject to the confirmation of the Local Government.‡ In Bombay and the Punjab, the Collector reports his orders to the Commissioner, whose control is, in the latter Province, strictly insisted upon§. In the United Provinces the position is complicated by legal provision that a suspension of revenue in favour of a landholder, which is to carry corresponding relief to the tenantry in the shape of suspension of rent, must be granted by the Local Government. The Collector can, however, grant a "postponement" of the revenue demands up to six months, and the Commissioner for a further period of one year. In Burma suspensions of revenue are, we understand, practically unknown.

And in regard to remissions.

607. Apart from special "seasonal" remissions in Madras and Burma, which will be dealt with separately, remissions of land revenue require the sanction of the Local Government in Madras, the United Provinces and the Central Provinces. In Bengal and Eastern Bengal the sanction of the Board of Revenue is necessary. In Assam a Commissioner may sanction remissions up to Rs. 2,000 in the case of each calamity, and in the Punjab up to a limit of Rs. 10,000 per harvest in each district, in the case of revenue which has been outstanding for more than three years, and of Rs. 5,000 in other instances||; while in Burma his powers extend to Rs. 500 in any one case. Otherwise the orders of the Board of Revenue or Financial Commissioner are required in these Provinces. In Bombay, Collectors can act within a prescribed scale, outside which the sanction of the Local Government is necessary¶; and they have some minor powers of remission in Assam and Burma.

remit land revenue upon his sole responsibility. The Commissioner usually has some powers of suspension and, in some Provinces, of remission also; but generally the approval of the Board of Revenue or Financial Commissioner, or of the Local Government, is required to final abandonment of revenue if of considerable amount.

We have received a considerable amount of evidence* in favour of extending the powers of Collectors and Commissioners in these respects, though some witnesses† doubt the desirability of giving Collectors any powers of remission.

609. Now that general principles have been laid down prescribing the amount of relief from the ordinary demand which shall follow upon different proportions of crop losses, and the method of its calculation, we consider that delegation of powers of suspension and remission, in temporarily settled areas, might be made in accordance with the suggestions below, it being understood that such remission or suspension is in accord with the general scale of relief allowed in the Province.

Our proposals for powers to Commissioners and Collectors in these respects.

Suspension of revenue.—The Government of India Resolution of 25th March, 1905, contemplated suspensions being given by the Collector or the Commissioner, and in accordance with the principle that power should be placed as low down as is practicable, we should prefer the Collector as the suspending authority. On the other hand, the precise degree of loss which crops have sustained is often difficult to estimate; suspension of revenue over large areas will be of considerable financial importance; and a Collector, affected by the pressure of local sentiment, might sometimes take a too impulsive view of the character of a calamity, while a colleague in the district adjoining might conceivably be proceeding on more rigid principles. The co-ordination, and the more mature judgment, of the Commissioner would, we think, be eminently useful in such cases. While recognizing that the precise limits of the spheres of these two officers are for Local Governments to determine, we think that where suspensions of land revenue are on a large scale, opportunity should be given to the Commissioner to revise the orders passed by the Collector where he thinks such a course necessary. This object might be attained by making the orders of the Collector in such a case provisional only, pending their confirmation by the Commissioner. The Commissioner's decision in suspension questions should, in any case, be final, but action involving large sums should be promptly reported to higher authority for information.

Remission of revenue.—(a.) In widespread calamities, Commissioners should have powers in all but exceptional cases, the precise limits being determined by Local Governments, with reference to the circumstances of each Province. Collectors should have power to act in cases in which the rules provide for the automatic conversion of suspensions into remissions.

(b.) In the case of local calamities, where remission must be determined by detailed inspection, Commissioners should have full powers, while Collectors should be able to deal finally and promptly with cases of acute distress in small holdings.

The 'total amounts' remitted in the exercise of these powers should be periodically reported to a higher authority.

Suspensions or remissions in permanently settled tracts.

610. The Government demand on estates under permanent settlement is far lighter, as a rule, than under a system of temporary settlement, and here suspension or remission of revenue should seldom be necessary. Such proposals should therefore require the sanction of some authority at headquarters, but this might very well be the Board of Revenue, so long as one exists, and not the Local Government, as is at present the case in Bengal.

Sub-divisional officers should not ordinarily suspend or remit land revenue.

611. There was very little evidence in favour of giving Sub divisional officers powers to suspend or remit revenue; and, apart from the special powers they already possess in Madras and Burma, which are noted below, we do not consider such a step necessary.

Desirability of giving Collectors power of remission in respect to "dry" crops in Madras. *

612. In addition to the rules providing for the alleviation of the revenue demand in special calamities, there are, in some Provinces, provisions which constitute, in effect, an integral part of the settlement procedure, and which result in adjustment of the revenue payable to the character of the crop grown in a particular season.

Thus in Madras, under the "season remission rules," remissions are allowed on fields classed as "wet" (irrigated from a Government source), when there has been a practically complete loss of crop not due to the fault of the occupant, or where, owing to the failure of the water supply, "dry" (rain fed) crops have had to be substituted for the usual wet cultivation. These remissions are determined when the jamabandi, or annual settlement of the Government demand, is carried out for each taluk by the Collector or the Sub-divisional officer, and are excluded from the realizable demand of the year.* But in respect of such remissions on "dry" lands, reference has to be made to the Board of Revenue, on the ground that vicissitudes of season are taken into consideration in the assessment of such lands, and that any further remission should therefore be granted only under very exceptional circumstances.

Bd's. S.O.,

230-2.

The evidence upon this latter point was somewhat divergent: non-official opinion was generally in favour of giving some discretion to the Collector in respect of remissions upon "dry" land, while the official witnesses were largely opposed to this. Cases must occasionally arise in which special local circumstances have caused a loss of "dry" crops in a limited area, say in a particular village, and we are of opinion that, in such circumstances, the Collector should have some powers of remission, as we have recommended in dealing with local calamities.

Fallow rates in Lower Burma, and fluctuating assessments in Upper Burma and the Punjab.

613. In Lower Burma, when land is left uncultivated for reasons which are considered sufficient, it may be assessed, on application, at a nominal fallow rate, and sanction to such a reduction may be given by the Deputy Commissioner, by a township or Sub-divisional officer, and in some tracts by a revenue surveyor.

upon which a crop has matured, and the need for suspension and remission of revenue is thus exceptional. Per se this is a convenient system, but it is admitted that it throws large powers into the hands of subordinates, and requires to be applied with great caution.

614. In the Central Provinces, when a portion of a holding is required for public purposes, reference as to the amount of the assessment to be deducted on this account, as apart from the compensation payable, has to be made to the Local Government. In Bengal such abatements similarly require the sanction of the Commissioner, necessitating the submission of a large number of formal statements. We consider that in such cases abatements of revenue might be made by the Collector, subject to general instructions as to the method to be adopted.

615. It frequently happens that land-revenue and other demands have to be remitted by reason of the poverty, death or disappearance of the person liable, but the practice as to the authority which can deal with such cases varies in different Provinces. In Madras the orders of the Local Government have to be taken, and this was made the subject of complaint; in Bengal the sanctioning authority is usually the Board of Revenue; while in Bombay and Burma the Collector has some limited powers.* We think that the orders of some authority superior to the Collector should be required, to guard against the negligent writing off of arrears as irrecoverable, but that ordinarily a Commissioner might have full powers in such cases.

The Collector should, however, have full discretion to write off demands which have been clearly made in error, and to refund payments to which the Government has no title.

616. The grant of loans to landholders and agriculturists under the Land Improvement and Agriculturists Loans Acts, gives rise to a considerable amount of work in revenue offices, and the powers of sanction of Commissioners and district officers vary considerably in the several Provinces, being noticeably low in Burma under the former Act, and also in Eastern Bengal and Assam and the Central Provinces under the latter.

617. We received some complaints as to the existing restrictions, and we are of opinion that, within local budget allotments, and subject to such general rules as the Provincial Governments may prescribe, it would be possible to facilitate the transaction of business, and pro tanto assist the cultivators, by giving powers to the extent shown below:—

To Tahsildars, etc. (if so empowered by the Collector). Up to Rs. 500 in any one case for "Land Improvement," and up to Rs. 250 for "Agriculturist," Act loans.

Since the ordinary local agency of enquiry as regards the expediency of granting such loans must necessarily be the tahsildar, and action must usually be taken in accordance with his reports, it appears desirable, when the amount of an individual loan is not large, to permit selected tahsildars to act upon their own judgment. In the case of transactions under the Agriculturists Loans Act, which provides for advances towards purchase of seed or cattle in time of distress, etc., there is, however, greater risk of waste of the limited resources available than under the Land Improvement Act, and we would therefore place the tahsildar's limit at a lower figure in the former case.

Powers of Revenue officers in regard to the remission and suspension of such loans.

618. It was laid down by the Government of India in 1905 that the collection of instalments fixed for the repayment of Government loans should also be postponed when the land revenue demand has to be suspended over a large area. Apart from this, we would not empower any officer below the Collector to suspend the collection of loans, but we would give the Collector full powers in respect to all loans granted by himself or his subordinates. Similarly, Commissioners should have full powers as regards loans which they are competent to make.

619. The need for remission should seldom arise if the loans are made with reasonable care in the first instance, and the following powers in this respect appear to be sufficient :—

To Commissioners	...	...	...	...	Up to Rs. 500 in any one case.
To Collectors	...	...	...	...	Up to Rs. 100 in any one case.

Remedy for delay in grant of loans.

620. We received a few complaints as to delay in the granting of agricultural loans. Orders have, however, been issued by the Government of India which are designed to avoid delay by permitting payments on the spot by the officer sanctioning the loan, and this procedure should provide an effectual remedy.

Acquisition of land for public purposes.

Powers proposed for Commissioners, in respect of acquisition of land for public purposes.

622. A large number of cases under this Act are of a petty character, in which the views of the local officers as to the necessity of acquiring land, and the particular site to be selected, must ordinarily be accepted. We therefore suggest that where the total amount of the compensation to be awarded is not likely to exceed Rs. 5,000, the Commissioner might be authorized to take action under sections 4, 6 or 17 of the Act regarding the issue of notifications for the acquisition of land, and the taking possession of land prior to the award of compensation in case of urgency. But if in any such case the action has evoked some public protest, the matter should be referred to the Local Government. The Commissioner's power in this respect should include the acquisition of land required for local bodies under the control of Government, such as rural boards and municipalities, but all matters relating to the acquisition of land for companies should continue to be submitted to the Provincial Government.

Act I. of
Part 7.

623. In cases where Commissioners are permitted to take action in respect to the acquisition of land, they should also be empowered to authorize an officer other than the Collector to exercise the functions of a Collector under the Act, to authorize the grant of compensation otherwise than in money, to direct temporary occupation of land, to withdraw from acquisition proceedings, and, subject to the provisions of the Act, to take up a larger portion of land than was originally notified for acquisition.

Court of Wards administration.

624. In all the major Provinces except Burma, revenue officers are concerned with the management of landed estates paying land revenue to Government, which are taken under the charge of the Provincial Courts of Wards on account of the disqualification of the proprietor by reason of age, sex, or personal incapacity. In Bombay and the Central Provinces, Commissioners are Courts of Wards for their divisions; elsewhere the Board of Revenue or Financial Commissioner occupies that position for the whole Province, but necessarily acts very largely through the agency of Commissioners of divisions and Collectors.

Courts of Wards
in the various Provinces.

24909-11.

625. In the Central Provinces and the Punjab the Collector (Deputy Commissioner) was at one time a Court of Wards for his district, though in the latter Province he had to refer to the Divisional and the Financial Commissioners in matters of importance. It was alleged, in the Punjab, that the centralization of the powers of the Court in the Financial Commissioner had not been beneficial, and that the earlier procedure might advantageously be reverted to; but we were informed by the Revenue Secretary to the Government of India that the modification complained of was suggested by that Government on the advice of two distinguished Punjab officials (Sir C. Rivaz and Sir D. Ibbetson) and was accepted by the Local Government. The late Sir Denzil Ibbetson, however, would appear, from the views he submitted to us, to have somewhat modified his opinion as to the desirability of this change. The existing Punjab Act provides (as do those of other Provinces) for extensive delegation of the powers of the Court to district officers; and it is to the admitted failure to utilize this power that we would ascribe the greater part of the complaints made. The Revenue Secretary to the Government of India argues that in view of the heavy responsibilities incurred in the management of the property of a disqualified proprietor, the Court of Wards should, at present, be the highest revenue authority under the Local Government; and we concur in this opinion, the more so since, outside the Punjab, there is little evidence in favour of change.

The Court of Wards should at present be the highest revenue authority under the Local Government.

A Board of Revenue or Financial Commissioner should be competent to assume charge of an estate as Court of Wards.

626. In Madras, Bombay, the Punjab and the Central Provinces, the Court of Wards requires the authority of the Local Government to take up the management of any estate ; and in the two Bengals and the United Provinces the same permission is required in regard to the taking over of estates held by certain classes of disqualified proprietors.*

We think that in all Provinces in which there is a Board of Revenue or Financial Commissioner, that authority should be fully competent to assume charge of an estate as Court of Wards ; but we would not place such power in any lower hands. The consequences to a proprietor of action by the Court may be far reaching ; there is some risk of an unduly sanguine view being taken as to the ability of Government to benefit an encumbered estate during the term of its management ; and failure in this respect may reflect prejudicially upon the system generally.

The management of estates by the Court of Wards requires to be applied with reference to local circumstances.

627. Some witnesses expressed the view that the intervention of the Court of Wards was at present unduly frequent, while others considered that, in addition to the more active exercise of its existing functions, these might be expediently extended to properties which are not at present within its purview.† We think that the management of estates by the Court of Wards is a beneficent function of Government, but at the same time one which must be cautiously applied ; and the precise extent to which estates should be taken under the control of the Court must be a matter for consideration with reference to local circumstances. It is not desirable that the Collector should be over-burdened ; estates which are hopelessly involved cannot usefully be administered ; and in other cases their management might often be entrusted to some member of the owner's family, subject to the Collector's general supervision.

Proposed decentralization in matters relating to the management of Court of Wards estates.

628. There was a general expression of opinion‡ that, in regard to estates under management, more power should be given to the local officers, with whom the direct responsibility for success or failure immediately rests, and upon whose vigilance the Court must necessarily rely. The efficient supervision of landed property depends largely upon local knowledge and enquiry, and the prompt disposal of details is a necessity in any well-ordered estate. Accordingly we advocate a large measure of decentralization in this respect, and we understand that a certain amount of delegation has been recently allowed in Bengal and the United Provinces.

Estates should be divided into three classes, in regard to which the powers of Collectors and Commissioners would vary.

629. While we recognize that the precise extent to which Commissioners and Collectors may be entrusted with powers in respect to estates under Court of Wards management must be determined according to the circumstances of each Province, we would suggest the following general lines of delegation as suitable.

Estates might be conveniently divided, according to their gross income, into three classes. The management of all must rest primarily with

* The discretion of the Court of Wards is considerably wider, on this matter, in the two Bengals than in the United Provinces.

the Collector ; but his final powers with regard to estates of the last, or third, class might be much fuller than in regard to estates of a higher character ; while the Commissioner might similarly be entrusted with very full powers in respect to estates of all but the first class. Speaking generally estates might be classified thus :—

Class I.—Those having a gross income of more than one lakh of rupees per annum.

Class II.—Those whose income is between Rs. 10,000 and Rs. 100,000.

Class III.—Other estates.

Estates which have a political or historic importance out of proportion to their money value could, of course, be placed in a higher class than the income test would indicate.

630. The main functions of the central Court of Wards might be :—

Main functions of the central Court of Wards under this scheme.

(a.) The taking over and release of all estates.

(b.) Sanction to adoptions of, and by, wards of the Court.

(c.) Sanction to marriages of wards in Class I. and Class II. estates.

(d.) Appointment of guardians in Class I. estates.

(e.) Approval of the budgets of Class I. estates.

(f.) Sanction to loans and investments, and to any step involving alienation of property, in the case of estates in Classes I. and II.

(g.) Sanction to the creation of all appointments over Rs. 250 a month, to the alteration of their emoluments, and to the appointment and removal of the incumbents.

631. The principal functions of Commissioners might be—

(a.) Sanction to marriages of wards in Class III. estates. Functions of Commissioners.

(b.) Appointment of guardians in Class II. estates.

(c.) Approval of the budgets of all estates in Classes II. and III.

(d.) Sanction to loans and investments, and to any step involving alienation of property, in Class III. estates.

(e.) Sanction to the creation of all appointments between Rs. 100 and Rs. 250 a month, to the alteration of the emoluments of such posts, and to the appointment and removal of their incumbents.

(f.) Full powers of suspension or remission in respect of rents or other monies due to an estate.

632. Collectors would appoint guardians in Class III. estates, and should have the same power in regard to remissions and suspensions of rentals, etc., as we have proposed to give them in regard to the Government land revenue in temporarily settled areas. Subject to the restrictions noted above, and to the existence of budget provision, they should have a free hand in regard to appointments. They should also be able, subject to such limitations as may be desirable in respect of large sums, to make transfers of funds from one head to another within an estate budget, or to apply to specific purposes sums out of an unallotted budget reserve. And of Collectors.

Para. 609.

633. Subject to their retention of a general control, Collectors should have power to delegate to Sub-divisional officers or to estate managers any, or all, of their own powers. Delegation of Collector's powers.

Saving of references by our suggestions.

634. We believe that the adoption of these suggestions would save a large number of references of a petty character which have now to be made by district officers to higher authority. The idea of discriminating between different classes of estates, as regards the powers to be enjoyed therein by local officers, has, moreover, already been applied to some extent. Thus in Bengal, 17696. Commissioners are now competent to sanction the budgets of estates with a gross income not exceeding one lakh of rupees, and they can do the same in the United Provinces where the income does not exceed Rs. 50,000.

Vol. VII.,
App. III.,
p. 169.

In the event of the disappearance of Boards of
Revenue and Financial Commissioners, the Local Government should become the central authority in Court of Wards
matters.

635. In the event of the disappearance of Boards of Revenue and Financial Commissioners, as suggested in Chapter XI., the Government must become the central authority in Court of Wards matters; but in that case it will be desirable that larger powers, similar to those which Commissioners now exercise in Bombay and the Central Provinces, should be given to these officers generally. The assumption and termination of charge of an estate should, however, always require the orders of the central authority.

Estate administration reports.

636. We agree with the Government of the United Provinces that it is unnecessary that detailed reports on all the estates in charge of a Court of Wards should be submitted to headquarters. Certain statistics for all estates are required in order that a complete account of the operations of the Court may be compiled, but the detailed administration reports of estates, the budgets of which are within the Commissioner's power of sanction (Classes II. and III. referred to above) might remain with that officer, and be dealt with by him during the course of his tours.

Vol. VII.,
App. III.,
p. 169.

It will, of course, be open to the Commissioner to accompany the statistics forwarded by him to the Court of Wards with remarks on any matters of a special character, of which he thinks that the authorities at headquarters should be placed in possession.

CHAPTER XVI.

METHODS OF APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONERS AND COLLECTORS, AND OF THE PRINCIPAL OFFICERS OF OTHER DEPARTMENTS; TRANSFERS; KNOWLEDGE OF THE VERNACULARS; TOURING; AND CONTACT WITH THE PEOPLE.

Decentralization involves greater care in the selection of Commissioners,
Collectors and other high officers of Government.

637. Since any general scheme of decentralization must necessarily involve enhancement of the powers of district officials and other local representatives of Government, it follows that care must be taken to ensure that such officers shall be personally fit to discharge the responsibilities falling upon them. It is, indeed, a common argument against delegation of powers that these cannot be safely entrusted to certain Collectors or members of some other official class which may be in question; and the fact that Local Governments look with legitimate distrust on some of their officers is largely responsible for the checks imposed on the action of all, both directly by law, rule, or executive instruction, and indirectly by the facilities now given for appeal and revision. It would be invidious, and indeed impossible, to prescribe the control to be exercised over the acts of particular Collectors or Commissioners with reference to the opinion entertained of them at headquarters, and the practical result is that many efficient officers are bound by administrative fetters which are really necessary only in the case of a few inefficient colleagues. The proposals that we have made in the direction of delegation of authority within the Provinces pre-suppose, therefore, that men shall not hereafter be permitted to rise by mere seniority to positions for which they are not fully fit.

Famine Commn's Report, Part II., Chap. II., paras. 6-9.

Public Service Commn's. Report, para. 89.

H. D. Pros., A. Pub. Feb., 1890, Nos. 130-7.

638. The necessity for more rigorous selection has, indeed, already been recognized in theory. The Famine Commission of 1878-80 found that members of the Indian Civil Service generally rose by seniority to the post of Collector or District Judge, and they recommended that unfit men should no longer be promoted to such offices, and that officials thus superseded should be retired on proportionate pensions. These conclusions were endorsed by the Public Service Commission of 1886-7, who emphasized the necessity for stricter selection and thorough efficiency in the Indian Civil Service as a corps d'élite; and the Government of India, in communicating to Local Governments the orders of the Secretary of State on the Commission's Report, laid down that no officer should be appointed to the executive charge of a district, or to be a District Judge, who had not, in the course of his previous service, given distinct evidence that he was fit for such office.

Already laid down that no officer should be a Collector who has not shown distinct evidence of fitness.

639. The evidence* which we have recorded leaves little doubt, however, that this principle has not been thoroughly applied, and that a man is, as a rule, only passed over for a Collectorship on account of flagrant misconduct or incompetency. Some witnesses hold that little change is required in the existing practice, but the general consensus of opinion is strongly in favour of a stricter adherence to the orders above quoted.

This principle has not been adequately applied.

640. In view of the importance of the position of a Collector, which will be considerably enhanced by the adoption of our recommendations, we think that the principle already laid down by the Government of India should be fully observed, and that while promotion to Collectorships should continue to be by seniority, the rejection of the unfit should be much more stringent than it is at present. We understand that an analogous system is already followed in the Indian army, where, when a regimental officer whose seniority entitles him to the vacant command of a regiment is not deemed fit therefor, he is superseded.

It should be fully observed.

641. Ordinarily, however, a Civilian should not be permanently passed over for a Collectorship until he has proved his unfitness in an officiating capacity.† The constant absences of Indian officials on leave or deputation make it a general rule that an officer's turn for permanent promotion to a Collectorship will not arise until he has officiated more than once, and such occasions will give full opportunity for testing his merits. The mere fact that an officer has officiated in an appointment should not be held to confer any claim to eventual confirmation. His officiating service should be treated as a period of probation.

An officer unfit to be a Collector should be retired on a suitable pension.

642. In some cases the inefficiency which has led to an officer's supersession may be due to remediable causes, such as idleness, temporary mental depression or bad health, and in that event it would be desirable to allow him a further trial later on. But when it has been finally found that an officer is definitely incompetent to be a Collector, it is obviously undesirable that he should remain on as a discontented and inefficient subordinate, and the interests of the public service consequently require that he should be retired on a suitable pension. We have already cited the views of previous Indian Commissions in favour of this course, which was also advocated by the Police Commission of 1902; and we have likewise received a large amount of responsible official evidence, including statements by the Government of Bombay and the Lieutenant-Governors of Bengal and the United Provinces, in favour of this procedure.*

Para. 85 of its Report.

Such pension should be grantable under definite rules.

643. In dealing with the recommendation to this effect by the Public Service Commission, the Government of India proposed to adhere to a previous ruling of the Secretary of State that such cases should be dealt with by him upon their individual merits, but in our opinion, it is essential to introduce a regular system of proportional pensions which will enable a Local Government to take action in such cases. To cut short the career of an officer is, in any case, a step only adopted with reluctance; and such reluctance must be increased, to the disadvantage of the public service, if each case has to be specially referred to the Secretary of State. It is also essential that such pensions should be adequate, and bear a due proportion to the period of effective service already to the credit of the officer to be retired; otherwise there will be a natural reluctance to get rid of inefficient officers.

G. of I.
Des. of 9th
Oct., 1888,
H. D.

No reason to suppose that these proposals will prejudice the popularity of the Indian Civil Service.

644. Objection may possibly be taken to the procedure we propose, on the ground that it would cause a feeling of insecurity which would react on the popularity of the Indian Civil Service, and thus lower the standard of candidates, or that it would place a man's career too much at the discretion of the Head of a Province, especially in one ruled by a single Lieutenant-Governor or Chief Commissioner.

The opinions of witnesses were divided, some officers holding that the action suggested might be so applied as to evoke suspicions of favouritism, while others† considered that no such danger was likely to arise. It seems to us that the fears which have been expressed are without real foundation, and that a process of more rigorous selection for Collectorships, accompanied by retirement of unfit men on proportionate pensions, will not prejudice the popularity of the Indian Civil Service. The removal of incompetent officers would, we think, be welcomed by the majority of Civilians, who are justly proud of the efficiency and high character of the service to which they belong.*

645. The objection that our proposal places too much power in the hands of the Head of a Province would be minimized by the adoption of our suggestions for the extension of the Governor-in-Council system, which would place the final decision affecting an officer in the hands of more than one man. We consider, further, that :—

Steps necessary to protect the interests of officers.

Para. 524.

(i.) No officer should ordinarily be passed over unless the various Commissioners under whom he has previously served, or a decided majority of these, consider him unfit. The opinions of Commissioners on such a point will be on record under the system of annual confidential reports upon junior Civilians which we understand to be already in force, while the periodical conferences of Commissioners which we have advocated will afford a good opportunity for confidential discussion by them of the merits of officers.

(ii.) Any officer passed over should have an appeal to the Government of India.

646. The Famine and Public Service Commissions made recommendations, similar to those which they put forward as regards Collectorships, in the case of District Judges, and though we did not take specific evidence in regard to these, they should obviously be treated in the same way. We would also apply similar principles to high district officials in other services.

The same principles should apply to District Judges and to high district officials in other services.

647. There was evidence that greater care is exercised in promoting to Commissionerships than in the case of Collectors, and here the position may be generally described as promotion by seniority, tempered by the rejection of the unfit. That is the course which we desire to see adopted in the case of Collectorships, but having regard to the importance of the Commissioner, and the powers we propose to confer upon him, we consider that Commissioners should be selected from the best Collectors of the Province, i.e., that seniority should only be regarded where other qualifications are practically equal.

Commissioners should be selected from the best Collectors of the Province.

Cf para.
422.

If, as we desire, a Commissionership be regarded as a prize appointment to be filled by officers of special qualifications, it follows that an officer who is not selected for such a post, has no ground of complaint which would justify an appeal to the Government of India.

45406.

648. We do not consider it necessary that a man not selected for a Commissionership should be retired on a special proportionate pension. He may be a good Collector, and may even be subsequently promoted as Commissioner, while his length of service will, in any case, be such as to bring him within easy reach of the normal pension:

Unnecessary to give special proportionate pensions to men not selected for Commissionerships.

649. The principles of selection which we advocate in the case of Commissioners should apply also to the highest officers of other departments.

The same principle of selection should be applied to the highest officers of other departments.

* Sir S. Edgerley would point out that most witnesses who were questioned on the subject admitted that any risk of this nature could be adequately counterbalanced by an improvement in the pension benefits accruing to those who serve beyond the normal period and attain high office. It may also be added that the recommendations made as to abolition of Boards of Revenue, and enhancement of responsibilities of Collectors and Commissioners in other Provinces than Madras and Bombay, should necessarily lead to increase of the pay and status of these grades in those Provinces.

Frequency of transfer of Government officers.

frequency with which officers of Government are transferred from one appointment to another, and as regards the mischievous effects of such transfers. Collectors, for instance, are often moved before they can have gained any but a most elementary acquaintance with their districts, and the fact that officers follow one another in rapid succession must necessarily throw power into the hands of office clerks and subordinates. Further, it is impossible to expect that free communication will exist between Government officers and the people in their districts when they do not get time to become acquainted with one another. When, too, as is often the case, different languages are spoken in different parts of the same Province, it is most unlikely that an officer frequently transferred can obtain full proficiency in any of the local vernaculars, and a further barrier is thus placed between him and the great mass of the population.

Principal causes of transfers.

651. The principal causes leading to these transfers are briefly :—

(i.) The taking of leave, which must necessarily be allowed on a liberal scale in the case of services recruited largely from Europe.

(ii.) The weight given to seniority in filling up officiating appointments.

(iii.) The differences between districts, which often necessitate the removal of an officer from a light to a heavy charge or vice versa.

(iv.) The necessity of selecting district officers for employment at headquarters or on special duty.

(v.) The tendency to accede to the requests of officers to be moved from districts for personal reasons.

Measures taken by Lord Curzon's Government to reduce them.

652. The conditions of Indian service necessitate a considerable number of transfers, but the fact that this is so makes it all the more desirable not to add to the number unnecessarily. The constant transfers of officers throughout India attracted the attention of Lord Curzon's Government in 1900-01, and they took action in the following directions to minimize this evil :—

45407.

(i.) The leave rules were modified so that leave might be taken at less frequent intervals and for individually longer periods.

(ii.) Stricter observance was enjoined of the principle that leave could not be claimed as of right, and of the rules governing the lien of absent officers upon appointments.

C.S.R.
Arts. 197
& 211.

(iii.) Transfers were not to be allowed merely to meet the private wishes of officers.

(iv.) The practice of giving acting promotions by mere seniority was condemned.

(v.) Privilege leave vacancies were to be filled as far as possible by officers on the spot.*

Ibid,
Art. 98.

Transfers are still too numerous.

The instructions then issued had, no doubt, a wholesome effect, and it was claimed on behalf of the Governments of Madras, the United Provinces, Burma and the Punjab, that transfers are now less frequent than they were formerly. They are, however, still far too numerous, and we cannot help thinking that the evils attendant upon the constant moving of district officers have not been adequately recognized in the Provincial Secretariats.

* 'Privilege leave' is leave on full pay, which is earned at the rate of one month for every eleven months' active service, but which may be accumulated up to three months.

(i.) Officiating appointments in the place of officers absent on leave, or on other duty, should be made locally far more than is the case at present. The Government of India have already laid down, as a general principle, that mere privilege leave vacancies (and more particularly those not extending beyond six weeks) should ordinarily be filled by an officer from the same station or district, and if necessary, by the appointment of a 'Provincial' officer to fill a post usually reserved to a member of the Indian Civil Service. In the Central Provinces we were told that this principle was already applied in the case of vacancies up to three months, and various witnesses desired to make this practice one of general application elsewhere, while others* were prepared to extend to six months the officiating period to which such conditions should apply.

Officiating appointments should be made locally (when possible) up to six months.

We are strongly in favour of this larger application ; and it should be remembered that if a relatively senior officer should at one time suffer by the enforcement of such a rule, he would probably gain, or have gained, by it at another period of his service.

654. In the case of vacancies likely to last for more than six months, greater attention must necessarily be paid to the claims of seniority, but even here, when it is a question as between men of not very unequal service, preference should be given to one who knows something of the district in which the appointment arises.

In the case of longer vacancies greater attention must be paid to seniority.

Vol. VII.,
App. III.,
pp. 169-70.

35452-5.

655. (ii.) An officer returning from long leave has necessarily to be provided with a post suitable to his standing, but we consider that such an officer should have a claim only to an appointment covered by his permanent rank, and should not displace a junior who may be acting in a higher appointment. This principle is indeed already recognized in the United Provinces, where an officer who is not a permanent Collector is now not allowed, on return from leave, to oust a junior who may be officiating in charge of a district. It was suggested in Bombay that an officer should be thus temporarily superseded only by one of approximately equal standing, but we do not think it necessary to hamper the application of the principle in this way.

An officer returning from long leave should be entitled only to an appointment covered by his permanent rank.

Para. 157.

C.S.R.,
Art. 197.

Here, again, an officer who may lose by such a rule at one period of his service, will probably gain at another.

656. (iii.) As we have already indicated, the present leave rules should be rendered more elastic, so that officers should be given leave when it best suited the Government to spare them. The principle that no officer is entitled to leave as of right is already laid down, but the rigid character of the present rules results occasionally in unnecessary changes of appointment.†

The leave rules should be more elastic.

* 8792-5, 16125, 17696, 18719-20, 20086-7, 25694, 27216-7, 29714, 33299, 38251-3.

† Thus supposing a Collector to have been officiating as a Secretary to the Local Government, and to have been displaced in that capacity, it would obviously be convenient for him to take leave, if he meditated doing this shortly, before reversion to his district, where an officer would already have been acting for him. But under present rules he cannot take such leave unless he has put in a prescribed amount of active service since his last return from furlough, or from privilege leave of more than six weeks' duration. He might, therefore, though his total service had earned the leave required, have to return to his district, displacing his locum tenens there, for a short time, to comply with the rules in question, and would then again quit it on taking leave, thus involving a fresh acting appointment.

C.S.R.,
Art. 308.

Conditions under which an officer should be given a Collectorship or appointment of similar or greater importance.

657. (iv.) Officers should not be nominated for acting or special appointments when it is known that they contemplate taking leave shortly. This principle was accepted by various witnesses, and so long as officers are given the option of foregoing their leave, there would be nothing unfair in its application. The general principle should, in fact, be that no officer should be allowed to take up the headship of a district, or any other appointment of similar or greater importance, unless he is prepared to guarantee, his health permitting, that he will occupy the post sufficiently long to do it justice. It is, no doubt, difficult to lay down an absolute rule to this effect, but the principle should be observed as far as possible.

Notification of intention to take leave.

658. (v.) Except in the case of leave on urgent private affairs or on medical certificate, an officer should not be considered as having a claim to leave unless he has given at least three months' notice of his intention to apply for it. Due opportunity will thus be allowed to the Local Government, or other authority concerned, to consider how the resulting vacancy can be filled with the minimum of inconvenience to the public service.

Transfers between posts of like character should be made only in the interests of the public service.

659. (vi.) Transfers between posts of like character in different districts should be made only when they are absolutely in the interests of the public service. We had evidence that, on occasion, the personal preferences of officers were given undue weight, and we would insist upon full subordination of these to the public interests. An officer should not be allowed to move from a district simply because he prefers another.

We recognize that there are a certain number of district charges which are unpopular for various reasons, such as bad climate or isolation, but we would provide for such districts by departing from seniority and offering posts in them to suitable junior officers who would undertake to remain there for a certain number of years. In special cases, too, such districts, if peculiarly undesirable, might carry with them some special pecuniary compensation, such as the grant of a free house or of a local allowance.

Transfers caused by insufficiency of staff.

660. It has been stated by some witnesses* that transfers could be diminished if the staff were increased, so as to provide something in the nature of a reserve available to fill vacancies without disturbance in other charges. For instance, in the two Bengals, it was represented that there are at present very few senior Joint Magistrates who would be available to take the place of their Collectors if these went on leave or were required for other duties, thus avoiding the introduction of officers from outside. In so far as such a state of things does not arise from a temporary depletion of cadre, which will be rectified in the normal course of recruitment, we think that it demands a remedy.

Every effort should be made to keep an officer in the same district for three years at least.

661. There was considerable variety of opinion as to the proper length of tenure of an appointment such as the headship of a district. most part, from three to five years. We recognize that unforeseen circumstances and the exigencies of the public service must prevent any absolute rule. Moreover, varied district experience is, within limits, a distinct advantage for higher appointments, and prolonged stay in a single district may render an officer narrow-minded or apathetic, may enable his subordinates to learn, and play upon, his personal idiosyncracies, and may prejudice the district by the fact that he is not equally interested in all branches of the administration. On the other hand, no officer can be really efficient if he is constantly changing his sphere of work, while he becomes a more valuable servant of the State, and better known to the people of his charge, the longer he stays in the same post.

We consider, therefore, that every effort should be made to keep an officer in the same district for three years at the very least.*

662. We desire, further, to emphasize the fact that transfers are particularly undesirable when they involve frequent changes as between one language area and another.

663. In making the above recommendations we have in mind the circumstances of all services and departments, and not only those of the Indian Civil Service, and our suggestions should be applied in this sense.

The above recommendations apply to all services and departments.

664. We consider, further, that any pay condition which tends to promote transfers, such as the grant of special rates of pay or special local allowances to individual posts or charges tenable by a member of any class of officers, should be done away with, save in the special circumstances referred to in paragraph 659. Where the pay conditions of a particular appointment are specially favourable i.e., if they do more than actually compensate for special disadvantages, the tendency must inevitably be to regard such appointments as the due of the senior officers of the class, and thus to increase transfers.

Pay conditions in regard to particular appointments which promote transfers should be done away with. A system of personal grading should be applied to the tahsildars in Madras.

27090-5.

Where some distinctions of pay are desirable as between officers of the same class, these should be given on a system of personal grading, which permits an officer to reap the reward of his increasing seniority and experience without change of post. Such a system should be applied, for example, to the tahsildars of Madras, whose pay now varies according to the taluks in which they serve, with the result that a man cannot ordinarily obtain promotion without change of charge.

KNOWLEDGE OF THE VERNACULARS.

665. We received a large amount of evidence regarding the knowledge of the Indian vernaculars possessed by European officers of Government. All witnesses were agreed on the importance of a thorough knowledge of the local vernacular on the part of a district officer, but while some considered that Indian Civilian and other officers had, generally speaking, an acquaintance with the vernaculars sufficient for practical purposes, others* held a decidedly contrary opinion. Officials and non-officials were represented in both categories. Speaking generally, however, there was a large preponderance of evidence that the European officers serving in Madras, Bombay, and the two Bengals were not sufficiently acquainted with the languages spoken there. It is significant that these are the Provinces in which knowledge of English is most prevalent among the educated classes, and that they possess a variety of vernaculars : both these facts are prejudicial to practical mastery of an Indian language. In the Central Provinces opinions as to the linguistic attainments of the European officers were fairly divided, while in Northern India and Burma most witnesses held that officers could, in general, converse fairly well with the people.)

European officers are insufficiently acquainted with the vernaculars, especially in Madras, Bombay, and the two Bengals.

Necessity for adequate knowledge of the vernaculars. Imperfect measures now taken to secure this.

666. The growing tendency, dictated by reasons of administrative expediency and by the spread of a knowledge of English among the Indian servants of Government, to frame returns and reports in English instead of in the vernacular, makes it more easy now than it was formerly for a European officer to transact his office work without a full knowledge of the language of his district. It is still, however, most requisite that he should have such knowledge, since an officer who cannot speak freely to the people of his charge in their own language, and understand vernacular petitions handed in to him, must necessarily be largely in the hands of his subordinates. All European officers are now obliged to pass examinations in one or more Provincial vernaculars ; but these are held at the outset of their careers, and are not perhaps, in some cases, as practical or as stringent as they should be. Moreover, when a junior officer has passed such examinations, he is not ordinarily subjected to any further compulsory language test. There are 'high proficiency' and 'honours' examinations which carry special money rewards, but it is optional to an officer to appear for these, and it may happen, as in an instance cited before us, that if he does pass such a special test, he is soon after transferred from the locality in which his linguistic knowledge is of value.

already a specific inducement to Government servants to qualify to that extent as soon as possible. We were told in Madras and the United Provinces that proficiency in language was subsequently taken into account, but the general impression left on our minds, which was confirmed by a member of the Board of Revenue in Bengal, was that an officer who had once got through his departmental tests was not subsequently penalised for practical failure to keep up, and add to, his knowledge of the vernaculars. It was, indeed, admitted to us by one Collector that, though he had been for some years in charge of a district, he could not speak its language fluently.

(iii.) In the early years of his service an officer should be kept as far as possible in the same language area. Transfers between one language area and another should, in fact, be reduced to a minimum, and when they take place, the officer transferred, if of rank below that of Commissioner, should be required, within a reasonable period, to show practical efficiency in the vernacular of his new charge. This principle is already recognized to some extent in Bombay, where an officer who has passed in one vernacular and is transferred, within his first ten years of residence in India, to another language area, must pass in the new language within a year, and, if he fails to do this, is subject to a deduction of 10 per cent. from his salary.

(iv.) In making appointments to particular districts or divisions, knowledge of the vernacular should be regarded as of at least as great importance as seniority.

(v.) No junior Civilian should be appointed to the Secretariat, or to other duties at headquarters, until he has become thoroughly efficient in at least one vernacular.

(vi.) The confidential reports now submitted on Civilians should lay special stress on their ability to speak the vernacular, and a record of practical language proficiency should be maintained at the Secretariat.

668. We consider that similar considerations should apply, as far as possible, to officers of departments outside the Indian Civil Service.

TOURING.

12912,
13669,
27855.

669. Touring by Government officers, for the personal investigation of the conditions of their charges, or of special matters to which their attention has been drawn by complaint or otherwise, is an integral factor in Indian administration. The standing instructions on this subject issued by different Local Governments necessarily vary in their details, some confining themselves rather to general principles (Bengal), others prescribing in greater detail the minimum duration and period of tours (Madras, Bombay and Berar).^{*} In Burma, in the Central Provinces proper, and in the United Provinces there appear to be no definite rules on the subject, apart from standards commonly recognized in practice. But speaking generally[†], executive officers of Government are in the habit of travelling constantly through their respective jurisdictions, and we consider it essential that they should do this if they are to remain in full touch with the people.

Touring by Government officers is essential.

^{*} Rules of the Bengal Bd. of Rev., Chapter III., secs. I (b) & II. Standing Orders of the Bd. of Rev., Madras, No. 124; Nairne's Revenue Handbook, Bombay, pp. 53-9; 26689-91.

But the present system imposes certain inconveniences on the people.

670. There is, however, another aspect of the case, which was represented by various witnesses. Against the benefits of touring may be set the inconvenience to parties in criminal and revenue cases, and their witnesses and lawyers, who may have to follow an officer's camp, sometimes into remote parts and to villages in which there is little accommodation. Again, villagers on a main route, at which the camps of officers may frequently be pitched, are put to hardship by constant demands upon them for provisions and transport which, despite the vigilance of superior officers, may not always be fully paid for by subordinates. In his busy season, too, it may not suit the cultivator to furnish labour or carriage on any terms. Modern conditions tend to render it less easy than formerly to command labour, and the responsibilities of landowners and village headmen in respect to the requirements of peripatetic officials, which in some instances are prescribed by law, are apt to become unduly onerous if the calls upon them recur at frequent intervals. It must be remembered too that, in India, touring officers are usually accompanied by a staff of servants and office subordinates, who sometimes attempt illegitimate extortions from the people.

The growth of special departments has, again, added to the number of officers who traverse the districts in connexion with particular branches of the administration, and we had evidence that the tours of these outside officers and their subordinates, are more distasteful to the people than those of the regular district officials, whose functions are better understood and appreciated.

Proposals for mitigating these.

671. It is desirable to mitigate these disadvantages, while retaining the undeniable benefits which may be derived from a proper application of the tour system, and to this end we offer the following suggestions :—

(i.) Tours should be carefully planned, so as to afford a reasonable length of stay at selected centres, from which visits can be made to outlying parts.

Special journeys for particular purposes may have to be made at a rapid rate, but in such instances an officer should travel with a very light retinue, and will often be able to use a train or river steamer. In the ordinary course of an officer's progress through his charge, nothing is gained, however, by indiscriminate and hurried movements, which produce the maximum of inconvenience to all concerned, and afford no time to the raiyats to realize that they have in their midst an official to whom representations can be made on subjects of importance to them. Such tours should therefore be leisurely conducted, and the main halting places should be in large villages at which supplies are easily procurable, and where lodging is available for persons from outside whose business takes them to the court or office of the touring official. Daily rides from such centres should enable an officer to gain sufficient knowledge of the adjacent country.

(ii.) So long as an officer accomplishes within a year, or a half year, the total amount of touring which the Local Government considers necessary from him, the periods at which he does this should be at his own discretion, and he should not be forced to go into camp at a time when case work is heavy or when it may be otherwise inconvenient.

673. We have had much evidence that European officers, and, as some witnesses allege, Indian officers also,† are not sufficiently accessible ; that their relations with the population in their charges are confined to official matters ; and that European officers are not sufficiently conversant with the customs, method of life, habits and prejudices of their Indian fellow subjects. We also had some allegations of want of courtesy on either side, but these were exceptional.‡ In dealing with this question we have only to consider the obligations of officials, but we cannot forget the difficulties arising from differences of race, creed and upbringing, and from the Indian caste and social systems.§ We think, however, that more should be done to establish better relations than is now attempted.

Officers of Government, and especially the European officers, are not in sufficient contact with the people.

The evidence leads us to the conclusion that the present barriers are due partly to disinclination on the part of some officers to mix with the people, partly to disinclination of some Indians to mix with Europeans, but partly also, in the case of officials, to|| over-work, ¶frequent transfers, and insufficient knowledge of the language. We have already made proposals to meet the last two difficulties, while our suggestions in the matter of decentralization and simplification of procedure should relieve district officers of much of the desk-work which now engrosses them.

674. We think, further, that young Civilians should, at the outset of their career, receive special instruction in the characteristics of Indian sentiment and social life, and to this end great care should be taken in the selection of the Collectors under whom their apprenticeship will be passed. They should be made to realize that their value and prospects as Government officers depend not merely on the performance of their official duties, but on cultivating good and friendly relations with the people among whom they move, and confidential reports on officers should lay stress on this point.

Much may be done to promote more cordial relations by friendly gatherings at which Indian gentlemen can appear without detriment to caste rules, while district officers should, as far as possible, have regular times set apart for the reception of visitors, for whom suitable waiting rooms should be provided. Complaint has been made that the absence of these compels Indian gentlemen of position desiring to see a district official who may not be immediately at leisure, to wait in the sun, or in an open verandah along with Government chaprasis and other menials.

CHAPTER XVII.

APPEALS.

Appeals within the Provinces.

675. We have received much evidence on the subject of the right of appeal, by Government servants and by members of the public, against orders or actions of Government, or of its local representatives, which affect them personally. One class of witnesses held it impolitic and undesirable to allow any curtailment of the opportunities of appeal at present allowed, while others were of opinion that the existing rights are undesirably large from an administrative point of view.

We have referred in a previous chapter to appeals against orders or actions of Local Governments. We have now to consider the question of appeals within the Provinces.*

Chap.
IX.

Appeals from Government servants against orders affecting their position in the public service.

676. While every citizen can memorialize any authority whom he thinks likely to be interested in his real or supposed grievances, it has been found necessary in practice, as has been pointed out in Chapter IX., to prevent the time of high officials being occupied, to the detriment of more important functions, by appeals in matters of relatively petty importance which have already had due consideration from subordinate authorities. Conditions have accordingly been prescribed under which the Indian Governments can decline to forward further memorials to the Government of India, or to the Secretary of State, as the case may be.

Limitations already imposed on appeal faci-ties.

677. In most Provinces similar steps have been taken to restrict further consideration by Provincial Governments of matters already disposed of by authorities subordinate to them. In 1898 the Government of India suggested to the Local Governments that second appeals need not be considered by them in the case of officers on a salary not exceeding Rs. 50 a month, or by a subordinate authority in the case of men on Rs. 25 a month and under. Rules restricting the right of appeal in the case of the lower paid Government servants have since been framed in nearly all Provinces, but the details vary. Those current in Bengal appear to have been the most recently revised and may be instanced as typical of the rest, although the rules of other Provinces are not always equally restrictive.

678. In Bengal appeal is allowed against orders of dismissal, removal, suspension, degradation, stoppage of promotion or increment of pay, or fine. Every officer so affected is given the right of preferring one appeal to the authority immediately superior to the officer who passed the order appealed against. No officer in 'inferior'* service has the right of preferring a further appeal; but an officer whose service is 'superior' possesses a second appeal against an order (a) of dismissal or removal, (b) of suspension, degradation, or stoppage of promotion or increment of pay, when the period in respect of which the order is passed exceeds six months. An order passed on appeal by the Board of Revenue, or by the head of a department, in the case of an officer in 'superior' service whose pay is less than Rs. 50 a month is, however, final. No appeal lies, as of right, against an order declining to give an appointment, or promotion, to a particular individual, or affecting a change of station or an extension of service.

679. Limitations of this character have not, however, been specially prescribed in Bombay or in the Punjab. The Bombay Government was content with the statutory limitation of appeals provided by its Land Revenue Code. Under the Punjab Revenue Code, which applies also in the Frontier Province, a Commissioner's order rejecting an appeal from the order of a Deputy Commissioner is final; but we were told that special revisions by the Punjab Financial Commissioner were so frequent as practically to allow a further appeal to that authority.

680. The Chief Commissioner of the Frontier Province was emphatic in condemning the existing liberality of appeal facilities, while the Lieutenant Governor of the Punjab commented on the want of finality of orders dealing with the appointment and dismissal of subordinates. The Government of the United Provinces proposes changes which would render the existing rules there more restrictive; but the Madras Government does not desire any far-reaching change, and is supported in this view by the Chief Commissioner of Baluchistan. The Secretaries to the Government of India in the Home and the Revenue Departments, while advocating certain modifications of the rules in the direction of further stringency, would leave the matter to the discretion of Local Governments.

Evidence for and against limitation of appeals.

Non-official† opinion in the Provinces was almost unanimously opposed to the curtailment of existing appeal rights, and while many official‡ witnesses were in favour of their restriction, a considerable number§ would leave matters as they are at present.

* The terms 'inferior' and 'superior' service are used in the sense of Articles 396 and 397 of the Civil Service Regulations. An 'inferior' service officer is usually a man on Rs. 10 a month or less.

Arguments against limitation.

681. The arguments adduced in opposition to the further limitation of appeals rest upon the undesirability of running counter to the Oriental sentiment in favour of access to the highest authority for redress of grievances, coupled with the wish that full opportunity should be afforded for the revision of orders which may have been passed by officers who are either lacking in experience or who have not regarded matters from an entirely impartial standpoint. It is urged, again, that as decentralization will increase the original powers of subordinate authorities, it will add to the risk of miscarriage of justice. Finally, that the sense of security attaching to Government service is a powerful factor in attracting capable candidates for State employ, which it is not expedient to impair.

favour of it.

682. On the other hand it is contended that the right of Government servants to carry their grievances to the highest possible tribunal has already been curtailed in practice, and that the time has now come for extending such restrictions, which may properly form part of the ordinary conditions of State service. That it is detrimental to the efficiency of the public service that highly paid officers should be required to spend their time in re-examining the decisions of their subordinates, and prejudicial to the influence and authority of the latter that their orders should lack finality. Finally, that the discipline and efficiency of the public service is impaired by the large right of appeal now allowed, since it takes so much time and trouble to deal adequately with a corrupt or useless public officer that punitive action is not taken against many men who deserve it.

Circumstances
limitation.

683. In judicial procedure it has been recognized that interest reipublicae ut sit finis litium, and the Civil and Criminal Procedure Codes provide only one appeal upon questions of fact.* Moreover, the existence of departmental rules which require charges against Government servants to be made in writing, and give them full opportunity for the submission of their defence on each charge, minimizes the danger of failure of justice through the restriction of appeals. Limitation of appeal rights is, of course, contingent on the assumption that such procedure has been observed, and its neglect would, in any case, furnish proper ground for special revision of the case by a higher authority.

G. of I. Res.
Nos. 37-

H.D.
of 29th
July, 1907,

Subject to certain exceptions, every officer of Government should be allowed at least one appeal against orders affecting his prospects materially. Otherwise the appeal rights of Government servants must be left for Local Governments to determine.

684. The extent to which limitation of appeal rights within a Province can be carried out must, we think, be left to the various Local Governments to determine, the more so that the majority of these have not expressed serious dissatisfaction with the existing position.

We consider that every officer of Government should be allowed at least one appeal against any order which affects his prospects materially, e.g., in the case of dismissal, suspension, reduction, or refusal of promotion which depends mainly on considerations of seniority. Subject to the observance of this principle, each Local Government should, as in the past, lay down its own rules, which may vary the rights of appeal according to the status of the public servant dealt with and the character of the punishment. No appeal should, however, be allowed when action desired by the appellant is in the nature of a favour and not of a right, or when an officer fails to obtain an appointment to which considerations of seniority are not usually held to apply.

Para. 565.

685. We have already proposed that appeals from village officers should not go beyond the Collector; and we shall deal in Part III. with the appeal facilities to be allowed to servants of rural boards and municipalities. We may, however, state here that we do not propose to allow such persons the right of appeal to outside authority.

Appeals from village officers and local board servants.

Appeals by members of the public against administrative actions.

686. The regulation of appeals of this description, resting, as they do, upon a mass of laws, rules and executive instructions which vary in different Provinces, is even less susceptible of uniform treatment than the case of appeals by Government servants.

Appeals from members of the public.

Vol. VIII.,
App. II.,
p. 236.

687. The Government of Bombay holds that the present system is liable to no little abuse, and that when a matter has been disposed of upon second appeal, no further appeal should lie except by permission of the appellate authority, and on its certificate that a reasonable ground of appeal exists. On the other hand, the Governments of Madras and the United Provinces, and the chief Commissioner of Baluchistan, are not in favour of material curtailment of existing rights. Attention is, however, drawn, in the United Provinces, to the enormous number of appeals preferred before Commissioners and the Board of Revenue under various Revenue enactments.

Evidence for and against curtailment of such appeals.

The witnesses who dealt with this point generally divide upon lines similar to those taken in the case of appeals by Government officers, although, owing perhaps to the impossibility of adopting any general principle suitable to very various conditions, less desire was expressed for change in the present system.

688. As in the case of appeals from Government officers, we would leave it to each Local Government to determine whether the appeal facilities now allowed in each Province stand in need of amendment. It is desirable to strengthen the hands of Government officers, and to economize the time of their superiors, by giving greater finality to their decisions; while the fact that members of the public have greater freedom than officials in the matter of suing the Government in the courts, renders it less necessary to provide a series of administrative appeals for their protection.

This matter must be left for the Local Governments to determine; but usually it would suffice to allow a single appeal on questions of fact.

On the other hand it is better that executive officers should be able to correct the errors of their subordinates through such appeals than that verdicts should be given against Government in the courts, and appeals of this character afford a superior authority valuable opportunities of gauging the work of subordinates.

It will be for the Local Governments to appraise the relative value of these considerations, but we think that it would usually suffice to allow a single appeal on questions of fact.

and 588.

689. As we have observed in previous chapters, where an administrative appeal lies, it should be to the authority next above the officer who has passed the original order. We do not agree with the suggestion made to us by a non-official witness in Madras that it is desirable to omit a step in the official hierarchy in the course of appeal, in order to obtain a more impartial atmosphere. 9884, 9914-22.

Cases in which appeals should not be allowed.

690. As in the case of Government officers, administrative appeals should not be allowed where the appellant cannot allege that he has been treated unjustly, or has sustained any actual loss, but merely claims some pecuniary or other concession as a matter of grace.

General.

Necessity for strict limitation of revisionary procedure.

691. We desire to draw attention to the danger of allowing special revisionary procedure to be so frequently applied as practically to constitute a fresh appeal which the law, rules, or executive instructions governing the case did not contemplate. We found that this state of things prevails to a considerable extent in some Provinces. While no Local Government, or high officer of such Government, can divest themselves of special revisionary powers in respect of actions of a subordinate authority, the exercise of such powers should be restricted to cases where it is necessary to remedy some flagrant irregularity.*

A suggestion in regard to the disposal of appeals.

692. We have had evidence as to the way in which the consideration of appeals becomes an undue burden on the officers who pass the original orders, through their having to submit elaborate reports dealing with the appellant's allegations at each stage of the appeal proceedings. When an appeal is considered, it should be dealt with, as far as possible, on the original record, and a special report should be called for only in exceptional circumstances.

Undesirable to limit appeals by requiring a certificate from the officer whose order is challenged.

693. A number of witnesses were asked whether appeals could be expediently reduced by requiring, as a condition of their entertainment, a certificate from the officer whose decision is appealed against (or, alternatively, from the first appellate authority) that there was a principle involved of sufficient importance to constitute a reasonable ground of appeal. Most witnesses, however, were opposed to such a method, and we are not in favour of it.†

* Sir F. Lely would allow of revision where, on the face of the proceedings, some material injustice appears to have been done, taking into account in this connexion the character of the order or sentence passed as well as its regularity.

Mr. Dutt urges that as the right of appeal is greatly valued in India, its limitation, as proposed above, would create great dissatisfaction among the people, unless the powers of revision are extended to every case where material injustice appears to have been done.

PART III.

CHAPTER XVIII.

VILLAGE ORGANIZATION.

694. Throughout the greater part of India the village constitutes the primary territorial unit of Government organization, and from the villages are built up the larger administrative entities—tahsils, sub-divisions, and districts. The typical Indian village.

Imperial
Gazetteer,
Vol. IV.,
p. 279.

“The typical Indian village has its central residential site, with an open space for a pond and a cattle stand. Stretching around this nucleus lie the village lands, consisting of a cultivated area and (very often) grounds for grazing and wood-cutting. . . . The inhabitants of such a village pass their life in the midst of these simple surroundings, welded together in a little community with its own organization and government, which differ in character in the various types of villages, its body of detailed customary rules, and its little staff of functionaries, artisans, and traders. It should be noted, however, that in certain portions of India, e.g., in the greater part of Assam, in Eastern Bengal, and on the west coast of the Madras Presidency, the village as here described does not exist, the people living in small collections of houses or in separate homesteads.”

695. The villages above described fall under two main classes, viz. :—

pp. 279–80.

“(1) The ‘severalty’ or raiayatwari village, which is the prevalent form outside Northern India. Here the revenue is assessed on individual cultivators. There is no joint responsibility among the villagers, though some of the non-cultivated lands may be set apart for a common purpose such as grazing, and waste land may be brought under the plough only with the permission of the revenue authorities, and on payment of assessment. The village government vests in a hereditary headman, known by an old vernacular name, such as patel or reddi, who is responsible for law and order, and for the collection of the Government revenue. He represents the primitive headship of the tribe or clan by which the village was originally settled. Raiyatwari and ‘landlord’ villages.

“(2) The joint or landlord village, the type prevalent in the United Provinces, the Punjab and the Frontier Province. Here the revenue was formerly assessed on the village as a whole, its incidence being distributed by the body of superior proprietors, and a certain amount of collective responsibility still as a rule remains. The village site is owned by the proprietary body, who allow residences to the tenantry, artisans, traders and others. The waste land is allotted to the village and, if wanted for cultivation, is partitioned among the shareholders. The village government was originally by the *panchayat or group of heads of superior families. In later times one or more headmen have been added to the organization to represent the village in its dealings with the local authorities ; but the artificial character of this appointment, as compared with that which obtains in a raiyatwari village, is evidenced by the title of its holder, which is generally lambardar, a vernacular derivative from the English word 'number.' It is this type of village to which the well-known description in Sir H. Maine's Village Communities is alone applicable, and here the co-proprietors are in general a local oligarchy with the bulk of the village population as tenants or labourers under them."

* Panchayat comes from panch, ‘five,’ but the body so called is not limited to this number. Many castes in towns and villages have also their own panchayats, which deal with business, social, and religious matters common to the caste.

Disappearance of
autonomy.

696. The Indian villages formerly possessed a large degree of local autonomy, since the native dynasties and their local representatives did not, as a rule, concern themselves with the individual cultivators, but regarded the village as a whole, or some large landholder, as responsible for the payment of the Government revenues, and the maintenance of local order. This autonomy has now disappeared owing to the establishment of local civil and criminal courts, the present revenue and police organization, the increase of communications, the growth of individualism, and the operation of the individual raiyatwari system which is extending even in the north of India. Nevertheless, the village remains the first unit of administration; the principal village functionaries—the headman, the accountant, and the village watchman—are largely utilized and paid by Government, and there is still a certain amount of common village feeling and interests.*

In Bombay proper there is a single headman (or patel) in the smaller villages, exercising revenue and police functions. In the larger villages there are separate revenue and police patels. Police patels have petty criminal powers, and petty civil jurisdiction is exercised by village munsifs appointed under the Deccan Agriculturists Relief Act. The village officers are generally hereditary in the Deccan districts. In Sind such village organization as exists is feudal or tribal rather than communal.

In Bengal and Eastern Bengal there are, as a rule, no recognized headmen of individual villages for Government purposes. These headmen are recognized by Government, report vital statistics, and are supposed to assist the police, but do not collect land revenue. The mels deal privately with cases brought before them for arbitration.

In the United Provinces there are no definite village headmen, and the lambardars there are merely representatives of a number of co-sharers in matters affecting the Government land revenue, while the position in this respect is much the same in the Punjab. revenue, and has power to deal with petty civil and criminal cases. There are village "elders" who take an informal part in the village administration, but are not recognized by law. They assist the headman, however, in distributing the incidence of the thathameda, a rough household tax, in Upper Burma. The Burma law imposes a certain amount of collective responsibility upon the villagers in cases of crime.

In the Central Provinces proper, the village headmen (mukaddams) are merely selected representatives of the landholders. Berar possesses the Deccan system of hereditary patels, but these have no criminal powers.

In Baluchistan and the North-West Frontier Province the organization is tribal rather than by villages, and the connexion of the people with the work of Government is mainly through the jirgas described in Chapter XII.

Artificial organizations.

(i.) In Madras, Local Fund unions have been constituted for the purpose of dealing with village roads, sanitation and lighting; and they are empowered to levy a small house-tax. Their affairs are administered by nominated committees, styled panchayats, with a nominated chairman, and the headman of each village included in the union is ex officio a member of the panchayat. There are nearly 400 of these unions in the Province, the proportion varying in different districts. They do not represent a complete network of petty rural boards, but merely include specially large or important village centres. There are a few unions of a somewhat similar character in the two Bengals.

The administration of these, and the assessment of a local rate, is carried out with the assistance of local committees, which are usually nominated, but include an elective element in the Central Provinces.

Sanitary Committees.

A local tax is levied for the support of this force, and the taxation is in the hands of small panchayats appointed by the District Magistrate. 699. Some witnesses hold that the disintegration of the village communities which has taken place under our administration has gone so far that it is not possible to reconstitute them as reliable entities in any scheme of local self-government. There is, however, a large and strong body of opinion* in favour of enlisting the help of the people in local administration in the villages, by the establishment of administrative village councils which should bear the time-honoured title of panchayat. are largely connected by ties of blood and caste, and have many interests in common ; and the measure of corporate life still existing in the Indian villages, which is shown occasionally by voluntary self-taxation for special purposes, warrant action of this description.*

We do not think it possible, even if it were expedient, to restore the ancient village system, under which the community was responsible for each of its members, and in turn claimed the right to regulate his actions ; but we hold that it is most desirable, alike in the interests of decentralization and in order to associate the people with the local tasks of the administration, that an attempt should be made to constitute and develop village panchayats for the administration of local village affairs.

We are of opinion also that the foundation of any stable edifice which shall associate the people with the administration must be the village, as being an area of much greater antiquity than administrative creations such as tahsils, and one in which the people are known to one another, and have interests which converge on definite and well-recognized objects like water supply and drainage. It is probable, indeed, that the scant success of the efforts hitherto made to introduce a system of rural self-government is largely due to the fact that we have not built up from the bottom.

Difficulties.

700. There are, it is true, many witnesses,† both official and non-official, and especially in Northern India and Sind, who doubt whether the people are sufficiently advanced in education and independence for any measure of village autonomy, and who hold‡ that religious and caste disputes, and the factions so common in village life, will prevent the development of a healthy public spirit. Some anticipate oppression of the lower castes or classes by the higher ; and others point out that, in large estates, the influence of the landlord may prevent free action by his village tenantry. Even those witnesses§ who are not impressed by such fears urge the necessity of a gradual and cautious advance, of judicious and sympathetic guidance, and of outside control, extending even to the supersession of panchayats which may have abused their powers.

A panchayat system must be gradually and cautiously applied.

701. The fact is that the character of villages varies materially, not merely in the different Provinces, but in different areas within the same Province, and even within individual districts and tahsils. They are in different stages of adequate organization for common action, and even where the material for such organization exists, public spirit may be poisoned by caste and faction disputes.

While therefore, we desire the development of a panchayat system, and consider that the objections urged thereto are far from insurmountable, we recognize that such a system can only be gradually and tentatively applied, and that it is impossible to suggest any uniform and definite method of procedure. We think that a commencement should be made by giving certain limited powers to panchayats in those villages in which circumstances are most favourable by reason of homogeneity, natural intelligence, and freedom from internal feuds. These powers might be increased gradually as results warrant, and with success here, it will become easier to apply the system in other villages.

Such a policy, which must be the work of many years, will require great care and discretion, much patience, and judicious discrimination between the circumstances of different villages; and there is a considerable consensus of opinion that this new departure should be made under the special guidance of sympathetic officers.

We do not, however, agree with the suggestion that the organization of village panchayats should be entrusted to the Registrars of Co-operative Credit Societies in the various Provinces, for we deem it essential that the movement should be completely under the eye and hand of the district authorities. Supervision of affairs in the villages is, and should remain, one of the main functions of tahsildars and Sub-divisional officers; but we recognize that, at the outset, it may be desirable to allow a special Assistant to the Collector to organize and develop panchayats throughout a district.

703. Some witnesses consider that several villages should be grouped under a single panchayat, in order to afford a wider field of selection for these local councils, and to minimize obstacles to their effective working which might accrue from local factions or disputes within a village. While recognizing the necessity for latitude to meet special local circumstances, we are not in favour of the general adoption of such a course. It would bring into existence a fresh set of artificial organisms, whereas we consider it essential to utilize the local feelings and interests of the individual villages. The village should, therefore, be the ordinary unit of administration, but grouping might be allowed in special cases, as where villages are small and close together, or where it is absolutely necessary to neutralize village factions.

The ordinary unit of panchayat administration should be the individual village.

704. The village council or panchayat should be a small body. The precise number must depend upon local circumstances, but five would, we think, be a good average. Where there is a recognized village headman who is personally competent, he should, we think, be ex officio chairman of the panchayat, as being ex hypothesi the most influential person in the village.†

† Sir F. Lely and Mr. Meyer think, further, that while the hereditary system in respect to village officers is valuable, the Sub-divisional officer should have power to select the best qualified man from a family which has hereditary claims, and to keep him in office so long as he is of good behaviour. The system of primogeniture as applied in Madras, and the Bombay method of distributing village posts among members of hereditary families, allowing each member only a term of office of some five years, obviously militate against the universal efficiency of the village officers.

villagers as a whole, while it would encourage interference by subordinate officers of Government, upon whose recommendations most of the nominations would have to be made. We agree, therefore, with those who desire that there should be a system of election, but we do not contemplate any method which would introduce into the villages the unfamiliar machinery of lists of qualified voters and ballot boxes. What we have in view is a system of informal selection by the villagers, at a meeting called for the purpose by the tahsildar, the Sub-divisional officer, or the special officer for panchayats where one exists. At this meeting the raiyats would be asked to indicate the persons whom they considered best fitted to sit on the village council. In most cases a satisfactory selection would soon be made, but in the event of the meeting showing the existence of acute faction or caste feelings, it would be necessary—if a panchayat was to be constituted in these circumstances—for the presiding officer to see that it contained representatives of different interests.

Where there is no recognized village headman, the chairman of the panchayat should be selected in a similar manner.

Term of office.

706. The precise period for which a member of a panchayat should continue to hold office must be determined by the Local Governments with reference to varying local conditions. While, however, we consider that the villagers should have opportunities of reconsidering the choice they had originally made, it would be undesirable to make elections at all frequent, and a man once appointed should, so long as he remains of good behaviour, hold office for a substantial term of years and be eligible for re-election. The Sub-divisional officer should have the power of removing any member of a panchayat whom he considers to have shown himself grossly unfit for his post.

Vacancies in the panchayats should be filled up, as convenient, in the same way as the original appointments.

Functions of panchayats to be gradually and cautiously bestowed.

707. Many duties and powers have been suggested* for these panchayats, but even those witnesses whose proposals take the widest range would confer them only by degrees and as justified by experiment. We too consider that functions must be gradually and cautiously assigned, and that they must vary with the circumstances of the locality and with the manner in which the panchayat discharges the duties first placed upon it. We make, however, the following general suggestions.

A panchayat should have civil and criminal jurisdiction in petty cases.

708. A panchayat should have civil and criminal jurisdiction in petty cases arising within the village.

We were told in the Punjab that the Native States of Patiala and Faridkot had recently instituted zail† or village panchayats for the disposal of petty civil and criminal cases, and that the results so far had been good.

Some witnesses hold that the exercise of such powers might lead to injustice, through faction, corruption, or undue personal influence; and the opinion has also been expressed that as popular sentiment has become accustomed to regular courts, it would not now tolerate a more summary and informal procedure.‡ On the other hand, such jurisdiction is already exercised by individual headmen or munsifs in several Provinces, and it seems to us that it would be still better discharged by a small collective panchayat. It is also most desirable to relieve the regular courts, to prevent the people from having to undertake long journeys for the settlement of paltry disputes, and to check the habit of undue litigation which is so prevalent in some parts of India. Village benches may no doubt occasionally make mistakes, but neither are the stipendiary courts infallible; and false evidence, and the power of the purse, have less chance of prevailing in a tribunal which is directly under the influence of local public opinion and which can readily ascertain the real facts.*

In Burma, where the headmen already exercise powers of this description individually, the weight of the evidence was against associating the village elders with him; but it seems to us that the elders are a valuable element in village administration, and that if their existence and responsibilities are not specifically recognized, they may tend to die out. Such want of specific recognition apparently led, in the past, to a substantial diminution in the powers of village headmen in Lower Burma.†

710. The procedure in panchayat courts should be under very simple rules, and we agree with those witnesses who hold that the parties should appear in person and not through lawyers, and that appeals should not be allowed, though the regular courts might be given special revisional jurisdiction in cases where there appears to have been some grave miscarriage of justice. To do more than this, and to allow the decisions of the panchayats to be governed by the technicalities of ordinary legal procedure, with full facilities for appeal, would, we think, be fatal to the success of the system we propose. What we desire is a village court of equity, and not a necessarily bad imitation of the regular law courts.

A panchayat might be entrusted with village sanitation, and with expenditure on certain minor works.

It is generally admitted by persons conversant with Indian conditions that the attempt to force rural sanitation from above has failed, and we think it desirable to encourage panchayats to keep their villages clean in their own way. A fair chance should also be given to them to show that they can do justice to other communal work, of the character above described.

Another function which may be given to panchayats likely to take an intelligent interest in education, is the construction and maintenance of village school houses according to the ordinary standards of the country. This system appears to have been already adopted, in part, in Burma and Assam, and we should like to see it tried elsewhere, in preference to recourse, as lately in Madras, to the more expensive agency of the Public Works Department.

And with the construction and maintenance of school houses, and some local control in respect to school management,

We would also allow the panchayats some local control over the village school in such matters as hours of attendance, holidays, prizes and (subject to general rules) the exemption of poor children from school fees. In some provinces—Bombay for instance—there appears to be even now a village school committee which occasionally visits the school and makes suggestions, and if the panchayat were constituted the school committee, and given some definite powers, it would obviously take more interest in these matters.

But certain matters must be left to the sub-district boards.

The appointment of the schoolmaster, the educational curriculum, and the inspection of the school, must, however, be left to the sub-district boards of which we treat in the next chapter, for the teaching staff could not be safely made dependent on the favour of a few influential villagers.* In villages in which caste feelings are acute, special outside provision may also have to be made for the education of low-caste children.

Desirability of developing primary education by grants in aid to indigenous institutions.

713. In short, though the panchayats cannot have the full control of the village rate-aided schools, they should be encouraged by the bestowal of positive powers to take as much interest in them as possible. We regard it, further, as very important that the development of primary education should be preferably by grants in aid to indigenous institutions, where such can be utilized, including the monastic schools in Burma, and the mullah and Koran schools in Sind, the Frontier Province and Baluchistan. Agencies of this sort will be more utilized if the panchayats are given some voice in local education.

714. We would also commit to selected panchayats the management of small fuel and fodder reserves in conformity with a few simple and essential rules.† This would be in accordance with the policy suggested by the Government of India in 1894 in a Resolution to which we have referred in Chapter VI. The fact that some previous experiments in this direction are said to have been turned by influential villagers to their own gain, and to have eventually failed, suggests, however, that a new trial should be confined, in the first instance, to specially selected places.

We think that the management of the village cattle pound, and of a market which is of purely local importance, might be safely handed over to these bodies. As regards matters appertaining to revenue, agricultural loans, or the distribution of irrigation water, while we do not say that these should always remain outside the scope of the panchayats' duties, we think that the village councils will, at the outset, be fully employed in the discharge of the functions we have already suggested for them. panchayat which is working efficiently would, however, form an obvious and useful auxiliary in regard to measures against famine or epidemics.

716. In matters entrusted to them the panchayats should be judged by general results, and an occasional failure must be expected and should not be dealt with harshly. If, however, a panchayat shows that it is definitely unfit for the exercise of particular powers, these must obviously be withdrawn, and the proper person to do this should be the Sub-divisional officer, or the special officer for panchayats where one exists.

Panchayats should be judged by general results.

717. Where legislation is required to admit of the grant of powers to panchayats as suggested above, it should be of a very general character, containing wide rule-making powers, so as to enable local authorities to provide for different circumstances and gradual progress.

718. We consider it essential to the popularity and efficiency of the panchayat system that it should not be associated with any new form of local taxation, for the evidence shows that the imposition of taxation of this character has made such bodies as the existing unions and sanitary committees unpopular. Still less should such bodies receive power to raise loans, as was suggested by Sir H. Risley.

The panchayat system should not involve fresh local taxation.

(i.) The assignment to it of a portion of the land cess levied for local board purposes in the village. We have had evidence that many villages do not now receive any material advantage in return for the share of this cess which they now pay.

33489.

(ii.) Special grants, for particular objects of local improvement, to be made by sub-district boards or Collectors.

33489.

(iii.) The receipts from village cattle pounds or markets which may be entrusted to its management.

33489.

(iv.) Small fees on civil suits filed before it.

In dealing with the funds entrusted to them, panchayats should be subject to very simple rules and not to rigid audit.

The amounts placed at the disposal of a panchayat need not be fully expended within each financial year; balances could accumulate to the credit of a village fund until such time as they can be utilized to real purpose.

720. Finally, it is most desirable that the work of panchayats should be free from interference by the lower Government subordinates. Men of this class have their own reasons for opposing any real local control.

Non-interference by lower Government subordinates.

721. With the panchayat system thus developed, we do not consider it necessary to retain the artificial local agencies we have already referred to, such as village unions, sanitary committees, and the chaukidari unions in Bengal for purposes outside those connected with police. Where villages now under this sort of administration are not of a sufficiently urban character to justify their being placed under town panchayats of the kind we refer to in Chapter XX, they might be merged in the ordinary village panchayat system.

722. It has been suggested by some witnesses that village panchayats should be placed under district or sub-district boards. We are not in favour of such a plan. The powers and responsibilities which we suggest for these boards in the following chapter will give them full employment, and they cannot be competent to deal with large numbers of village panchayats in different stages of development, or to determine how far the powers of such bodies can be increased. The supervision of panchayat affairs must rest with the local officers of Government, and it will be for them to afford the requisite guidance, and to determine when new panchayats may be brought into existence, and in what measure the powers of existing panchayats should be increased, or, if necessary, diminished or taken away. The sub-district boards may, as we have suggested, give grants to panchayats for objects of local utility, and can, of course, cease to give these if they consider that previous grants have not been well applied. They will also come into contact with the panchayats in the matter of the management of village schools, but their control should stop there.

Evidence that in some Provinces village officers are underpaid, and corrupt.

723. We have had evidence, in some Provinces, as to the present under-payment of village officers, and their resort to corrupt practices, and we think that this matter ought to receive the serious attention of the Indian Governments.

The Punjab zail system.

725. The Punjab, and apparently the Frontier Province also, has a system of zails, or groups of villages, at the head of which is a zaildar, who supervises the village lambardars and receives remuneration from Government. In some districts these zaildars tend to become hereditary, and we have had evidence that they are a useful element in connecting the administration with the people.

CHAPTER XIX.

RURAL BOARDS.

Commencement of local taxation and local committees in rural areas.

726. The establishment of boards for dealing with local affairs in rural areas is a relatively recent development of British rule in India. When the Crown took over the government of the country in 1858 such boards did not exist, though some semi-voluntary funds for local improvements had been raised in Madras and Bombay, while in Bengal and the United Provinces consultative committees assisted the district officers in the management of funds devoted to local schools, roads, and dispensaries.

Imperial
Gazetteer,
Vol. IV.,
pp. 298-9.

The system of raising cesses on land for purposes of this description was introduced by legislation in Madras and Bombay between the years 1865 and 1869.

Constitution of rural boards or committees in 1871.

727. "The year 1871 saw a wide development of legislation for local [administrative] purposes, partly due to growing needs, and partly the result of the financial decentralization scheme of Lord Mayo's Government. In that year Acts were passed for Madras, Bengal, the present United Provinces of Agra and Oudh, and the Punjab, while Bombay remained satisfied with the existing law. The new Madras Act divided the country into local fund circles, and constituted, for their administration, consultative boards nominated by the Government and under the presidency of the Collector. The Bengal Road Cess Act of 1871 provided for the levy of a rate on real property for the improvement of communications, and established local bodies who might be either nominated or elected by the ratepayers. The new scheme of Provincial finance made it essential for the Governments of the United Provinces and the Punjab to supplement their resources by local taxation, and the Acts passed for these Provinces authorized the levy of a rate on land, and the constitution of local committees to administer the funds. In both cases the members of the committees were nominated."

Vide para. 57. settlements with the Provinces then under consideration, the Government of Lord Ripon addressed the Local Governments in October, 1881, on the subject of the extension of local self-government in municipalities and rural areas. As regards rural boards, the policy then suggested was as follows :—

Cir. letter

Oct., 1881,
No. 3515.

"His Excellency in Council is disposed, primâ facie, to consider the most desirable and effective policy to be that of concentrating all the local administrations, other than that embraced by municipalities, in the hands of one committee for each district, having ancillary subordinate sub-committees for each tahsil or sub-division (as the case may be). Of the former the Magistrate and Collector would be president, of the latter the assistant or deputy in charge of the sub-division would be chairman, and in each case the local body should comprise persons not in the service of Government, and elected or nominated, as may seem best, in a proportion not less than from one-half to two-thirds. In districts where more than one committee now exists for different objects, the possibility of their amalgamation should be considered ; where no such committees have yet been formed, their constitution is evidently desirable. Special attention will be required in settling the relations between the various Local Governments and the officers of the general administration, and in providing for a certain measure of control and inspection on the part of the Government. It would be hopeless to expect any real development of self-government if local bodies were subject to check and interference in matters of detail ; and the respective powers of Government and of the various local bodies should be clearly and distinctly defined by statute, so that there may be as little risk of friction and misunderstanding as possible. Within the limits to be laid down in each case, however, the Governor-General in Council is anxious that the fullest possible liberty of action should be given to local bodies."

Res. of 18th May,
1882, No.
17/747-59.

729. On consideration of the replies of the Local Governments, the Government of India issued an important Resolution on the subject of local self-government, which, as regards rural boards, somewhat modified the policy proposed in October 1881. This Resolution, while laying down certain general principles as a basis for legislation, recognized that their application must vary very considerably in different parts of the country, and that large discretion must be left to the Local Governments on this point. The view of the Government of India, as there developed, was that district committees or boards had failed to secure the attendance of members possessing local knowledge of outlying parts of the district, with the result that undue attention was paid to the area adjoining the district headquarters, or that the business fell into the hands of the Collector. They therefore modified the previous suggestion to constitute one ment in May,

committee for each district, and expressed a desire that "the smallest administrative unit—the sub-division, the taluk or the tahsil—should ordinarily form the maximum area to be placed under a local board." It was suggested that in some Provinces these boards might perhaps remain independent, sending delegates to a district council for the settlement of matters of common interest, while in others a district board with controlling powers might be thought best. It was, however, laid down that "the cardinal principle, which is essential to the success of self-government in any shape is this, that the jurisdiction of the primary boards must be so limited in area as to ensure both local knowledge and local interest on the part of each of the members."

730. These boards were to have a large preponderance of non-official members, chosen where practicable, by some system of election; but the widest discretion as to the form of election was left to Local Governments. Again, in modification of their previous views, the Government of India now desired that non-official persons should, when possible, act as presidents of local boards.

731. Outside control over the boards' proceedings was to be exercised :—

(i.) By requiring previous sanction to certain acts.

(ii.) By retaining the power of intervention in case of neglect or default, this power extending, in the last resort, to suspension of a delinquent board.

This Resolution resulted in fresh legislation for the principal Provinces between the years 1883 and 1885, and the organization then introduced is still, for the most part, in force.

Terminology.

732. Before discussing the existing position and the alterations which may be desirable therein, we would clear the way by defining the terminology we propose to use. At present the same term is differently applied in various Provinces; thus in the two Bengals the term "local board" is used to denote sub-district boards only, while in Madras and Bombay it includes both district and sub-district boards. We think that the term "rural boards" should be used to cover both district and sub-district boards, while the term "local boards" should include municipalities also, as it does in Lord Ripon's Local Self-Government Resolution of the 18th May, 1882.

Character of rural boards at present existing.

733. The general position is now as follows. In 10090, Burma and Baluchistan there are as yet no rural boards.* Vol. IX., App. II., p. 219. 19453. Assam is the only Province where the scheme of independent boards for an area smaller than a district has been tried, and here there is no 'district council' to settle matters of common interest. In all other Provinces the system adopted was that of controlling district boards with subordinate sub-district boards. In Madras and Bengal the revenue sub-division was chosen as the jurisdictional unit for these boards†, while in other Provinces the unit was the taluka or tahsil. 10091, 10125-6, 11414-8.

In the United Provinces the sub-district or tahsil boards have recently been abolished as useless, and in the 27980-1, 27986.

* In Burma there are, however, district funds under the management of the Deputy Commissioner, from which expenditure is incurred on minor roads and some other local objects, and in Lower Burma the receipts of these funds are largely drawn from a cess on the land.

† Sub-divisional boards do not exist in a few of the smaller Bengal districts.

39380. Punjab the tahsil board has gradually disappeared, except 24949, in a few districts. Taluk or tahsil boards still exist in 33158-9, Bombay and the Central Provinces, and in those 36030. Provinces they are, in effect, the subordinate committees contemplated by the Government of India in October 1881.
 17620-2, They have very limited powers and resources, getting as 19455, a rule, merely such monies as the district board allots to 25123, them. The sub-divisional boards of the two Bengals 27147-9, occupy much the same position, but those in Madras have 33489. a higher status.* They get half the land cess levied in their areas, as well as certain miscellaneous revenues ; and they have original jurisdiction, under the general control, of the district boards in regard to the less important roads, primary education, medical work, and sanitation.

734. There are also a number of Local Fund village Local Fund unions, working under sub-divisional boards, in Madras unions.
 and in the two Bengals, but we have recommended in the preceding chapter that these bodies, and the sanitary committees which exist in some Provinces, should be replaced by village or town panchayats.

17696, 26978-83, 735. There is a considerable amount of evidence that Unsatisfactory 18709-14, 32814-6, the sub-district boards now existing in the two Bengals, character of most 22940-1, 35653-60, Bombay, the Central Provinces, and the Punjab have not sub-district

 26220, difficult to obtain good men as members, or to induce the boards to take an adequate interest in their work.

15993-4, Some witnesses, therefore, would apparently regard Suggestions made 19566-8, the abolition of these bodies with equanimity, and for reform.
 23362-5, would concentrate efforts for reform upon the district
 23651-2, board, on the ground that there is not room for two sets 35811-2, of rural boards in one district. †Others, however, desired that the sub-district boards should have greater powers and larger resources ; while a few went so far as to propose vesting all local rates and services discharged therefrom in the sub-district boards. Under this last scheme the district board would either be abolished, or practically transformed into an advisory council to the Collector.

736. We are strongly in favour of the principle Sub-district enunciated by Lord Ripon's Government in 1882 that sub- boards should district boards should form an essential part in the scheme be universally of local self-government, that they should have adequate established, with resources and a large measure of independence, and that adequate powers their jurisdiction should be so limited in area as and resources.
 to ensure both local knowledge and interest on the part of the members, and be at the same time a unit well known to the people. We think that the admitted failure of sub-district boards, as a whole, has been largely due to the circumscription of their powers and resources. In Madras and Assam, where they have had a freer scope, they appear to have achieved some measure of success, and we consider that, as local self-government should commence in the villages with the establishment of village panchayats, so the next step should be the constitution of boards for areas of smaller size than a district. We desire, therefore, to see sub-district boards universally established, as the principal agencies of rural board administration.

* The Madras sub-district boards are styled "taluk boards" ;
 but the appellation is misleading, as their jurisdictional area is not the taluk, but the district sub-division, which usually covers two or more taluks.

† 17838, 19181-3, 19826-32, 19969-70, 26425, 27244,
 27249-50, 34167.

The sub-district board area should ordinarily be the taluk or tahsil.

We think that the taluk or tahsil will ordinarily be the best jurisdictional unit for sub-district boards of this description, but we do not desire to press for change where sub-divisional boards have been working, or may be made to work, satisfactorily by enlisting public interest in their proceedings. It is not desirable that there should be both taluk and sub-divisional boards in the same district.

General character of functions to be assigned to district boards.

737. On the other hand we are not in agreement with those who would eliminate the district board as a direct instrument of local self-government. Political education must necessarily be a slow growth. Hitherto sub-district boards have, for the most part, enjoyed very small powers, and it would be undesirable to rush to the other extreme and give them full responsibility for local self-government in rural areas. Moreover, local political and business talent is largely concentrated at the headquarters of districts, and it would be unwise not to utilize this for the needs of the districts as a whole. In our opinion a district board can play a useful part in the exercise of functions which the smaller boards are not so well fitted to discharge, such as the upkeep and construction of the main roads of a district; and by recruiting for certain branches of work which the sub-district boards will control, but which are common in character to the whole district.

17318-9,
21533,
25847-9,
26002-10.

The district board should have separate resources, and be able to supplement those of sub-district boards.

738. The district board should also be possessed of funds which will enable it to supplement the resources of the poorer sub-district boards. The circumstances of different tahsils within the same district often vary; one may be relatively well off, and another poor and sparsely populated, and at the same time in considerable need of works of local development. A system which gave the whole of the rates to sub-district boards would place these poorer areas at a serious disadvantage.

Again, as we shall point out later, it will be necessary for the resources of rural boards to be largely supplemented by Government grants, and in the matter of such grants it would be much more difficult for the Local Government to deal adequately with the large number of sub-district boards, which we desire to see established throughout the Provinces, than with entire districts.

739. As we propose that district and sub-district boards should have separate functions, it is desirable that these bodies should be possessed of resources, as far as possible, independent of one another. The arguments we have adduced against making the Government of India dependent for their revenues on contributions from the Local Governments apply also in the smaller sphere of district and sub-district boards.

Para. 67.

General character of system now proposed.

740. We are, therefore, not in favour of one suggestion put forward in the Government of India Resolution of the 18th May, 1882, that district boards should be mere councils of delegates from the sub-district bodies for the discussion of matters of common interest, and we may note that this system has never yet been found practicable.

On the other hand, we do not propose a system under which the sub-district boards shall be mere local agencies for the board of the whole district. The plan we favour is a via media, under which the sub-district boards will have independent resources, separate spheres of duty, and large responsibilities within these; while the district board, besides undertaking some direct functions for which it seems specially fitted, and to the exercise of which the people are well accustomed, will possess co-ordinating and financial powers in respect to the district as a whole. We should thus maintain the administrative unity of the district, while giving a large amount of autonomy to the boards of its constituent areas.*

741. We now proceed to discuss the functions, resources, internal constitution, &c. of rural boards, and the amount of outside control which should be exercised over their proceedings ; and in so doing we shall indicate in greater detail the relative functions which we propose to assign to the district and the sub-district boards.

Functions.

742. The main normal functions of rural boards are at present the maintenance and improvement of roads and other communications, education—especially in its primary stages—the upkeep of medical institutions, vaccination, sanitation, veterinary work, the construction and maintenance of markets and rest houses, and the charge of pounds and ferries. They may also be called upon to devote their funds to famine relief, and to cope with plague and other special epidemics. Statistics show that in the year 1905-6, rural boards and municipalities were together responsible for 35 per cent. of the total expenditure incurred on roads and buildings in British India, for 43 per cent. of that appertaining to medical work and sanitation, and for 47 per cent. of that on education.

743. Some witnesses have suggested that rural boards might have control in respect to such matters as the disposal of civil and criminal work, the policing and lighting of villages, and the location of liquor shops. These, however, are matters which, in so far as they can be entrusted to local popular agency in rural tracts, should fall within the sphere of the village panchayats. They cannot be expediently handed over to boards representing relatively large areas.

Matters which it is undesirable to entrust to rural boards.

744. It was also suggested in the Government of India's Resolution of 18th May, 1882, that local boards should be entrusted with the assessment and collection of the licence tax. This tax has, however, long been merged in an income tax of much more general application, the administration of which must, we consider, like that of other Imperial taxes, remain under Government management.

745. On the whole, the evidence was against the extension of the functions of rural boards, what was really needed being, it was held, that these bodies should have larger resources for the work already falling upon them, and

A local board should control a service for which it pays.

* Sir S. Edgerley considers that the system first mentioned in the Government of India Resolution of May, 1882, under which the smallest administrative unit is the local board, and the district board becomes a federal council of delegates for common objects financed by the sub-district boards, is well worthy of serious consideration. The policy of giving the district boards a position of financial, as well as administrative, control over the sub-district boards has had a long trial, and, according to the evidence offered, has not, in his opinion justified itself in any Province from the point of view of the policy of 1882. He considers that the former system gives more promise of the development of real local self-government, and that any Local Government, therefore, should now be at liberty to give it a trial if it so desires. In any case, Government grants should go direct from the treasury to the local authority which controls the service which the grant is to subsidize.

greater authority in respect of matters falling within their sphere. This is our point of view also. We think that the administrative duties already assigned to rural boards are quite large enough, and indeed that they require to be curtailed in some respects ; but that the boards should have much greater independence than they now possess in respect to the functions left to them. The cardinal principle should be that a local board should control a service for which it pays, and that where it is expedient that the control should be wholly or largely in the hands of Government, the Government should take over such service altogether.

Trunk roads should be Provincial. The main local roads should be maintained by the district boards, and minor roads by the sub-district boards.

746. Roads, etc.—In Madras, Bengal and Eastern Bengal the roads in rural areas have, with very slight exceptions, been handed over to the rural boards. In the Central Provinces, on the other hand, these only deal with unmetalled roads. In the other Provinces the more important roads are, to a greater or less extent, dealt with as Provincial works, the rest being left to the rural boards.

We think that routes of general trade or through traffic should be maintained by Government, that the main local roads should be a charge of district boards, that sub-district boards should be responsible for minor roads, i.e., those situated within the tahsil or other sub-district area.

District board engineers.

747. In Madras and the two Bengals the district boards entertain well-paid and fairly well qualified district engineers. In the other Provinces,* and this applies also to the sub-divisional boards in Assam, they only employ overseers to deal with their minor roads, the rest being maintained for them by the Government engineering staff, for whose labours they generally pay a percentage on the value of the work done. While some witnesses are satisfied with this system, others hold that it would be more satisfactory for the boards in these Provinces to have their own engineering staff. They can now, it is true, select the works to be done for them by Government agency, and vote the amounts to be allotted for upkeep or construction, but it is thought that they would have a more effective control if the work was carried out by their own servants. The Chief Engineers in Bombay and the United Provinces saw no objections to district boards having their own engineers, provided they could afford to engage competent men, but the Public Works Secretary to the Government of India held that this system would involve unnecessary expense.

The question is really one of expediency and of ways and means. In districts where there are sufficient works falling under rural boards to justify the special appointment of a trained engineer, a district board which desires to entertain such an officer, and can afford to pay him an adequate salary, should, we think, be permitted to do this.†

Where, however, it is arranged between a district board and Government that the Government engineers should perform this duty, the latter should be under the financial control of the boards in respect to such work.

* 23004-8, 27308, 27612, 27951-3, 29001-2, 32868, 32892-4, 33387-91, 36037-40, 36812-6, 38722-3, 41812-7, 41882.

† A special additional engineer has lately been appointed in the Central Provinces, to do work for the rural boards and the smaller municipalities of the Nagpur division.

748. District boards should in any case maintain an adequate staff of overseers, etc., for their own works and those of sub-district boards, placing a certain number of these at the disposal of the latter. A general district service of this sort will be more efficient and economical than separate services maintained by each sub-district board.

Road overseers, etc., should be a district staff.

749. At present, rural boards have to obtain outside sanction in respect to roads and other public works estimates involving any considerable amount, the limits varying for different Provinces. Thus, in Madras, all estimates of over Rs. 2,500, relating to building or masonry, or to work of a special or unusual character, have to be scrutinized professionally by the Government Superintending Engineer, while works of over Rs. 5,000 require the Local Government's sanction. In Bombay, the plans and estimates of all road works costing, on an average, more than Rs. 50 per mile, or Rs. 500 in all, must be prepared or approved by Government engineers. In Eastern Bengal, estimates of over Rs. 500 in amount have now to go to the Inspector of local-fund works, who is here the Executive Engineer; and, if above Rs. 5,000, to the Commissioner also. In Bengal there appear to be restrictions of a somewhat similar character, though the actual limit varies according to the qualifications of the district board engineer. In the United Provinces, estimates for any work over Rs. 1,000 have to go to the Government district engineer and the Commissioner, and those above Rs. 10,000 to the Superintending Engineer and the Local Government.

Some complaint has been made as to the stringency of these provisions, and it is clear that they constitute a large interference with the discretionary powers of the rural boards in regard to works. We consider that such restrictions should be swept away, and that district and sub-district boards should have full powers in the allotment of funds, and the passing of estimates for works, within their respective spheres of duty. They should, however, have the right to call upon the Government engineering staff to furnish advice and assistance in respect to the preparation of estimates or otherwise, whenever they think it desirable to ask for such aid.

Present restrictions on rural boards in the matter of public works estimates should be abrogated.

750. In the two Bengals the district boards' engineers formerly constructed and maintained a good many buildings and other Government works, the Government paying the boards for their services. This system has, however, been very largely set aside of late years. The Public Works Secretary to the Government of India, and Government engineers in the two Provinces concerned, justify this change on the ground that the agency of the district board engineers was unsatisfactory. On the other hand where, as in Eastern Bengal, there is practically only one Government Executive Engineer for each Commissioner's division, it is not likely that he can effectively supervise work throughout such a large area. Given a competent district-board engineering staff, there seems no reason why it should not also execute minor works for Government; but it should be left to the discretion of the Local Governments to employ the board engineers in this way, with the consent of the district boards under whom they serve. The fact of such consent being required would meet the objection, which has been raised, that the board engineers might neglect their own duties for Government work. 22905-17.

Educational
boards.

751. Education.—Rural boards are generally concerned with primary schools, though in Madras girls' schools are largely Provincial. They also deal with middle vernacular schools in Madras, the two Bengals, the United Provinces and the Central Provinces; while in the Punjab they have hitherto been made to pay for secondary schools which are managed by the Education Department.

A number of witnesses held that the boards should be concerned with primary schools only, the responsibility for schools of a higher character resting with the Local Government. We are of opinion that rural boards might have charge of middle vernacular as well as of primary education, provided that their duties in respect of the latter are fully discharged. We consider, however, that high schools, and all institutions in which teaching is given in English, should, in all cases, be a direct Government charge.

The management of rural boards'
schools largely in the hands of the Education Department.

752. In Bengal the boards generally aid schools under private management, while in Bombay board schools greatly outnumber such private establishments. Madras, the United Provinces, the Punjab, and the Central Provinces occupy an intermediate position, Madras tending towards the Bengal system, and the other Provinces to that of Bombay.

In Bombay the schools are under the management of the Education Department, the boards doing little more than to vote money for their upkeep, and decide on their location and general character. In other Provinces the boards are supposed to concern themselves with the management of the schools, but as a matter of fact this is largely handed over to the Education Department. The Provinces in which the boards have most real control appear to be the United Provinces, the Central Provinces and the two Bengals. In the United Provinces deputy-inspectors of schools are under the boards, but the Director of Public Instruction desires that they should be made a Provincial agency, and such a change has lately been effected in respect to sub-inspectors of schools in Bengal. In Madras the boards maintain a few supervisors of schools, but the ordinary inspecting agency is Provincial.

Proper powers of sub-district boards in educational matters.

753. The Local Governments make substantial contributions towards the educational expenditure of the boards, but we do not think this a valid argument for taking the practical management out of the hands of these bodies. Evidence has been given that they do not take any real interest in educational matters; and this is not unnatural since they are so closely restricted by departmental rules and Provincial educational codes, which settle the school curricula, the extent to which grants-in-aid may be given, the proportion of masters to scholars, holidays, etc., that their management can be little more than nominal.

We think that the sub-district boards, which should deal with education, should have reasonable latitude in these matters; that the appointment and promotion of the board-school teachers should be in their hands; that they should have discretion in regard to the extent to which they will aid private institutions; and that they should not, as now for instance in the Central Provinces, have to obtain the sanction of the Director of Public Instruction before they can close a school. We think, too, that the boards should be encouraged to maintain their own inspecting staff. If they lack an inspecting agency of their own, they cannot be acquainted with the circumstances of the schools within their jurisdiction, and questions relating to the aid to be given to private schools, or to the organization of board schools and the recruitment and promotion of their staffs, will continue, as now, to be mainly in the hands of the Education Department.

754. Most of the educational officers are against such a policy, mainly on the ground that it would lead to loss of efficiency. While realising that this may be so, we consider that departmental efficiency must here give way to the education of the people in local self-government, and that the boards should have the freer hand which we advocate. It is also important that primary education should be adapted to the needs of the people, and this can best be effected by giving local boards direct responsibility for its evolution and management.

In view, however, of the political importance of a sound system of elementary education, we consider that there should be a further inspection of board and aided schools on behalf of Government, in order that the Government may be informed of the character and working of these institutions, and may be able to intervene in case reform is called for.*

We have also emphasized the need of fostering and developing indigenous schools, and we consider that rural boards should, as far as possible, promote education by grants-in-aid to private institutions rather than through board schools.

In most Provinces, too, the hospital assistants and assistant surgeons employed in boards' hospitals and dispensaries are Government officers lent to the district boards.† In Bengal and Eastern Bengal, on the other

* Sir F. Lely and Sir S. Edgerley are against giving sub-district boards the functions of school inspection, and promotion and disciplinary control of teachers. They consider that Government is bound to retain a full right of inspection, and that a double staff is wasteful; that it is perfectly simple for the boards to have full information as to the schools under a system of Government inspection; and that no sub-district board can adequately administer staff or curricula. They further think that the non-professional control of village primary schools should gradually be transferred from the sub-district boards to the panchayats.

Proper functions of rural boards
in regard to
(a) Medical work.

758. We consider that the hospital at each district headquarters, which will usually, however, be under a municipality, should be directly taken over by Government, as we understand is already the case in Bombay, on the ground that these hospitals serve rural as well as municipal areas, that they afford treatment to a considerable number of Government servants, and that they should be models for the rest of the district. Other hospitals and dispensaries in rural tracts should, ordinarily, be under the control of the sub-district boards, and the staff of assistant surgeons and hospital assistants employed therein should, as far as possible, be converted into regular board servants.*

This staff should, however, like that employed on the roads, be a district service, officers being placed by the district board at the disposal of the sub-district boards. The district boards would ordinarily recruit for this service men possessed of qualifications approved by the Provincial Inspector-General of Civil Hospitals†; but they might indent for the loan of a Government officer when they found it necessary to do this.

(b) Vaccination.

759. Vaccination.—In Bombay the vaccination staff, which was formerly Provincial, has recently been localized. In other Provinces the superior officers are Provincial, but the vaccinators are, or are tending to become, district board servants, though the boards have little control over their work, which is supervised by deputy inspectors of vaccination and by the district Civil Surgeons.‡

(c) Sanitation.

760. Sanitation.—Village sanitation, as recommended in the preceding chapter, should where possible, be a function of the village panchayats, which should receive grants from the sub-district board for this purpose. Sanitation in rural areas not served by panchayats should be a function of the sub-district boards; but in so far as local sanitary inspectors are required, they should, like the roads and medical staff, be drawn from a district service, recruited and appointed by the district board. We recognize, however, the objection to multiplying the number of peripatetic subordinates.

The district or Civil Surgeon now usually acts as a general health officer for the district§, but it may eventually be necessary, in some cases at any rate, for the district boards to entertain health officers of their own.

Special financial restrictions on sanitary work unnecessary.

Para. 368.

We think that rural boards should have full discretion in allotting funds to sanitary works, and in the carrying out of these; but they should be entitled to obtain advice and assistance from the Sanitary Board, the Sanitary Commissioner and the Provincial Sanitary Engineer.

762. Veterinary work.—When the Civil Veterinary Department was organized, it was intended that local veterinary relief should be a function of the rural boards. They now pay largely for this work, but, in most Provinces, have very little control over it, the staff having been provincialized. This policy is defended on the ground of efficiency, and of the want of interest taken by district boards in veterinary work. In present circumstances we think that this work should be made entirely Provincial, and that the boards should not be obliged to contribute to a service which they do not control. Later on, however, as the scope of veterinary operations develops, it may be desirable to hand over the local management to such district boards as wish to undertake it.

763. Famine relief and plague.—Famine and plague are special visitations, involving large expenditure, which ought, we consider, to be defrayed by the Provincial Government. At present the Local Boards Acts* in the various Provinces make the rural boards liable for these charges, and the liability seems to have been enforced to a considerable extent. In the Punjab, for instance, the boards are made to pay as much as the Local Government thinks they can afford towards famine and plague.

Rural boards should be relieved of famine and plague, and some other, charges.

Para. 62.

The fact that the Government of India have recently undertaken liability for a large proportion of the famine expenditure which would formerly have fallen upon Provincial Governments, should facilitate the relief of rural boards by the latter.

Act V., Madras, of 1884, secs. 57-8, as amended by Act VI. of 1900.

765. Light railways and tramways.—In Madras a district board may levy a special extra land-cess of three pies in the rupee on the annual rent value of land for the construction of light railways or tramways, provided that such tax has been voted for by not less than three-fourths of the members of the board present at a meeting specially convened for this purpose, and that their resolution is confirmed, after a period of six months, by a like majority at a like meeting, and is sanctioned by the Local Government. In a few districts in Bengal, and in one in Sind, district boards have also promoted railways or tramways from their ordinary resources.

Principal assets
of rural boards.

766. The principal asset of the rural boards is derived from a cess which they are empowered to levy upon the land, and which usually does not exceed one-anna in the rupee on the annual rent value.† This cess is ordinarily collected by Government agency along with the Government land-revenue, the proceeds being subsequently adjusted to the credit of the district boards.

767. The following Provinces furnish exceptions to the general principle that the whole of the land-cess goes to the boards :—

(i.) In Bengal and Eastern Bengal the one-anna cess is divided into two half-anna portions. One of these, the "road-cess," is in the hands of the district boards, the other, the "public works cess," is levied by the Local Government, which, however, gives back about one-half of the proceeds in the shape of discretionary grants to district boards. A reform of this system is under consideration, and the Financial and Home Secretaries to the Government of India are in favour of the whole cess being given to the boards.

(iii.) In the Punjab and the Frontier Province the district boards have to make over nearly 20 per cent. of the land cess as a contribution to Provincial funds for "general services."

In the Central Provinces the boards have no statutory powers of taxation, but they receive the proceeds of cesses on the land revenue levied for roads and education, amounting roughly to 5 per cent. of the land revenue in all.

769. Prior to 1906 the district boards of the United Provinces were not independent financial entities. The Local Government distributed the proceeds of the land cess at its discretion, giving a part of the receipts in the well-to-do districts to the poorer ones. This system has now been done away with, and each district board is entitled to the cess and other local revenues obtained within its district, less the chaukidari deduction already referred to. Discretionary distribution of the Government contribution referred to in the preceding paragraph has enabled the grant of supplementary assistance to the poorer boards.

770. Besides this contribution in supplement of the land cess, special grants are generally made to the district boards by the Local Governments. Thus a portion of the grants made to the latter by the Government of India for the development of education has naturally been passed on to the boards, while in Bengal, as above stated, the Local Government has given back in contributions a large portion of what it received from the public works cess. In Bombay the Government contribution for education is based on the amount the boards allot from the land cess, being usually one-half of this. In the United and the Central Provinces the financial arrangements between the Local Governments and the individual district boards are governed by periodical contracts, the term of which is three years.

In the Punjab, and perhaps elsewhere, boards have still, however, to pay contributions to Government for audit charges, for clerks employed in the offices of inspectors of schools and Commissioners, etc. Further, in the Punjab, there has been a most complicated system of petty transfers of funds in both directions as between 'Provincial' and 'Local,' which apparently obtains in the Frontier Province also.*

There was general complaint that the resources of rural boards are inadequate ; but most witnesses were adverse to empowering boards to increase the land cess, or to levy fresh taxes such as an education rate, as these would be unpopular measures. Methods in which the resources of Government still takes a considerable portion in some Provinces.

(ii.) By relieving them, as already suggested, of some of their present functions, such as veterinary work, and famine and plague relief.

(iii.) By freeing them from contributions to Government in respect of any services of which the latter undertakes the management. They should not be called upon to contribute for such normal items of Provincial administration as the cost of statistical or supervising establishments, or be liable for the upkeep of travellers' rest-houses which are mainly occupied by Government servants. They should not again, be subject to any charge for the services of Government officers from whom they receive advice or other outside assistance, or for the collection of the land cess along with the Government revenue. They may, however, be fairly called upon to pay for the work of Government officials who undertake regular executive functions on their behalf, as in the case of a Government engineer who is given charge of their roads.

(iv.) In order to make the Boards more independent financially, the 25 per cent. Government grant on their land receipts should be distributed rateably to each district board. Any other Government grants which may still be necessary in poor districts, should be in lump sums, or in the shape of percentages of expenditure on such services as education. But such grants should in all cases be given under a quasi-permanent settlement, and should not be subject to periodical revision. Nor should Government grants of this description be treated as justifying increased Government control.

Proposed powers of taxation by rural boards.

774. In view of the fact that the present policy of Government is to lighten the burdens on the land; that the boards cannot as yet be made fully representative of the people; and that constant changes in rates in rural tracts would lead to general dissatisfaction, and possibly to fraud upon ignorant raiyats, we consider that district boards should not have power to raise the ordinary land cess beyond one-anna in the rupee on the rent value*, and that sub-district boards should not be able to levy any independent land cess of their own. With this exception, we would allow rural boards to levy rates and fees at their discretion within the limits laid down in the various Local Board Acts. Where no definite limits have been prescribed by law, the sanction of the Commissioner should be required to any proposed change in the rates.†

5170-6.

The Government supplement to the land cess should be increased.

775. Having regard to the restrictions we propose in the case of the land cess, and to the constantly increasing demands on rural boards, we think it desirable that the Government contribution of 25 per cent. should be increased as circumstances permit.

Proposals for giving sub-district boards independent financial resources.

776. It is desirable to give sub-district boards a large measure of financial independence, and to this end we propose that they should, as is now the case in Madras, be allotted a definite portion of the land cess raised in their areas, as well as the whole of the miscellaneous revenue, such as road and ferry tolls, school fees, pound rents and market receipts, accruing from roads, ferries or institutions managed by themselves. The exact proportion of the land cess which the sub-district boards should obtain must be determined by the Local Government for each Province, but we think that one-half would usually be a suitable share.

Para. 719. 777. The district board would have the disposal of the remaining portion of the land cess, after deducting the share we have proposed to assign to village panchayats; of miscellaneous receipts from roads, ferries, and institutions which it maintains; and of all Government grants*. From these it would discharge the services falling upon it, such as the upkeep of the main district roads, and of the general district establishments, and it would distribute the balance at its discretion among the sub-district boards. This will enable special assistance to be given to sub-district boards whose areas are poor or in particular need of improvement.

Resources left to the district boards, and their employment.

Madras Local Fund Code, Art. 489. 40759-63, 42006. 39430-2. 33525, 35422. 778. In Madras rural boards are ordinarily obliged to devote to roads not less than half the estimated income from the land cess, plus the anticipated net receipts from tolls. In the Punjab, local bodies have been directed to spend specific proportions of their revenues on education, medical and other services, and though such percentages were originally intended merely for general guidance, they have now become stereotyped, with the result that roads (for which no percentage was prescribed) have been starved, and that the boards' receipts are practically all ear-marked. In Bombay, again, one-third of the land cess receipts have to be devoted to education.

Rural boards should not be bound to apply specific proportions of their income to any special service.

Para. 803. Such restrictions should be done away with, and rural boards should have full discretion as to the spending their resources. We provide, later on, for intervention in case any service is found to be seriously neglected.

Para. 114. 779. We have already recommended that the existing control over the borrowing powers of district boards should not be relaxed, and we do not consider it desirable to give any such powers to sub-district boards.

Borrowing powers.

4505-6, 15576, 63417-8. 780. Where sub-district boards exist they have separate budgets, but these are subject to revision by the district board and are incorporated in the budget of that authority†.

Rural boards should have full power to deal with their budgets, subject to the maintenance of a prescribed minimum balance.

7536-41. The consolidated district board budget has, except in Bombay, to be approved by some outside authority. In Madras this is the Government itself; in other Provinces the function has generally been delegated to the Divisional Commissioner. In the Punjab the district board budgets have hitherto been forwarded from the Commissioner to the Local Government, but this system is now being altered.

15378, 19728, 24756, 25110, 27852, 35627-35, 36056-9. 5547, 5765-70, 6662-6, 7622, 7671-83, 19143, 22101, 23903. Complaint has been made, especially in Madras, of the close outside control exercised over the district board budgets; and it is clear that such control can be so applied as to destroy the financial responsibility which the rural boards ought to possess, and without which local self-government cannot be a reality. In our opinion rural boards should have the full power to pass their budgets, subject only to the maintenance of a prescribed minimum

* Sir S. Edgerley dissents from this recommendation, vide footnote to para. 740.

† Except of course in Assam, where there are no district boards, and the sub-district boards are independent entities.

balance, which they should not deplete without the sanction of outside authority.

781. We would allow a sub-district board as full power in this respect as the district board itself; but both boards should forward their budgets for information to the Collector and the Commissioner, and the sub-district board should forward its budget to the district board also. The fact that the district board will, as above proposed, distribute Government grants, and a portion of the land cess, among the sub-district boards, and will therefore be able to curtail its allotments if any such board appears to be needlessly extravagant, will give it as much control over the sub-district board finances as is really required.*

Procedure to be followed in certain branches of expenditure.

782. It was laid down by the Government of India in 1904 that the portion of each district board's budget relating to educational expenditure should be scrutinized by the Director of Public Instruction, before being passed by the Local Government or other outside authority, and the same principle seems to be observed in some Provinces in the case of the medical and sanitation estimates, which are seen and noted on by the Provincial heads of these departments. Where the district board's budget is sanctioned by the Commissioner, he considers any suggestions for additional expenditure made by these heads of departments, and if he concurs, inserts them in the budget; but if he thinks such expenditure undesirable, he would apparently have to refer to the Local Government for orders. Such a position obviously subordinates the finances of the boards to the requirements of Provincial departments, and is incompatible with the financial freedom which we propose to confer upon them.

As soon as a rural board's budget is drafted, extracts relating to the outlay proposed on services such as education, medical relief and sanitation, should be sent, for information, to the Provincial head of the departments concerned, but any remarks he may have to make should be simply for the consideration of the board, and should not affect its liberty of action.

Depletion of minimum balance.

783. Special circumstances may occasionally require a draft upon the minimum balance which a rural board is required to maintain. In the case of district boards we think that such drawings should require the sanction of the Commissioner, while in the case of a sub-district board the concurrence of the district board will suffice.

Re-appropriations.

784. Re-appropriations of budget provision as between main heads of expenditure at present usually require the same sanction as the budget itself; and in the Central Provinces such sanction is required even to re-appropriations between minor heads. We consider that the boards should have full power of re-appropriation, and of making supplemental allotments where necessary, so long as the prescribed minimum balance is not trenched upon.

Audit and accounts.

785. The audit of rural boards' accounts should be conducted by Government agency, as it is now; but, as we have already recommended, the accounts rules should be of a simpler character, and the audit less stringent, than is necessary in regard to direct Government expenditure.

* Sir F. Lely holds that the sub-district board budget should be sanctioned by the district board.

Establishments.

Act V., Madras, of 1884, sec. 41. 7323, 7464-6.	Local Fund Code, Arts. 113, 121. Vol. II., App., p. 331. Act III. Bengal, of 1885, sec. 33.	786. In Madras any alteration in a rural board's scale of establishments or salaries requires the sanction of the Local Government, which is very strict in rejecting or reducing proposals for increase, on the ground that local boards are prone to extravagance in this matter, and apt to be swayed by personal considerations. In Bengal and Eastern Bengal district boards have liberty, subject to the existence of budget provision, in respect of appointments up to Rs. 100 a month, beyond which figure the sanction of the Commissioner is required, but they may not, without the special sanction of Government, devote more than 20 per cent. of the public works expenditure to salaries. In the United Provinces new appointments require the sanction of the Commissioner, and if of Rs. 250 a month and above, that of the Local Government. In Bombay and the Punjab the boards can determine their own staff within budget allotments; but the Commissioner or Collector may require a reduction of establishments which he considers excessive. A similar power is vested in the Commissioner in the Central Provinces.	Present restric- tions on rural boards in the matter of establishm
Act I., Bombay, of 1884, secs. 38 and 63.	Dist. Bd. Man., p. 61, Rule 6. Act XX., Punjab, of 1883, sec. 27.	There are also restrictions in respect to the personnel of rural boards' establishments. In Madras, for instance, the filling up of some of the higher appointments requires the sanction of Government, which is also necessary to the dismissal of an incumbent. In Bengal the dismissal of a rural board servant on a pay of more than Rs. 100 a month requires the confirmation of the Commissioner; and in the United Provinces an appeal against the dismissal of any board servant drawing more than Rs. 10 a month lies to the Commissioner of the division. There is also evidence of wide appellate jurisdiction by Commissioners in the Punjab and in Eastern Bengal and Assam. We likewise had representations as to the inconvenience caused by the detailed application of the provisions of the Civil Service Regulations to officers in the service of local boards.

Arts. 811 and 814.	787. Here, again, such large outside control materially reduces the independence of the boards. We are, however, in favour of some control over them in the matter of establishments. Where district boards entertain engineers, paid secretaries*, or district health officers, the sanction of the Commissioner should be required to the settlement, or alteration, of the emoluments of such posts, and to the appointment and dismissal of the holders. Such control is desirable in order to secure fully qualified men for such important posts, and to protect officials who may have to incur some local unpopularity in the conscientious discharge of their duties.	Control which will suffice in future.

In regard to the ordinary rural board establishments, we consider that a sufficient measure of control will be obtained through the promulgation, by the Local Government, of model bye-laws or schedules, which shall lay down general rules in respect to such matters as leave, acting and travelling allowances, pensions or provident funds, and the maximum salaries to be given to board officials of various classes. variation desired should require the sanction of the Local Government, or, in the matter of salary limits, of the Commissioner.

In other respects, however, we would give the boards a free hand in regard to the creation and filling up of appointments, and full power to punish or dismiss their officials. The appointment, promotion and serious punishment of these should be by the collective board,* on the recommendation of the president, while minor punishments might be inflicted by the president, subject to an appeal to the board. We would not, however, allow appeal to an outside authority.

Constitution and proceedings.

Present elective element in rural boards.

788. The members of the Frontier Province district boards are all nominated. In the other Provinces there is already a considerable elective element, and the existing laws permit of its expansion.

In Madras the law allows the election of sub-district board members, but as a matter of fact these have been entirely nominated. The district board members are, however, largely elected by the sub-district boards, and the nominated official members of the district board may not exceed one-fourth of the whole body.

Act V.,
Madras
of 1884,
sec. 16.

In Bombay the taluk boards contain members who are directly elected under a property franchise, as also representatives of small municipalities; and the district boards contain members elected by taluk boards, and also by the larger municipalities. Nominated members may not exceed one-half of these bodies, and only a quarter of the whole body may be officials.

In the two Bengals not less than two-thirds of the members of sub-divisional boards are elected by ratepayers, the voting qualification being low. In Assam the sub-divisional boards are largely elected by planters and by village headmen. In the United Provinces not less than three-fourths of each district board are elected by small tahsil constituencies whose members are nominated by the Collector. In 17 districts of the Punjab two-thirds of the district board members are elected; in the remaining 12 they are all nominated.

The tahsil boards, again, contain a like proportion of persons elected by groups of village mukaddams (headmen), and by members of trading classes. In Berar the district boards contain elected representatives of taluk boards, while not more than half the members of the latter are nominated.

Rural boards should have a preponderance of elected non-official members.

789. There is evidence that the existing methods of election often fail to excite public interest or produce good men. On the other hand the non-official witnesses, except in Upper India, are generally in favour of giving further effect to the elective principle.

The Resolution of Lord Ripon's Government in 1882, laid down that there should be a large preponderance of non-official members on the rural boards, and that is our view also. We consider that the nominated element in a sub-district board should not exceed the strength sufficient to secure the due representation of minorities and of official experience, and that the district board also should contain an elective majority. In other words, the proportion of official and nominated members should be substantially diminished.

As regards the methods of election, we are in entire accord with the Resolution of 1882, as to the impossibility of laying down any general system and the desirability of trying different schemes in different localities, including methods of proportional representation, and election by castes, occupations, etc. Having regard to the very different circumstances of different areas, we think it essential that the system adopted in each should be such as to provide for the due representation of different communities, creeds, and interests. It has always been recognized that it is the duty of the British administration to protect the interests of the various communities in India, and to secure impartial treatment to all. Moreover, in the cognate matter of the selection of members for Legislative Councils, the discussions which resulted in the passing of the Indian Councils Act of 1892 embodied the emphatic testimony, not merely of distinguished Anglo-Indian officials, but of British statesmen, as to the necessity for securing special representation of Muhammadan and other minorities, and as to the danger of allowing undue predominance to any one class.*

The want of success of the existing system seems to us to be mainly due to two reasons: first, that the boards, and especially the sub-district boards, have hitherto not possessed real powers and responsibilities, owing to want of funds and excessive control; secondly, that the methods of election adopted have not, generally speaking, provided for the due representation of minorities, or met the apparently genuine reluctance of large landowners, and other persons of high social position, to submit themselves to the vote of an ordinary territorial constituency.† The institution of village panchayats will furnish an electorate which should certainly not be overlooked by the Local Governments in dealing with the methods by which a more effectual elective representation on the sub-district boards can be procured.

In the case of the district boards there will be little difficulty on this score, as the elected members can be chosen by the sub-district boards from among their non-official members.

paras. 18-9.

* A brief summary of the discussions in respect to this matter is given in the recent Government of India despatch on the reform of Legislative Councils, etc.

† Mr. Dutt thinks, that the want of success of the present system of self-government is largely due to the executive power being centralized in the Collector-president, and not to any defects in the system of election. Separate election by castes and creeds is not known elsewhere in the British Empire, and would introduce a new element of discord and disunion if introduced in India. The British Government, while wisely exercising its power of nomination and appointment to help minorities and backward classes, has generally taught the people of India to ignore distinctions of caste and creed in civic life. A different policy, accentuating existing social and religious distinctions by attaching to them distinct political rights, is likely to breed dissensions and troubles in a country like India.

for the various Local Governments to determine. The usual term at present appears to be three years, and this would seem to be a generally suitable period.

The Collector is generally president of the district board.

791. In Madras the Collector is ex officio president of the district board, a section of the local Act which permits the election of a president not having been utilized. In Bombay, the Collector is always appointed president by Government, though here, too, the law permits of election. In the two Bengals the position is the same. In the United Provinces the members elect, but always choose the Collector. In the Punjab the Collector (Deputy Commissioner) is ex officio president in 12 districts, and is always appointed to the position by Government in the others. He is similarly appointed in the Frontier Province. In the Central Provinces, proper the president is elected, and is usually a non-official. In Berar the law provides for the election of a president, but the Deputy Commissioner, if a member of the Board (as in practice he always is), is ex officio president.

Position in regard to vice-presidents.

792. The district boards also possess, as a rule, vice-presidents or vice-chairmen, who represent the president if he is absent from meetings, or exercise executive functions subject to his control.

In Madras vice-presidents are, in practice, nominated, and are usually Government officials, such as treasury deputy collectors, though non-officials are occasionally appointed. In other Provinces the boards generally elect to these posts. In the Bengals the vice-presidents seem to be largely non-officials; in the United Provinces they are generally members of the Collector's staff.

And as regards the presidency of sub-district boards.

793. The Sub-divisional officers preside over the sub-district boards in Madras, Bombay and Assam. In Bengal and Eastern Bengal these boards elect their president, but the choice usually falls on the Sub-divisional officer.* In the Central Provinces the tahsildar appears usually to preside.

Evidence for and against the Collector's presidency of the district board.

794. With few exceptions, official† opinion is unanimous in favour of retaining the Collector as president of the district board. The preponderance of non-official opinion—especially in Madras, the two Bengals, and the Central Provinces—is in favour of an elected non-official president.‡ Some of the non-official witnesses, however, desired to retain the Collector as president§; others again, recognized that competent non-official chairmen could not easily be found in many districts, and that the displacement of the Collector must be gradual.|| has only been reached in the Central Provinces. We are of opinion that, in present circumstances, the Collector should remain president of the district board. To remove him from this post would be to dissociate him from the general interests of the district in such matters as roads, education, sanitation, drainage and water supply, and to convert him into a mere tax-gatherer and repressor of crime. Such a change would, we think, be very undesirable, and would have the effect of divorcing the Collector from healthy contact with instructed non-official opinion. Again, with the relaxation we propose in the outside control to be exercised over the district boards, it is very desirable to have at their head men of official administrative experience. This is specially important in view of the fact that a very material portion of the district board's duties will consist in the allotment of funds to sub-district boards, a function which requires general knowledge of the district, and constant travelling therein, and that hardly any non-official member would possess this knowledge in regard to so wide an area. In our opinion, the desirability of the Collector's presidential nomination to the post. If he were to submit himself to election by the Board, and were returned as a matter of course, as now in the United Provinces, it would be said that the Board were not free agents, while his defeat by a rival candidate would impair his authority in the district.*

25716.

796. But though the Collector's opinion in regard to the important matters with which we propose that the district board shall deal ought properly to carry great weight, the final decision will be that of the collective board, which will contain an elected non-official majority representing the élite of the sub-district boards. We do not believe, as some witnesses suggest, that the presence of the Collector on a district board need prevent the free ventilation of their opinions by the non-official members. From the evidence we have received it would appear that Collectors have, in some instances, been in the habit of ruling rather than guiding district boards, and in so far as this attitude exists, we consider it unfortunate. But it is equally unfortunate that the Collector should be looked upon, as is too often the case at present, in the light of an outside authority, instead of as a necessary complement to the non-official element on the board. At the same time the Collector-president should not arbitrarily override the opinions of others, but should be a sympathetic chairman, and should bear in mind that not the least important of his functions is to assist in the political education of the members. Such relations often exist now, and there should be no difficulty in making them universal hereafter.

The president of a sub-district board should usually be the Sub-divisional officer or tahsildar.

* Mr. Dutt holds that the presidents of district and sub-district boards should be elected, and that official control should be exercised from outside as contemplated in the Government of India Resolution of the 18th May, 1882. He would, however, permit rural boards to elect a Collector or Sub-divisional officer as their president if they so desired. He thinks that there is, and can be, no self-government if the people are not trusted to manage local matters without official control inside the board.

Vice-presidents should be elected non-officials.

Rural boards should, however, when the president is a nominated official, have an elected non-official as vice-president.

The Commissioner should appoint nominated members of rural boards, gazette elected members, etc.

798. The District Boards Acts bestow on Local Governments the power to remove a member of a rural board if he is habitually absent from meetings, or if he becomes incapable of serving, or is dangerous to the public peace, or has been convicted of some grave criminal offence. Apart from these special provisions, the appointment of members, and the acceptance of their resignations, rest with the Provincial Government or have been delegated to one of its local representatives. In Madras such delegation has been allowed to district board presidents in respect of the acceptance of resignations, and the re-appointment, of members of sub-district boards. In Bombay, Bengal, and the United Provinces, the appointment of nominated rural-board members, and the gazetting of elected members, now rest with the Commissioners*; but the appointment of a nominated, or the approval of an elected, vice-president, remains generally with the Local Government.†

We think that the appointment of nominated members of all rural boards, and the gazetting of elected members, should rest with the Commissioner. He should likewise be competent to accept the resignation of members, and to remove a member in cases where the law allows this to be done; and he should appoint the presidents of sub-district boards and gazette all elected vice-presidents.‡

Disputes as to the public election of members of sub-district boards should be decided in the civil courts. Disputes as to election, by boards themselves, of vice-chairmen or of district board members should be settled by the Commissioner.

Rural boards should be able to delegate administrative functions to committees, which may include outside persons.

799. The District Boards Acts§ usually enable the boards to appoint committees for various subjects, but the Madras Act does not cover finance or public works. In practice there are no standing committees in Madras, Bombay, or the Punjab; but in the United Provinces and the two Bengals such committees seem to be made use of to a considerable extent. In the Bengals local dispensary committees may consist partly of boards' members and partly of other persons.

with English, must depend upon local circumstances. The proceedings of all rural boards should, however, be published in the vernacular for general information ; and we commend, for consideration elsewhere, the Madras system of issuing a district gazette in which such matters figure. Due notice should be given to rural board members of the subjects to be discussed at each meeting, and this is particularly necessary in regard to the budget, which should be circulated in draft before its discussion.

801. District boards in all Provinces prepare annual administration reports, which deal also with the working of the sub-district boards where these exist. In Madras these reports are reviewed by the Local Government ; elsewhere by the Commissioner. We think that this review by the Commissioner should continue ; and that a district board, having obtained administration reports from the sub-district boards, should consolidate these into a report for the whole district, including the operations of the district board itself. The Local Government need not criticize the report of each district board, but should, as at present, make a general annual review of the work and progress of rural boards throughout the Province.

803. The Local Boards Acts of all Provinces give a full right of inspection of rural board works, properties, etc., to the Collector or Commissioner, and this right should be maintained. They also give power to the Commissioner or the Collector—his action being forthwith reported to the Local Government or the Commissioner—to suspend or prohibit any act of a board which is in excess of its legal power, or is likely to lead to a serious breach of the peace, or to cause grave injury or annoyance to the public or to any class of persons. These powers should likewise continue.

Control and inspection by Commissioners and Collectors, etc.

Further, the Collector in case of emergency, and the Local Government otherwise*, may direct a board to perform any specific act or duty imposed upon it by law, and may, in default, take action at its expense. We consider that this latter power might normally rest with the Commissioner. Unless, however, the matter is really urgent, which will seldom happen, a rural board should receive due warning from the Commissioner as to its neglect of any particular service or duty, and should thus have the opportunity of taking action on its own account, or of showing that it had not been so negligent as was supposed.

The officers of special Government departments, such as those dealing with public works, education and sanitation, should have the right to inspect the work or institutions of rural boards, and to make suggestions in respect thereto.

A similar right should be accorded to district-board officials, such as a district engineer, in respect of works or institutions maintained by sub-district boards.

* The Commissioner in the two Bengals.

Rural boards' bye-laws should require the sanction of the Commissioner.

804. A suggestion was made in the direction of giving 29714. larger latitude to the rural boards in framing bye-laws ; but having regard to the fact that these are meant to supplement statutory law, and that their application may be of great importance, we think that they should always require the sanction of the Commissioner. The Local Governments may suitably prescribe general model bye-laws for the guidance of Commissioners and rural boards.

General.

The Local Government must have full discretion as to the constitution of rural boards in Burma.

805. District boards were started in Lower Burma in pursuance of Lord Ripon's Local Self-Government Resolution of 1882, but the members did not take any active interest in them and they died out after a few years. Official opinion in the Province was against their re-introduction, and there was little non-official evidence in favour of such a course.

While we look forward eventually to a system of rural boards in Burma, as elsewhere, we think that the time and method of introducing these must be left entirely to the discretion of the Local Government, and that for the present it is better to lay a sound foundation by strengthening village autonomy.

And in regard to the creation of district boards in Assam.

806. Some non-official witnesses suggested the establishment of district boards in Assam. This question, we were informed, was discussed a few years ago, and it was decided to leave the sub-district boards as they were.

District boards of the character we have suggested might be advisable in Assam also, as supplying a unifying and co-ordinating factor in local self-government for the district as a whole, but here again we would leave the matter to the discretion of the Local Government.

General criticisms of existing organization.

807. We have set forth above our proposals for making local self-government in rural areas more of a reality than it is to-day. Critics of the present system have dwelt on the failure to develop the principle of election, and on the appointment of official presidents. The boards, it has been urged, have practically become a department of the Government administration ; their work is done by the official element within the boards themselves, or by Government departments at the boards' expense ; their proceedings are subject to excessive outside control ; and in present circumstances they can never become, as Lord Ripon intended them to be, effective instruments of local self-government.

While we do not go so far in suggestions for change as many who hold these views, we recognize that their assertions contain a large element of truth. At the same time those who expected a complete revolution in existing methods in consequence of Lord Ripon's pronouncement were inevitably doomed to disappointment. The political education of any people must necessarily be slow, and local self-government of the British type could not at once take root in Indian soil. The Resolution of May 1882 itself laid stress on the impossibility of attempting to prescribe hard and fast rules of general application, and the actual organization subsequently developed in the various Provinces, with the assent of the Government of India, seems to us to show that the policy of 1882 could not be applied per saltum. We recognize, however, that much has already been done to carry out the objects which Lord Ripon had in view, and the added experience of a quarter of a century now renders it possible, we think, to attempt a further practical development of local self-government.

808. We consider it undesirable to dissociate the Collector and his Assistants from the work of rural boards, but we have propounded a scheme under which these bodies will have larger resources, more clearly defined functions, much larger powers within these, and consequently a more real responsibility for the success or failure of their administration. We insist on the predominance of an elected non-official element, but recognize that the methods of selection must be adjusted to the varying circumstances of different areas. While our proposals in respect to sub-district boards provide bodies whose jurisdictional area will be sufficiently small to enlist adequate knowledge of local matters and local interests, we reserve to the district boards the wider functions which more properly appertain to the district as a larger entity. Finally, the proposals we have made in regard to village panchayats provide for an effective commencement of local self-government in the villages themselves.

Principal steps we propose to remedy existing defects.

CHAPTER XX.

MUNICIPALITIES.

Act XXVI.
of 1850.
Imperial Gazetteer,
Vol. IV.,
p. 286.
Ibid.,
pp. 286-7.

809. The origin and development of municipalities in India is entirely due to British rule. They practically commenced, outside the Presidency towns of Calcutta, Madras and Bombay, which we shall treat of in a separate section, with an Act of 1850, which provided for the constitution of town committees, and the levy by them of certain indirect taxation.

Beginnings of municipal Government outside the Presidency towns.

Between 1864 and 1868 regular municipalities were formed in all Provinces, and, except in Bombay where the Act of 1850 was adhered to, special Acts were framed to regulate their administration. The municipal committees thus constituted were brought into being mainly to promote better sanitation in the towns; and, except in the Punjab and the Central Provinces, were entirely nominated, though the Provincial laws in some cases allowed of election.

Ibid.,
p. 287.

810. Lord Mayo's scheme of financial decentralization was intended to have as its corollary an extension of local self-government, and between 1871 and 1874 Municipal Acts were passed in the various Provinces extending the elective principle, and greatly widening the sphere of municipal activity.

Development between 1871 and 1874.

pp. 287-8.

Lord Ripon's Local Self-Government Resolution of the 18th May 1882, referred to in the preceding chapter, dealt with municipalities also, and led to the passing of fresh Municipal Acts for the various Provinces. A wide extension was given to the elective system, and many municipal councils were permitted to elect non-official chairmen. Arrangements were also made to increase the resources and financial responsibilities of the councils. Though some of the Provincial laws passed in 1883-4 have since been amended or superseded, the changes since made have, generally speaking, been confined to matters of detail.

Further development under Lord Ripon.

Certain municipal statistics.

811. The following statement, compiled from the Provincial reports for 1906-7, shows the number of municipalities existing in the Provinces, the average population per municipality in each Province, and a classification of municipalities according to the number of their inhabitants.*

Province.	Number of municipalities.	Average population per municipality.	Number of municipalities with population.
			Below 5,000.	Between 5,000 and 10,000.	Between 10,000 and 100,000.	Over 100,000.

{ Bombay proper	136	14,489	14	52	67	3

United Provinces	89	35,003	Nil.	11	72	6
Punjab	138	15,143	35	59	41	3
Burma	43	16,021	3	22	17	1

{ Berar	13	16,370	1	2	10	Nil.
North West Frontier Province	10	16,469	1	6	3	Nil.

The relatively high average of population in Madras and the United Provinces will be noted. This arises from the fact that in the former Province semi-urban areas are local fund unions, and in the latter "notified areas," a term which we shall explain presently; whereas in some Provinces, and especially in the Punjab, many petty places have been made into municipalities. Vide paras. 698, and 813.

Large difference between places coming under the general municipal category.

812. As will be seen from the foregoing statement, the number of municipalities with a population of less than 10,000 is large in Bombay, Bengal, Assam, the Punjab, Burma and the Central Provinces; while in the Punjab no less than 35 municipalities have less than 5,000 inhabitants. At the other end of the scale are large cities with a population exceeding or approaching 200,000, such as Lucknow, Benares, Delhi, Lahore and Cawnpore.

This great difference in importance between places included in the general municipal category cannot be overlooked. Powers which might well be granted to large towns cannot be extended to municipalities which are mere collections of villages, and certain witnesses in Bengal and Eastern Bengal thought that some of the smaller municipalities there might be converted into 'unions,' though others considered that this would be an unpopular step. 15247, 18232-4, 22930-1, 24643-4, 45748.

Notified areas.

813. In the United Provinces there are a number of "notified areas," i.e., towns which are not fit for full municipal institutions, to which only portions of the Municipal Acts are applied, and whose affairs are administered by nominated committees. There are similar "notified areas" in Bombay, the Punjab and Burma. 27987-9, 31771-5.

Act III. 13080-1,
Bombay, 13088,
of 1901, 39864-70,
sec. 187.

814. We have recommended in a preceding chapter that such of the existing local fund unions as are of a rural character should be merged in the larger scheme of village panchayat administration which we desire to see introduced. Unions which are of a semi-urban character might be treated in the same way as the existing "notified areas," that is to say, such areas should be administered as embryonic municipalities, subject to such portions of the Provincial Municipal Acts as the Local Government may in each case see fit to extend to them, through the agency of local committees which might be styled "town panchayats." The constitution and powers of these town panchayats must be determined by the Provincial Governments according to local circumstances, but they will in all cases be of lower standing than the regular municipal councils.

* The Presidency municipalities have been excluded from this statement, as also the city of Rangoon, which we desire to place in the same category. We likewise omit Baluchistan which contains only one municipality (Quetta). 37516.

Notified areas, and local fund unions of a semi-urban character, should be administered as embryonic municipalities, under town panchayats.

815. We think that a number of the petty municipalities now existing, which will not be fit to exercise the large powers we are about to suggest for municipalities in general, should be placed in the town panchayat category. The recommendations which follow apply to the remaining municipalities generally; but we recognize that in the case of towns with a population of 100,000 or upwards, which we style "cities," the form of municipal government may require to be somewhat different, so as to provide for full time executive officers. Municipal bye-laws again will here cover a larger scope, and in some matters such outside control as is necessary may be expediently exercised by the Provincial Government itself instead of by a Commissioner or a Collector.

rates for the construction or promotion of tramways ; but the levy of such a rate should be subject to the special conditions we have proposed in regard to the levy of a special railway cess by district boards.* Para. 765.

Where a municipality has to pay for a service it should control it.

818. In regard to the existing functions of municipalities, our proposals are, as in the case of rural boards, based on the cardinal principle that if a municipality has to pay for a service it should control it, and that where it is expedient that the control should be largely in the hands of Government the service should be made a Provincial one.

Abrogation of financial restrictions in respect to works executed from current revenues.

819. Works.—Like rural boards, municipal councils should be at full liberty to obtain the advice of a Government engineer in regard to the inspection of works, or in respect of estimates for construction or upkeep ; but the existing restrictions which require outside sanction for works estimated to cost more than a certain amount should be done away with. In the Central Provinces, for example, any work which is likely to cost more than Rs. 500 now requires the approval of a Government officer. The Government should, of course, still scrutinize and sanction estimates of projects to be carried out from loan funds. Para. 749.

Educational functions of municipalities.

820. Education.—Municipalities are concerned mainly with primary education ; but in most Provinces they likewise deal with middle schools and, in Madras and Northern India, to some extent with high schools also.†

We consider that the obligatory functions of municipalities should, as suggested by several witnesses, be confined to primary instruction. Secondary education should be in the hands of Government ; but if a municipality is, after the due discharge of its normal duties, able and willing to devote money to middle vernacular schools, it might be permitted to do so.

Actual municipal control over expenditure.

821. The educational expenditure for which municipalities are responsible is, in Bombay, mainly incurred on municipal schools, and in Bengal and Burma in grants to aided institutions. As in the case of rural boards, other Provinces occupy an intermediate position in this respect, Madras inclining to the aid system, and Northern India to the Bombay method. The municipalities seem, as a rule, to supervise schools themselves ; in some cases, too, they entertain a special local inspecting agency. The main exception is the United Provinces, where the tendency is for municipalities to place their establishments in the hands of the district board staff. We consider this arrangement indefensible, since municipalities, dealing as they do with comparatively small areas, should be able to supervise schools far better than the rural boards.

823. Medical work and vaccination.—As a rule, municipalities are theoretically responsible for the public medical institutions within their jurisdiction, receiving contributions from rural boards on account of patients coming from outside municipal limits. But in the United Provinces and Assam, and in some cases in Eastern Bengal and the Punjab, the actual position seems to be that the municipalities merely contribute to these institutions, which are maintained by the district boards, or (in Assam) by Government.

We have proposed in the last chapter that the Government should take over the administration of the main hospital at the headquarters of each district, and as these towns are usually municipalities, the municipal councils there will hereafter only have outlying dispensaries to deal with, while most other municipalities will only have minor hospitals or dispensaries. Such institutions should, we consider, be under the direct management of the municipality. As in the case of rural boards, the council should be able to recruit its own hospital staff, subject to the possession of general qualifications to be laid down by Government, but with liberty to borrow Government officers in case it cannot otherwise obtain competent men.* Municipalities in Bombay already engage their own staff; otherwise municipal medical institutions are now staffed, as a rule, by Provincial officers whose services are temporarily lent to the municipality.

The Civil Surgeon of the district should, however, continue to make periodical inspections of municipal medical institutions.

824. In regard to vaccination, the position should be the same as that we have proposed in the case of rural boards, viz., that municipalities should maintain the subordinate staff, but that its work should be inspected by Government officers.

825. Sanitation.—Municipal expenditure on sanitation has two main aspects—first, the maintenance of the town in a state of cleanliness: secondly, the construction and upkeep of drainage and water supply systems. Large cities require special engineers for the latter purpose. The normal sanitary establishments consist mainly of scavengers and inspectors. Madras is the only Province in which a regular system of trained and specially qualified inspectors has, as yet, been established.

826. Since we were appointed, the Government of India have addressed the Local Governments on the subject of sanitation in towns. They considered that, as recommended by the Plague Commission of 1900, every city should have at least one separate health officer with European training, whereas hitherto the duties of health officer have fallen to the Civil Surgeon. population between 20,000 and 100,000 were also to have health officers; but these might be officers of the assistant surgeon class who had taken a special course in public health at an Indian medical college. The Government of India also considered it desirable that municipalities should possess trained sanitary inspectors. It was suggested that the health officers and the sanitary inspectors might be formed into a Provincial service, and lent to municipalities. An alternative scheme was to have separate municipal services, subject to prescription by Government of:—

(a.) The minimum number of sanitary appointments required.

(b.) The minimum salary of such posts.

(c.) The professional qualifications to be required from incumbents.

Remarks thereon.

827. Following our recommendations in the case of rural boards, we hold that such a service should be municipal and not Provincial. As regards the restrictions specified above, (a.) and (c.) are matters which the Provincial Governments may legitimately lay down, and they should also have power to require municipalities, when necessary, to appoint not merely sanitary inspectors, but special health officers, and to lay down their qualifications. The suggested minimum salary restriction will be covered by our recommendations under the head of establishments.

829. Municipalities have, in most Provinces, to obtain sanction from the Local Government, or from a local representative of Government such as a Commissioner, in the case of sanitary works of any appreciable importance. As in the case of rural boards, we recommend the removal of these restrictions, it being understood that municipalities shall have full right to the advice of Government experts for this as for other services. In the case of large special works such as those connected with drainage or water supply, municipalities will, as at present, usually have to borrow or seek grants-in-aid from Government; and this will afford the necessary control in respect to proposals and estimates for such projects, which will have to be scrutinized by the Government before it sanctions a loan or grant.

832. Having regard to the connexion of plague with general sanitation, and to the greater ease of dealing with a comparatively small area, we do not think that they should be relieved from plague charges*. In the event of a severe visitation, however, the Government should contribute substantially towards the preventive measures involved. We understand that this is already done to a large extent.

Plague expenditure to be a municipal charge, with Government contribution in the event of a severe visitation.

Cf. Act XX. (Punjab) of 1891, sec. 138. 25890, 39429. 42006.

833. Municipalities should be relieved of any charges they may now have to incur in respect of police, veterinary work and destruction of dangerous animals. They should also be relieved from contributions for services of a Provincial character, or for statistical and other establishments maintained in Government offices.

Other charges of which municipalities should be relieved.

The present position in these respects is most unsatisfactory in the Punjab, where municipalities, like rural boards, have had to contribute to police and other Government services.

834. In the Punjab, municipalities have, like rural boards, been subjected to orders laying down specific percentages of their income which must be applied to particular services; and in the United Provinces municipal councils have to devote a certain proportion of their revenues to education. We consider that all orders of this kind should be abrogated, and that municipalities should have full discretion as to the application of their revenues to the services which they have to render to the public. They must be judged by general results, and our proposals provide for outside intervention when some particular service has been gravely neglected.

Municipalities should not have to devote specific percentages of their income to particular services.

835. The principal sources of municipal revenue are :—

Principal sources of municipal revenue.

(i.) Octroi (principally in Northern India, Bombay and the Central Provinces).

(ii.) Taxes on houses and lands (in Madras, Bombay, the two Bengals, Burma and the Central Provinces).

(iii.) A tax on professions and trades (in Madras and the United Provinces).

(iv.) Road tolls (in Madras, Bombay and Assam).

(v.) Taxes on carts and vehicles.

(vi.) Rates and fees for services rendered in the shape of conservancy, water supply, markets, schools, etc.

836. The Government has made no regular subvention to municipal revenues corresponding to the 25 per cent. grant on the land cess in the case of rural boards; but in Assam the municipalities seem to get some general recurring grants, while in the Central Provinces and Bombay they get regular contributions in respect of education, hospitals, and veterinary work where they undertake this. Generally, however, when a municipality undertakes a large drainage or water supply scheme which it cannot meet from its current resources and for which it has to borrow, the Local Government takes a share in the capital outlay.

The Government of India have also, on occasion, made special grants to Local Governments for the benefit of municipal funds. During the ten years ending with

* cf. Act III., Bombay, of 1901, sec. 54 (2) (a); Punjab Government, Notn. 1095 S.P. of 11th Sept., 1901.

1907, 158 lakhs were thus given, mainly to assist in measures for combating plague and famine. A portion of the special grants made by the Government of India to Local Governments for the promotion of education has likewise been passed on in most Provinces to municipalities, and a large part of the recurring grant of 30 lakhs for sanitation distributed among the Provinces in 1908-9, will, no doubt, be similarly dealt with.

But taking the Provinces as a whole, Government grants to municipalities in the year 1906-7 exceeded 5 per cent. of the total municipal receipts only in Bombay, the United Provinces, Eastern Bengal and Assam, and Burma.

Unnecessary for Government to make universal supplementary grants to municipal revenues.

Character of assistance proposed.

Undesirable to endow municipalities with unoccupied Government land.

837. It has been suggested by some witnesses that the Government should make regular grants-in-aid to municipal funds. In view, however, of the fact that municipalities are more advanced and more wealthy than rural areas, and that their size permits the citizens to form a general idea of the main results of municipal administration, we do not consider it necessary to restrict municipal taxation in the way we have proposed in regard to the rural boards' land cess, and consequently we do not recommend that the Government should make any universal supplementary grants towards municipal revenues. The existing assistance given for large projects should, however, continue, and, where necessary be extended; while, in the case of the poorer municipalities, some subvention towards normal services will probably be required. As in the case of the rural boards, this should take the form of a lump grant, or of a percentage contribution towards a specific service such as education, and should be fixed by a quasi-permanent settlement.

The suggestion that we have made in Chapter XII. as to Commissioners and Collectors being placed in a position to make discretionary grants for small works of public improvement will also enable some aid to be given in this way to minor municipalities, and our proposals in the present chapter will afford relief to all municipal bodies by freeing them from certain services for which they have now to pay or contribute.

838. Some witnesses have also suggested, as a convenient method of endowing municipalities with larger resources, that they should be granted unoccupied Government land within municipal limits. Grants of this character appear to have been made in some cases, but we are not in favour of any general extension of the system. A number of the existing municipalities include semi-rural areas, which may contain a considerable amount of cultivable land, and where this is at the disposal of Government it ought to remain in the hands of the Revenue staff. In the larger towns, too, unoccupied sites necessarily tend to increase in value, in some cases to a very large extent. We have recognized in a preceding chapter that, in respect of such land, the powers of the Local Governments themselves should be limited, and that they should not be able to alienate it permanently, or to grant it on lease save under certain restrictions. It would be most inadvisable, we think, to give powers over land of this description to municipal councils, in view of the risks of mismanagement, and of the tendency of councils to reduce present burdens* by sales, or long leases, of land which might

839. Generally speaking, a municipality may not levy a tax or charge provided for in the Municipal law, or vary the rate of incidence, without the sanction of the Local Government, as in Madras, or of the Commissioner, as is usually the case in Bombay.

Powers of municipalities in respect of taxation.

We think that municipalities should have full liberty to impose or alter taxation within the limits laid down by the municipal laws ; but that where an Act does not prescribe a maximum rate, the sanction of an outside authority should be required to any increase in taxation. Such authority may ordinarily be the Commissioner, but in the case of 'cities' it should be the Local Government.†

Similar outside control should be required (as is now usually the case) where a municipality desires specially to exempt any person or class of persons from municipal taxation.

840. The Government of India have intervened to moderate the incidence of municipal octroi duties, so as to prevent their trenching on spheres of Imperial revenue, and to require refund of duty on goods which merely pass through towns in transit. Commodities on which the State claims the full taxation, such as salt, opium, liquors and mineral oils, may not be taxed for municipal purposes. In the case of other imported articles, which usually pay a 5 per cent. customs duty, the octroi may not exceed $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. ad valorem, while for articles produced in India the maximum rate prescribed is generally about $4\frac{3}{4}$ per cent.

Complaints have been made, especially in Bombay, as to this interference. We consider that the Government of India are fully entitled to lay down general instructions in regard to such matters ; but that their specific application to individual municipalities should be normally left to Local Governments. In regard to certain cases of detailed intervention cited by the Bombay Government, we recognize that the action taken by the Government of India involved hardship to the municipalities concerned ; but we must affirm the right of that Government to enforce, in the last resort, compliance with their general principles.

841. The control of the Local Governments and of the Government of India over municipal borrowing should continue ; and we consider that any permanent alienation of municipal property, or lease of the same for a period of more than seven years, should require outside sanction, as is now the case in Bombay. Such sanction may usually be given by the Commissioner, but in the case of cities the concurrence of the Local Government should be required. Leases for smaller periods might be left to the discretion of the councils.

* Messrs Dutt and Hichens dissent, and would allow the grant of such lands to municipalities.

† Mr. Dutt thinks that the sanction of the Local Government, or preferably of a special Local Government Board, should be necessary to any variation in municipal taxation, in order to prevent frequent changes in rates which would be harassing to the people.

Present control
budgets.

842. In all Provinces except Bombay, the municipal budgets require the sanction of an outside authority. In Madras this control is exercised by the Local Government itself. In the other major Provinces it has generally been delegated to Commissioners; but the Government occasionally scrutinizes the budgets of important cities, as in the United Provinces and Burma, or those of towns which have borrowed money from Government as in the United Provinces and the Punjab.* Moreover, the special orders referred to in the last chapter as to the submission of extracts from rural boards budgets to the Director of Public Instruction, and, in Madras, at any rate, also to the Provincial heads of the Medical and Sanitary departments, apply likewise to municipalities. There was evidence, especially in Madras, as to the minute control thus exercised over the municipal finances, and it is clear that the power of altering a municipal budget may be so applied as to deprive the municipal council of all real independence.

Municipalities
should have a free hand in regard to these.

843. We consider that municipalities should have a free hand in regard to their budgets, though these should go, through the Collector, to the Commissioner for information, and that the only check required is that each municipality should maintain a minimum standing balance to be prescribed by the Local Government.

Procedure in regard to certain branches of expenditure.

As soon as a municipal budget is drafted, extracts relating to the outlay proposed on particular services such as education, medical relief and sanitation, should, as in the case of the rural boards, be sent, for information, to the Provincial heads of the departments concerned; but any remarks they have to make on these should be simply for the consideration of the municipal council, and should not affect its liberty of action.

Further, as already observed, municipalities should not be subject to any orders requiring the allotment of a percentage of their revenues to any particular service.

The full powers here proposed will, no doubt, occasionally lead to mistakes and mismanagement, but we consider that municipalities can attain adequate financial responsibility only by the exercise of such powers, and by having to bear the consequences of their errors. They cannot make real progress if constantly kept in financial leading strings, nor can local self-government become a reality if local bodies are habitually protected against themselves. The Local Government will, moreover, retain some power of control from the fact that a municipality which gets into a condition of financial embarrassment will have to obtain its sanction for a loan, while a municipality which neglects duties can be made to undertake them, and one which is hopelessly inefficient can be suspended or abolished.

Extent to which Government control will remain.

Minimum balances, reappropria-tions, &c.

844. Freedom in regard to the budget necessarily implies free power of reappropriation, which is now in most Provinces subject to detailed outside control, extending, in the Central Provinces, so far as reappropriations between minor heads. A municipal council should also be allowed, subject to the maintenance of its fixed minimum balance, to make supplementary allotments;

846. In respect of the creation of appointments or the alteration of their emoluments, the control over municipalities in Madras is as strict as in the case of the rural boards, while in Bombay the law requires the municipal establishments to be fixed by schedules which require outside sanction, so that the council of a city like Karachi may not entertain a peon, or alter the pay of a clerk, without reference to the Commissioner.

Present control over municipipalities in the matter of establishments.

In Bengal the creation of appointments of Rs. 200 a month and upwards requires the sanction of the Local Government, and the filling up of appointments of Rs. 100 and above requires the concurrence of the Commissioner. In Burma and the Central Provinces, and in Northern India, the municipal law does not usually contain such restrictions ; but we found, in the Punjab, that local orders of Commissioners had very much limited the freedom of municipal councils in respect to their establishments.

Para. 787.

847. As in the case of rural boards, we desire to see minute restrictions relaxed, but we think that municipal councils must remain subject to some control in the matter of their establishments.

the future.

45409.

We consider that the appointment of municipal secretaries or other chief executive officers, and of engineers and health officers where these exist, should require the sanction of the Local Government in the case of cities, and of the Commissioner elsewhere ; and that the same sanction should be requisite for any alteration in the emoluments of these posts, and for the appointment or dismissal of the occupants. As regards other appointments, our proposals in regard to rural boards will apply, save that departure from schedules of salaries should, in cities, require the sanction of the Local Government.

848. The filling up of sanctioned municipal appointments, other than the special posts referred to above, and any serious punishment inflicted on a municipal officer, should usually, as in the case of the rural boards, be sanctioned by the collective council, on the recommendation of the chairman.

Procedure in respect to municipal servants.

In the larger cities, however, it would be desirable to follow the plan now adopted in the Presidency municipalities of Calcutta and Bombay, i.e., to give some powers in respect to appointment, promotion and punishment of officers to the chairman (or separate executive officer where there is one) ; others to a standing committee of the council ; and others again to the council as a whole. Appeals should lie from the chairman to the standing committee in the first place, and from the standing committee to the full council in the second.

There should, however, be no appeal to an outside authority by a municipal servant, as appears to be now allowed in some Provinces.

Constitution and proceedings.

Municipal councils should ordinarily contain a substantial elective majority.

849. In the North West Frontier Province all the members of the municipal councils are nominated or ex-officio; in the other Provinces the councils usually contain a considerable elective element*. The Municipal Acts prescribe this in proportions varying from one-half of the council in Bombay to three-quarters in Madras and the United Provinces, but they also allow the Local Government to depart from such proportions in particular cases. Taking the actual figures for 1906-7, the number of elected members in the municipal councils is 13 per cent. in Burma, 40 per cent. in Bombay†, and 50 per cent. approximately in Madras, the two Bengals and the Punjab; while in the Central Provinces it runs up to 60, and in the United Provinces to 77, per cent.

Imperial
Gazetteer,
Vol. IV.,

We agree with those witnesses who desire to see the elective principle extended‡, and, as in the case of rural boards, we think that a municipal council should ordinarily contain a substantial elective majority, nominees being only in sufficient proportion to provide for the due representation of minorities and official experience. There must of course be cases in which such an elective majority cannot immediately be worked up to, and these will be for the Local Governments to determine.

850. As regards methods of election, we need only repeat what we have said in the case of sub-district boards, that members should be chosen in ways best suited to local conditions, as laid down in the Government of India Resolution of May, 1882. The main object should be to secure an effective representation of the various classes in each town, and the selection of fit representatives.

Para. 789.

There have been complaints§ that electorates are small, and that the elections do not excite interest or bring forward good men. A class system of representation, which exists in Rangoon and in some of the Punjab municipalities, seems to have worked fairly satisfactorily.

in respect to the municipal chairmanship.

851. Lord Ripon's Local Self Government Resolution of 18th May, 1882, contemplated that municipal councils should usually elect their own president or chairman (the term varies in different Provinces) who would generally be a non-official. But the only Provinces in which there is as yet any large proportion of elected non-official chairmen are Madras, the Central Provinces and the two Bengals.

permitting election where two-thirds of a municipal council can agree in the choice of a chairman.

In the United Provinces there is nominal freedom of election, except in the case of cities of over 100,000 inhabitants, where the Collector has hitherto held the chairmanship by virtue of his office.* But he is nearly always elected chairman in the other towns, and the Joint Magistrate at headquarters is ex-officio a member of every municipal council in the district. In the Punjab the Collector (Deputy Commissioner) is chairman of the headquarters municipalities; and in the majority of the outlying towns the chairmanship is also in official hands, and is usually held by the tahsildar. In Burma the Deputy Commissioner is always chairman, with another official (usually the Civil Surgeon) as vice-chairman.

852. There is a considerable consensus of non-official opinion, especially in Madras, Bombay and the two Bengals, in favour of dissociating the Collector and his Assistants from the chairmanship of municipal bodies whenever this is practicable, and we agree in thinking that the municipal chairman should usually be an elected non-official. The circumstances of municipalities differ from those of rural boards in that they are much less connected with the general district administration, that political education has reached a higher level, and that the jurisdictional area is much smaller and more compact. The arguments which led us to recommend official presidents for rural boards do not, therefore, apply here.

Government officers should not be allowed to stand for election, since this would in many places virtually imply their return; but in towns in which the Local Government considers that a nominated chairman is still required, the nominee should be an official. An official should not, however, be ordinarily nominated as chairman of more than one municipality.†

35819.

853. In some of the largest cities it might be desirable to adopt the method in force in the city of Bombay, i.e., to have an elected chairman of the municipal council, who would be the presiding member and official mouthpiece of the council as a whole, but to vest the executive administration in a full-time nominated official, subject to the control of the council and of a standing committee thereof. Such an arrangement would meet the argument that an elected chairman of a large city municipality, who might often be a busy professional man, would not have the time, or the experience, to administer it satisfactorily.

The chairman should usually be an elected non-official. Where a nominated chairman is required, he should be an official.

In some of the larger cities it might be desirable to dissociate the chairman from direct executive functions.

Delegation of functions to committees.

856. Save in Madras municipal councils seem to work largely through committees, and we think that these councils should, like rural boards, have full discretion to delegate their administrative functions in this way, and that they should be able to appoint persons outside the council to such committees when this may be thought desirable. 7737-9, 18301, 19629, 25886, 29615, 33748, 36195, 38892, 39741-3. Municipal administration reports.

858. Municipal administration reports are now usually reviewed by the authority which passes the municipal budget. Ordinarily, we think that the review of these reports should be left to the Collector, the council submitting its report to him through the Sub-divisional officer; but if the Collector is himself the chairman, and in cities, the review should be by the Commissioner. The Local Government should, however, continue, as at present, to make an annual general review of the working of all municipalities in the Province. 31063. Cf. Vol. VII., App. III., p. 188.

Outside control.

Functions of Government in regard to creation and abolition of municipalities, etc.

859. Except in Sind, where the Commissioner occupies a special position, the sanction of the Local Government is required to the establishment, supersession or abolition of a municipality, or to anything which touches the elective principle or the right to elect a chairman.† Elsewhere, such functions should not be delegated to a lower authority than the Local Government; but we would do away with the necessity for reference to the Government of India on these matters, which is now required by certain Acts in the United Provinces, the Punjab, Burma and the Central Provinces.‡ 45860.

Control by Collectors and Commissioners.

860. The Collector should retain the power, given under existing Acts, to require the execution by a municipal council of its resolutions, or, in special cases, to suspend the operation of such resolutions pending report to higher authority.§ The Commissioner, again, should be able, as in the case of rural boards, to require a council which has neglected a particular service, and has not attended to his advice and remonstrance, to take such action as he may consider necessary. Para. 803. Cf. Act XX. (Punjab), of 1891, secs. 178-9.

Inspection.

861. Collectors, Sub-divisional officers, and officers of special Government departments should have the same right of inspection, etc., in regard to municipal works and institutions, as we have proposed in the case of rural boards. Para. 803.

* Mr. Dutt would leave these matters in the hands of the Local Governments, or of a Local Government Board if one is created, on the ground that their delegation to a Commissioner would lower the prestige and independence of members of municipal councils.

- Vol. III., Para. 804. 862. We had some suggestions in Burma and the United Provinces as to giving municipalities larger powers to frame bye-laws ; but, as in the case of rural boards, we consider that such bye-laws should require the sanction of outside authority, which should here be that of the Local Government in the case of cities and of the Commissioner elsewhere. The Local Government may suitably prescribe model bye-laws for the guidance of municipalities and Commissioners. Municipal bye-laws should require the sanction of outside authority.
- 7224, 27852, 863. The placing of minor municipalities under the district boards was a question on which we invited the opinion of witnesses. The general evidence was, however, against the suggestion, and having regard to the large powers we recommend for municipalities, we see no object in such control. Matters on which outside control is to be reserved are of such vital importance that they ought to be dealt with by a representative of the executive Government, or by the Government itself. Nor should the district board exercise control over the work of the embryonic municipalities which we propose to place under town panchayats. Minor municipalities and town panchayats should not be placed under the district boards.

- Presidency municipalities.*
- Imperial Gazetteer, Vol. IV., pp. 284-5. 864. The Presidency municipalities of Calcutta, Bombay and Madras are of older date than the other municipalities of British India, and the first beginnings of local self-government in these towns go back to the 17th and 18th centuries. They are now governed by special Acts, which lay down the functions of the municipal councils, or corporations as they are here styled, and prescribe the taxation they may levy and their borrowing powers. The resources and powers of these bodies are much larger than those of any district municipality. Presidency municipalities of Calcutta, Bombay, and Madras.

These corporations contain a proportion, which amounts to one-half in Calcutta and Bombay, and is somewhat larger in Madras, of members elected by the rate-payers, while some of the other members are chosen by special bodies such as Chambers of Commerce and Trades Associations, and in Bombay, also by justices of the peace. Each corporation has a statutory standing committee (one-third of its members being nominated by Government in Calcutta and Bombay) which is the determining and sanctioning authority in respect of a number of matters. In Calcutta and Madras the municipal Chairman is appointed by Government ; in Bombay he is elected by the corporation, but the executive administration is vested in a Commissioner nominated by Government. The Chairman in Calcutta and Madras, and the Commissioner in Bombay, can, however, be removed from office by a vote of the corporation, provided such vote is carried by a majority considerably in excess of one-half the total number of members. These officers are usually experienced members of the Indian Civil Service, and the Government fixes their pay, subject, in Bombay, to maximum and minimum rates of salary prescribed by law. Calcutta has also a Deputy Chairman and a Vice-Chairman, the former appointed by Government, the latter by the corporation subject to the approval of Government ; while the Bombay Act provides for the appointment of a Deputy Commissioner by the corporation, subject to the confirmation of the Local Government. Constitution of corporations.

Large powers allowed to the Calcutta and Bombay corporations.

866. The Calcutta and Bombay corporations are allowed very full discretion in the ordinary work of municipal administration. The Local Government does not pass the budgets of either body, or interfere with its liberty of regulating taxation within the provisions of the law. In Calcutta, however, Government sanction is required to the execution of works costing more than a lakh of rupees.

Relatively stringent control in Madras.

867. The control of the Local Government over the Madras municipality is far more stringent. Its budget, and any deviation therefrom, require Government sanction, as does also the levy of municipal taxes. Various sections of the Municipal Act give the Local Government control in regard to the exemption of areas from water, drainage or lighting rates, the construction of water-works, the acquisition of land for street improvements, etc.

Presidency municipalities should enjoy the same powers as Bombay. Rangoon should be placed in the same category.

Complaint has been made as to these restrictions, and we consider that all the Presidency corporations should have as full powers as Bombay now possesses; and that the Rangoon municipality ought to be treated on the same lines, in view of its population, the large future which lies before it, and the strength of the commercial community there.

A nominated executive Commissioner, side by side with an elected chairman, preferable to a nominated chairman.

869. We concur with Sir Herbert Risley in preferring the Bombay system of a nominated official Commissioner, with an elected Chairman of the corporation, to that of a nominated official Chairman which applies in Calcutta and Madras. The Bombay method, while keeping the executive power in the hands of an experienced official, provides a dignified post as a reward for, and an incentive to, public spirit and interest in municipal affairs.

Educational and medical expenditure.

870. The bulk of the normal expenditure of the Presidency municipalities is in respect of roads and streets, buildings, lighting, ordinary sanitation, and provision of drainage and water supply facilities. Their liabilities for education and medical charges vary in the three cities, with the extent to which the Government maintains or aids hospitals, colleges and schools in these Provincial capitals. Their precise sphere of responsibility in regard to these two subjects must be determined by local circumstances, but we hold that where it is considered expedient that hospitals and educational institutions should be controlled by Government, the municipality should not contribute thereto except as a matter of voluntary agreement.

871. It has been suggested that Government control over rural boards and municipalities should be exercised in each Province by a Local Government Board, which should contain a proportion of non-official members. Some witnesses who made this suggestion were, however, under the impression that they were following British precedent, and did not realize that the duties of the Local Government Board in England are discharged by a single Minister.

Unnecessary to constitute special Local Government Boards in the various Provinces, or Secretaries dealing with local and municipal affairs only.

The affairs of local boards are at present dealt with in special branches of the Provincial Government Secretariats, although the Secretaries in charge of these are also concerned with other subjects. Our proposals will very much reduce the outside control now exercised over the proceedings of these boards, and will provide for such control as is necessary being exercised, in large measure, by Commissioners and other local officers. The functions of the Local Governments will thus, in the main, be confined to the creation, abolition or suspension of local boards, the application of the elective principle, the sanction of loans, the giving of grants-in-aid, and the prescription of model bye-laws and establishment schedules; and we see no necessity to create a special controlling board to deal with such matters. Nor should these occupy the attention of Government to such an extent as to warrant the appointment of a separate Secretary for local and municipal affairs.*

* Mr. Dutt dissents from this opinion, and thinks that the supervision and guidance of a Local Government Board in each Province would greatly help and foster rural boards and municipalities, and would also secure harmonious work and some degree of uniformity. Certain matters in which the control of a Local Government Board is, in his opinion, desirable, have been indicated in footnotes in this and the preceding chapters.

† Supplementary memoranda, which follow, have been recorded by the Chairman, Sir F. Lely, Sir S. Edgerley, and Mr. Hichens.

SUPPLEMENTARY MEMORANDA BY INDIVIDUAL COMMISSIONERS.

NOTE BY THE CHAIRMAN.

Paragraphs 107-8 of the Report.

1. The present system by which Local Governments are obliged to raise loans for all purposes, through the medium of the Government of India, appears to me to be clumsy, dilatory and uneconomical. Local Governments should be gradually accustomed to accept the full responsibility which must eventually rest on them for the efficient conduct of their own finances. They cannot, in my judgment, fully realize this if they are subject, in the case of all but petty loans, to the control and guidance of a superior power upon whom ultimately rests the obligation to put right any miscalculations.

It is contended, however, that while this view may in theory be correct, there is, in fact, no market available which could supply funds to Local Governments without increased cost to the Indian taxpayer. The competition between the Central and Provincial Governments, it is asserted, would increase the interest payable on Imperial or Local stock, and lower the price at which they could be placed in the money market. India is, however, yearly absorbing large quantities of gold and silver, some considerable portion of which appears neither to be used in private trade nor to be available for loans offered by the Government of India. Burma, for instance, though in an exceedingly prosperous condition, supplies an inappreciable portion of loans raised by the Government of India and offered in the Province itself. On the other hand, the Government of India are at present unable to raise sufficient money for proposals of an urgent nature, such as railways and canals.

2. Some at least of the witnesses before us were of opinion that local money markets could be tapped by Provincial Governments for objects of a local character which the lender could see with his own eyes in operation, and from which, as a local owner of property, he would derive advantage from the enhanced value of his own property.

3. The argument that the resources of Provincial Governments are derived from assigned and not original revenues, and that therefore these Governments would have no permanent security to offer lenders which would secure reasonable terms, does not seem to me to be a strong one. In a sense this may be literally true, but the extension of the powers of the Legislative Councils, and the proposed extension of Executive Councils, prohibit any possibility of the present quasi-permanent settlements made between the Government of India and Provincial Governments being set aside to the detriment of the solvency or permanency of the latter. If, moreover, the financial condition of the Government of India was such as to preclude it from maintaining payments to the Provincial Governments, it would almost certainly be such as to prevent it from meeting its own creditors. The increasing belief in the stability of Provincial Governments, coupled with the increased share which potential lenders will have in the administration of their own Governments, together with an actual sight of the works in which their capital will be invested, all lead me to be certain that Local Governments could usefully and safely exploit local markets.

Paragraph 306 of the Report.

4. There is, neither in Madras or Bombay, a Chief Conservator of Forests. In the former province the Head of this—a highly technical department—is a member of the Board of Revenue, who, at all events under the existing system, may have little district experience in a superior position. Notwithstanding such possible defect, he is the responsible adviser to his Government, not only on questions of general policy, but on matters of technical knowledge.

A somewhat similar system obtains in Bombay where a territorial Commissioner takes, for his divisional area, the place of the member of the Board of Revenue. The senior of the three Conservators appears to have some consultative authority, but no administrative control, outside his own circle, in which he has, moreover, to do his ordinary work.

5. Such systems, in Presidencies where forests cover large areas and should afford an appreciable revenue both to the Imperial and Local Governments, cannot be considered adequate or satisfactory. Nor can references to the Imperial Government be deemed a satisfactory substitute for the regular advice to be expected from a co-ordinating Provincial official. Such references, if occasional, cannot result in decisions arrived at after close personal experience and inspection of the problems submitted; and if continuous, must inevitably tend to an interference with local control, which is strongly condemned by the Provincial Governments when dealing with other questions.

Paragraph 708 of the Report.

6. A survey of the evidence, and especially of the native evidence outside the Provinces of Madras and Bombay (in which I would not deprive village authorities of existing powers) leads me to hesitate as to the wisdom of conferring criminal, as well as civil, jurisdiction on panchayats.

7. Panchayat jurisdiction will have to be not merely maintained, but actually revived, over the greater part of India. Many witnesses, while desiring such reconstitution, were doubtful as to the result of the experiment, and expatiated upon the jealousy of castes and the danger of placing in the hands of these new village authorities, the power of deciding criminal cases with all the consequential results to the person of an unpopular defendant.

As one of the Punjab witnesses said, "there is no tyranny like the petty tyranny of a lambardar in a village." It does not seem to me justifiable to run the risk of allowing such petty tyranny to injuriously affect the revival of local autonomy until the capacity and probity of village panchayats in civil cases has been clearly demonstrated,

C. E. H. HOBHOUSE,

NOTE BY SIR F. LELY.

Paragraphs 75-9 of the Report.

1. In making the Provincial settlements the Government of India necessarily allow themselves a margin which results, in good years, in a substantial surplus. It has been their recent practice to allocate to the several Provinces a portion of this surplus for a special purpose chosen by themselves, generally accompanying the grant by instructions, more or less minute, as to the mode of its application. By the nature of the case it is impossible at the time of the settlement to anticipate the figures from year to year with any precision. The money in hand represents the savings which are actually found to have accrued on the making up of the accounts. In other words the so-called "dole" is a deferred assignment. If this is so, the Provincial Governments have a right to ask that the principles accepted in one case should be applied to the other—that the discretion practically allowed them in budgeting against their settled revenue should be extended also to these subsequent grants. As a matter of fact the supplementary distribution of revenue has been utilized as the readiest weapon of centralization. The reorganization by the Government of India of Provincial police forces would not have been possible without much friction, if it had not been accompanied by a promise to pay for it. I would certainly not require the unconditional allotment to the Provinces of every rupee that is not spent in the Imperial Budget, but as a general rule it should, I think, be left to the local authorities to decide what to do with the grant they receive. Most of the expenditure of the ordinary Provincial Budget is either recurrent or at least on fixed lines, and there is never very much scope for a general advance. Every Local Government must be keenly conscious of crying demands which cannot be met, and an occasional windfall would give it a chance it may never otherwise get. Nor am I able to appreciate the objections noted in paragraph 78. A ready criterion would be the amount of revenue enjoyed by every Province, but in any case the difficulty would be felt in the apportionment of the "dole" on any principle whatever. The second argument, if pressed home, might be used to justify the most detailed interference by the Government of India in Provincial administration. As to the possibility of military and other demands outweighing those of the Provinces, it is to be presumed that Local Governments will not fail to press their special wants in such a way as to establish a claim to recognition. This is implied in paragraph 79 (ii), which however does not, in my opinion, go far enough. It reserves to the Central Government the duty of overriding the Provincial Government if they differ from it on the question of comparative local urgency. This is, it seems to me, a negation of one of the principles we have accepted.

Paragraphs 112 and 114 of the Report.

2. District boards and municipalities cannot, at present, borrow for a work of improvement for a term of over twenty years without the sanction of the Government of India, that is, without much delay and without proving a special case. The Commission proposes to maintain this restriction, only extending the period to thirty years in the case of loans in the open market for amounts not exceeding five lakhs. Mr. Meston, whose opinion is followed on this subject, lays stress on the desire of tax-payers to reduce present burdens as far as possible. He might also have given them credit for a reluctance to tie up their surplus revenue in one, or perhaps two, projects, so as to deprive themselves of the power to undertake other, even minor, improvements in the interval. In India, perhaps more than elsewhere, rapid sanitary progress is impossible without the free use of credit, which is not in itself an evil if it is amply secured by assets. The local authorities should, it seems to me, be in a position to directly encourage self-governing bodies to embark on well-considered schemes by allowing them to distribute the outlay over at least a generation, that is thirty years. The cost of water-works or drainage does not vary so much with the income or population of a locality as with the natural facilities, and in many ordinary cases, the obligation of paying off a necessary loan in twenty years is crippling and unjust to the men of the present day. The instances cited by Mr. Meston are recommendations for much longer periods, and as such, scarcely relevant to the proposal to restrict loan powers to thirty years. This is a limit within which comparatively little harm could be done, while the extra ten years would stimulate municipal enterprise. Personally, I am so much impressed with the need of encouraging both rural and urban boards to undertake works promoting the public life and health, that I would trust the local authorities up to ten lakhs and forty years, believing that an expression of disapproval by the Central Government in any occasional case of undue lenience would be sufficient to check the growth of serious abuse.

F. S. P. LELY.

NOTE BY SIR STEYNING EDGERLEY AND MR. HICHENS.

Chapter III. of the Report (paragraphs 72, 87 and 99).

1. While we agree in general with the recommendations set forth in this chapter, we desire briefly to explain our attitude as regards the line of policy to be adopted in future, since our suggestions differ in certain particulars from the conclusions arrived at in the Report.

2. We think that the ultimate aim should be to give Provincial Governments independent sources of revenue and some separate powers of taxation, subject to the general control of the Government of India and the Secretary of State. While recognizing that this position can only be reached gradually and by cautious steps, we think that, in view of the wider powers which it is proposed to give to Provincial Legislatures, the time has come for a more definite movement in that direction than is necessarily implied in the Report of the Commission.

3. In the first place we would urge the importance of giving, subject to the general control of the Government of India and the Secretary of State, some separate powers of taxation to Provincial Governments, for it appears to us desirable that these should have more real financial responsibility than they possess to-day. At the present time, while they are to a considerable extent responsible for economical administration, the Provincial Governments are dependent for their resources on the Government of India. If they want to embark on fresh expenditure they must either economize in other directions, look to an automatic increase in their revenues, or apply to the Government of India for larger grants, since they have no power to modify taxation, subject to the small exceptions referred to in paragraph 97 of the Report. If the Government of India accept the request of a Provincial Government for further financial assistance, they usually have recourse to the expedient of "doles," discussed in paragraphs 75-9 of the Report.

4. The objections to this system referred to in paragraph 76 appear to us to carry great weight. The policy of doles is demoralizing and should be abandoned at the earliest possible date, but this reform can only be carried out when Provincial Governments are given some separate powers of taxation, for the alternative suggestion referred to in paragraph 65, under which the Government of India would be placed in funds by contributions from the Provinces, is no improvement on the existing position. The greatest safeguard for economical expenditure is that the authority which is responsible for it shall also be responsible to the public for raising the necessary funds. To-day Provincial Governments have no such responsibility for adjusting their expenditure to the capacity of the public for bearing the burden, and thus one of the most important attributes of government is withheld from them, while the fiscal system of the country tends to become unduly uniform and inelastic. On the other hand, the Provincial tax-payer has little inducement to consider the cost of improvements in administration, which he presses on the attention of Local Governments.

5. With reference to the objection of the Financial Secretary to the Government of India that increased Provincial taxation must fall chiefly on the land, we would point out that this criticism would not apply to the income tax, if fully provincialized. In 1882 the Government of India were prepared to entrust the management of the licence (now income) tax to district boards, and though the character of that tax was greatly altered in 1886, it would still seem to be a suitable head of taxation for Local Governments to control. There seems to be no adequate reason for a uniform rate of tax in all Provinces.

6. In the second place we think that Provincial Governments should have separate sources of revenue, and that the time has also come when the number of divided heads ought to be materially reduced. There is no doubt force in the argument referred to in paragraph 70 (i.) of the Report, that Local Governments benefit by broadening the bases of their revenue, and that the effect of reducing the number of divided heads will be to curtail the sources of revenue either of the Government of India or of Local Governments, but "he that will apply new remedies must expect new evils," and the objection is, in our opinion, outweighed by the consideration that, by reducing the number of divided heads, opportunities for overlapping discussion in the Imperial and Provincial Legislatures will be lessened, and the power of initiative and sense of responsibility in Local Governments will be increased.

44860. It appears also to us more important to promote the policy of independent sources of revenue than to secure, so far as possible, that the same share of the chief sources of revenue shall be given to each Province, a point on which some stress appears to be laid by the Government of India.

42247-8. The detailed arrangements involved in the above two recommendations are matters for negotiation between the Government of India and the Local Governments. We do not, therefore, discuss proposals to carry out the policy. Considerable progress, however, could at once be made in all Provinces by reducing fixed assignments to a minimum. Thus in the Punjab at the time of negotiation of the last settlement in 1904-5, the fixed assignment was limited to three lakhs. Owing to the addition of recurring grants for police, education, grants to rural boards, etc., the figure had grown when we took evidence to 58½ lakhs. That amount was more than sufficient, on the figures put before us, to provincialize fully the revenue and expenditure under the heads excise, stamps, forests, and assessed taxes.

Cf. para. 742. 7. Lastly, we think that the Budgets of Provincial Governments should no longer be incorporated in that of the Government of India. There is, in our opinion, no stronger case for including Provincial Budgets in that of the Government of India than there is for embodying the Budgets of local boards in those of Provincial Governments. For purposes of statistics and comparative study the more useful figures of actual revenue and expenditure for India (whether Imperial, Provincial or Local) can still be presented as a whole in the 'Finance and Revenue Accounts.' The treatment of municipal funds as 'excluded' has undoubtedly greatly aided the progress of local self-government in those bodies, and the exclusion of the accounts and estimates of rural boards from the Government of India Budget in 1908-9 has paved the way for larger local decentralization. There is therefore every reason to infer that the entire separation of the Provincial and the Imperial Budgets will contribute to the growth of greater freedom in Provincial administration.

Para. 772. 8. It will also simplify the Budget of the Government of India, and will render it unnecessary to make the introduction of that Budget the occasion for a discussion ranging over the whole field of Indian administration. The Imperial Budget, and the discussion thereon, can then be confined to the consideration of Imperial resources and obligations, and this will effectually secure that local matters already debated in Provincial Legislatures shall not be again discussed in the Imperial Council.

9. Provincial Budgets should still be submitted to the Government of India, for consideration of their policy, before introduction in the Provincial Legislatures; and they should still require the sanction of the Government of India after discussion in those assemblies. Provided, however, that Local Governments maintain the prescribed minimum balance, and observe the general policy and financial rules of the Government of India, this ultimate sanction would, save in very exceptional circumstances, be purely formal. It must also be remembered that the accounting and audit work is carried out by the Government of India, and that Local Governments have no borrowing powers. The Government of India will, therefore, still retain ample powers of general control over the financial policy of Local Governments.

S. W. EDGERLEY,
W. L. HICHENS.

NOTE BY MR. HICHENS.

Paragraph 661 of the Report.

1. I am unable to agree with the general purport of this paragraph, which is that the length of tenure of appointments, such as the headship of a district, should be limited.

2. The majority of witnesses who spoke to the point thought that a Collector's tenure of his charge should be limited to three or five years, for the reasons enumerated in the Report, viz., that a varied experience is desirable, and that a prolonged stay in a single district may render an officer narrow-minded or apathetic, may enable his subordinates to learn or play upon his idiosyncrasies, and may prejudice the district by the fact that he is not equally interested in all branches of the administration.

3. These objections, doubtless, are not without force, but there are certain qualifying circumstances which seem to be worth mentioning. In the first place, an officer does not usually attain to the full rank of Collector before he has served at least ten years, and by that time his judgment should be sufficiently mature, and his experience sufficiently ripe, to enable him to cope with the problems of district administration.

Again, the tendency to narrow-mindedness or apathy can be mitigated by the judicious taking of leave and the personal influence of the Commissioner. Moreover, the work of a district is varied in character, and, in the opinion of an officer who had himself served in one district 16188. for six years, the more a man knows about a district, the more interested he gets.

4. Apart from this, an objection which appeared to be uppermost in the minds of certain non-official witnesses was of a different character. They could not contemplate with equanimity the chance of a district being saddled with an unpopular Collector for an indefinite period, and preferred the certainty that their unhappiness would be short to the possibility of prolonged well-being.

5. This view appears to be unduly pessimistic. Probably there always have been, and always will be, Collectors who are harsh and unsympathetic, but these are exceptional. The Indian Civil Service is second to none, not merely from the point of view of efficiency, but from that of the high level of disinterested enthusiasm by which its members are actuated, and that this is not more fully appreciated in India is largely due to the fact that it has now come to be taken for granted.

There is no justification for assuming that officers will, save in exceptional cases, be harsh or unsympathetic, and to base administrative policy on such an assumption would be a mistake. The obvious course is to shape the early training of officers so as to check such failings, and in the last resort to remove anyone who proves wholly unsuitable.

6. A more serious objection to the prolonged tenure of district charges is the fact that some districts are much less attractive, both climatically or otherwise, than others. It may seem unfair that one District Officer should be condemned to spend a large part of his life in a lonely or unhealthy district, while another lives in pleasant surroundings, and, from the point of view of the individual, no doubt this is so. Public interests are, however, paramount, and if it can be shown that a prolonged tenure of a district charge is of vital importance to good administration, personal considerations must give way. Districts vary also in importance, and it may be urged that the Collector of an easy district may not have full opportunities of proving his worth. Moreover, it may be difficult to select the best men for the heavy charges. The answer is that by a proper system the Government should be able to judge of a man's capacity before he attains the rank of Collector, and that even in the lightest district there is work waiting to be done which will tax the highest capacities of an officer. It should also be the business of Commissioners to see that comparatively unobtrusive work of this nature is not overlooked.

7. I have set out the objections to a prolonged tenure of such charges as clearly as I can, and with no wish to minimize them, because it seems to me that the question is of the greatest importance.

The success or failure of British administration in India depends primarily on the quality of district administration, and, according as that administration is good or bad, will the Government of the country be judged in the eyes of the great mass of the population. It appears to me that really efficient and sympathetic district administration depends mainly on a thorough knowledge of the people by the Collector, and even more of the Collector by the people ; and for the acquisition of such a knowledge the short space of 3 or even 5 years seems miserably inadequate.

The personal equation must necessarily enter very largely into the work of district administration, and it is of paramount importance that the Collector should win the respect and affection of the people of his district. A brief sojourn of a few years cannot effect this.

8. It is no answer to say that within this period a Collector gets to know not merely his subordinate officials but the leading men of the district, and gains a slight acquaintance with the more prominent village notabilities. To the great mass of the people he will be an unknown quantity, and there is consequently no basis for the mutual feelings of confidence and regard which are the only sure foundation of good government.

Nor, again, is it a sufficient answer to say that a Collector will probably have spent much of his earlier years in some of the districts which he is eventually called upon to administer.

9. The evidence of some witnesses, whose opinions are entitled to great weight owing to their long Indian experience, is strongly in favour of a prolonged tenure of district charges. For example, Dr. Campbell, who has resided for 35 years in the Chota Nagpur division, emphasizes the desirability of a long residence in a district by a Collector, and he attributes the fact that executive officers are out of touch with the people largely to the shortness of their tenure of a charge. He mentions that the one man in the Gobindpur sub-division who is remembered to-day was there for a long time, and refers with approval to the case of a Commissioner who ruled his division for a quarter of a century. 17838.

Nor is this view confined to non-officials. For example, an officer who was for six years in the Santhal Parganas urges the importance of continuity. District Officers, he says, should be as permanent as officers in a native regiment. 16144. 16125.

10. The ideal to be aimed at is that when once an officer attains the full rank of Collector and is placed in charge of a district, he should remain there, subject to leave requirements, for the rest of his service or until he is promoted.

Recruitment for higher posts will, no doubt, absorb a considerable number of Collectors, but a large proportion cannot under normal conditions expect to rise beyond the rank of Collector.

For those reasons the administration of a district should be regarded as the work in life of the ordinary Civilian on the executive side, and his training should be shaped to that end. With this object in view it is desirable that officers should have a wide experience during their earlier years, and should be acquainted not merely with the district administration of their own province in all its aspects, but with secretariat work.

11. A great advance will have been made if the policy of permanence of district tenure is clearly and unmistakably recognized, and it seems to me that nothing short of it will avail to stop the pernicious rapidity of transfer which now obtains.

Doubtless it will be very difficult, if not impossible, to give effect to it in its entirety, but it will not be hard to improve on the present position which is that a Collector who has been more than six years in charge of one district is regarded as a curiosity. Moreover its recognition will prevent an officer being transferred merely because he has been three or five years in one district.

12. Apart from the difficulties already referred to, the chief practical obstacles appear to be :—

(a) Absence on leave or through sickness.

The principle underlying the present leave regulations appears to be that officers should go on leave at long intervals and for long periods, rather than at short intervals and for short periods. The latter alternative appears to me preferable, and I am in favour of the suggestion thrown out in paragraph 157 of the Report that periods of furlough leave, which are usually on half pay, should be commutable to shorter leave of absence on higher pay.

This proposal does not involve increasing the frequency of transfers, because the staff in every district should normally be sufficiently strong to provide for the replacement of officers when on leave by substitutes within the district. It should also be strong enough to enable District Officers to take a few weeks' leave in India each year.

13. These proposals are intended to prevent prolonged absence on ordinary leave and to minimize the chances of serious breakdown, but doubtless cases of sickness must occur, in which longer periods of absence from duty will be necessary. In such cases it might not be desirable that the acting promotion should go to the subordinate on the spot.

These recommendations will doubtless involve a considerable increase of staff, but the expense appears justified by the paramount importance of securing that the district administration shall be efficient and stable, and that the European element shall be sufficiently large to be brought into direct and personal touch with all classes of the people.

14. (b) Promotion and deputation.

The field of work, open to the ordinary Civilian, is necessarily wide, and it would be fatal to the prospects of recruitment if broad avenues of employment were not open to candidates. Moreover, since the highest posts under Government are held by members of the Service, it is desirable that their experience should be wide.

With all its advantages, however, the principle of mobility is inconsistent with the permanence of tenure which it is desirable to secure. It becomes of importance, therefore, to prevent its abuse. Where, as in the case of the Customs, Accounts, and Postal Departments, special services have been created with conditions of their own, it should never be necessary to trench upon the district staff for the purpose of supplying them with officers. The principle of specialization, which has been largely accepted in theory, should be strictly adhered to in practice, and not merely the special departments, but the body of District Officers themselves, should be regarded as a distinct and self-contained service, with a training and prospects of its own.

W. L. HICHENS.

GENERAL SUMMARY OF CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS.*

General relations of the Provincial Governments with the Government of India: Chapter II.

1. Provincial Governments should be subject in all respects to the general control of the Government of India, and their functions and powers should be variable by that Government or by the Secretary of State. Para. 46.

2. Future policy should be directed to the enlargement of the spheres of detailed administration entrusted to Local Governments and the authorities subordinate to them. Para. 49.

Finance: Chapter III.

3. While, in present circumstances, we are generally satisfied with the financial relations now existing between the Government of India and the Local Governments, we suggest :—

(i.) That when fixed assignments in any Province become unduly large, they should be commuted, as circumstances permit, into shares of growing revenue. Para. 69.

(ii.) That when the revenues of Provincial Governments require general increase, this might be provided by gradually provincializing certain heads of revenue which are now divided. Para. 71.

(iii.) That in respect of services for which they pay, wholly or in part, Provincial Governments should receive the powers lately granted to the Government of India as regards creation of appointments, and alteration in their emoluments ; grant of office, house, conveyance or fixed travelling allowances ; passing of additions to minor establishments up to a limit of Rs. 50,000 per annum ; and deputation and temporary appointments. Paras. 120, 123, 129, & 133-5.

We also suggest further enhancement of the powers of the Government of India, and of Provincial Governments, in respect to the creation of new appointments, and the raising of salaries. Para. 121.

(iv.) That the restrictions on Local Governments in respect to the abolition of appointments or reduction in their emoluments, and to the creation, abolition, or reduction in pay, of classes or grades of officers should be done away with in the case of 'Provincial' and 'Subordinate' services. Paras. 125-127.

(v.) That uniformity of pay is unnecessary in respect of 'Provincial' and 'Subordinate' services of the same general character, but working under different Local Governments ; and that rules for the recruitment of 'Provincial' services need not require the sanction of the Government of India. Para. 128.

4. If, however, Provincial Legislative Councils obtain an effective control over Provincial finances, we consider that it will be necessary hereafter :—

(i.) To give the Provinces more distinct sources of revenue, and greater powers over their budgets. Para. 87.

(ii.) To allow Local Governments to impose special Provincial taxation, subject to the preliminary sanction of the Government of India and the Secretary of State. Para. 99.

(iii.) To give them larger latitude in regard to appointments belonging to 'Provincial' and 'Subordinate' services. Paras. 122 & 133.

(iv.) To raise the Rs. 50,000 limit above referred to in the case of minor establishments, and to confine Para. 130.

* Dissents recorded by individual members on certain points are not mentioned here.

scrutiny of proposals in respect of such establishments to financial considerations.

Para. 131. 5. We deprecate, even in present circumstances, minute criticism on points of administrative detail in cases which Local Governments have to submit for sanction under financial rules.

Paras. 146-7. 6. We recommend some increase of the powers of Provincial Governments in dealing with establishments which are wholly paid for from Imperial revenues ; and we propose that the Chief Commissioner of the North-West Frontier Province should be given a quasi-provincial settlement.

Paras. 155-7. 7. In regard to the Civil Service Regulations, we think :—

(i.) That a number of the rules are rigid and complicated, especially those relating to leave, travelling allowances, and “foreign service.”

(ii.) That in respect of officers serving under them, Local Governments should usually have the same power to relax ordinary rules in special cases as is enjoyed by the Government of India.

(iii.) That they should be allowed to delegate to Boards of Revenue, heads of Provincial departments, and Commissioners—in respect of officers appointed by, or serving under these—a large portion of the powers vested in them by the Code.

Para. 158. We recommend that the Civil Service Regulations should be thoroughly revised in accordance with the principles we have suggested.

Para. 169. 8. The Civil Account Code is also unnecessarily minute, and should be revised so as to confine it to rules of procedure necessary from the point of view of Imperial finance.

Paras. 175-6. 9. Accounts rules and procedure, and audit requirements should be simpler in the case of expenditure incurred by local bodies, than in the case of direct Government outlay.

Para. 186. 10. The detailed control hitherto exercised by the Government of India over Excise administration in the Provinces should now be largely diminished.

Public Works : Chapter IV.

Paras. 201-2. 11. We point out the necessity for further decentralization in regard to the Public Works Department. Our principal recommendations are as follows :—

Para. 206. (i.) Local Governments and the Government of India should be allowed to pass estimates for individual works up to a limit of 20 lakhs total cost, the present limit being 12½ lakhs.

Para. 208. (ii.) The Governments of the other major Provinces should have the same power of passing construction estimates for Imperial works as is now enjoyed by Madras and Bombay.

Para. 211. (iii.) Local Governments should be allowed full discretion in delegating to their officers powers of professional sanction in respect to public works.

Para. 214. (iv.) They should have larger discretion in the matter of constructing houses for their officers.

Para. 220. (v.) The Governments of all the major Provinces should be able (as Madras and Bombay now are) to appoint their own Chief and Superintending Engineers.

Para. 223. (vi.) Local Governments should not be under any special restrictions in respect to their ‘Provincial’ and ‘Subordinate’ public works staff.

12. With a possible exception in regard to railways, Para. 224.
the Public Works accounting staff should be under the Finance Department of the Government of India.

13. The Public Works Code should be materially Para. 229.
simplified, its provisions being confined to rulings necessary for general application in the interests of Imperial finance and control.

Land Revenue : Chapter v.

14. All the major Provinces should have the same Paras. 245, powers as the Governments of Madras and Bombay now 249, & possess in settlement matters. 253-5.

15. The general principles of land revenue assess- Para. 252.
ment should be embodied in Provincial legislation.

16. In land revenue, and in all other matters, rules Para. 259.
which an Act permits to be made by a Local Government should be subject merely to the general control of the Government of India, and not to its previous sanction.

17. We suggest general principles in respect to Paras.
alienation of Government land and rights appertaining 273-5.
thereto, which give a clearer position, and larger freedom, to the Local Governments. The general principles governing such alienation should be made the subject of legislation.

Forests, etc. : Chapter vi.

18. We emphasize the need for further decentraliza- Paras. 292 tion in regard to forest administration, and recommend & 317.
that :—

(i.) The Inspector-General of Forests should cease to Para. 305.
be a de facto Deputy Secretary to the Government of India, and be simply an advisory and inspecting officer.

(ii.) The Governments of all major Provinces which Para. 306.
possess a considerable forest staff should be able to appoint their own Conservators (and Chief Conservators where these exist) as Madras and Bombay now do.

(iii.) Certain restrictions now imposed on Local Paras.
Governments by the Forest Acts should be relaxed, and 310-11.
any future important amendment of the Forest law should be undertaken in the Provincial Legislative Councils.

(iv.) If the Indian Forest Code is to be retained at Para. 315.
all, it should only contain matters essential for Imperial control.

*Subjects dealt with in the Home Department :
Chapter vii.*

19. In regard to police, the control of the Govern- Paras.
ment of India, apart from that vested in them by financial 349-50.
rules, should be limited to the prescription of general principles and lines of policy. Nor should they exercise any special control over 'Provincial' and 'Subordinate' police establishments in the Provinces.

20. Any material alteration in the Police laws should Para. 351.
be effected by Provincial legislation.

21. While desiring to maintain the Indian Medical Paras. 377 Service as an Imperial, and essentially military, organi- & 384.
zation, we recommend that Local Governments should have larger control in respect to commissioned medical officers doing civil work in the Provinces. In particular, they should be able to select the heads of their Medical and Sanitary Departments.

Para. 379. 22. Local Governments should have as full power over their civil assistant surgeons and hospital assistants as in regard to other 'Provincial' and 'Subordinate' services.

Imperial Inspectors General: Chapter VIII.

Paras. 395-404. 23. We dwell upon the danger of these officers—who should be mainly confined to technical functions, inspection, and the giving of advice and information—being allowed to usurp any administrative control in respect to Provincial departments, and we lay down what their duties ought to be, and how they should be exercised.

Legislation, Appeals, and Reports and Returns: Chapter IX.

Paras. 414-16. 24. The legislative amendments consequent on our proposals can be most conveniently accomplished by the enactment of a General Act of Delegation, which will permit the transmission of executive functions to a lower authority than that indicated in any particular Act, by Government notification. We suggest conditions and safeguards which will prevent this procedure from leading to any material encroachment on the prerogatives of the Legislatures.

Paras. 422-4. 25. Officers of 'Imperial' services must retain a right of appeal against orders of a Local Government which affect them prejudicially. Otherwise, we would only, as a rule, allow appeal from original orders of Local Governments. Where these have acted as appellate authorities, their decisions should be final.

Para. 429. 26. As a means of reducing reports and returns, we suggest a fresh inquiry similar to that set on foot by Lord Curzon's administration, which should be repeated every few years.

Para. 433. 27. Provincial administrative codes and manuals are too lengthy, and should be curtailed as opportunity offers.

Constitution of Provincial Governments: Chapter X.

Paras. 439-446. 28. From the administrative point of view, we consider that the system of single Lieutenant-Governors is no longer suited to the larger Provinces. We are not in favour, however, of providing Civilian Lieutenant-Governors with Civilian colleagues, or of converting members of Boards of Revenue into subordinate colleagues of the Lieutenant-Governor. We prefer a regular Council Government, such as exists in Madras and Bombay, with a Governor usually, but not invariably, appointed from Home. We think that all Council Governments should consist of not less than four members besides the Governor, and that not less than two of these should be appointed under the conditions which now apply in Madras and Bombay. This enlargement would permit of the appointment of specially qualified natives of India.

We recognize, however, that change in the existing system is not equally urgent in all Provinces, and that the time for making such change must be largely determined by political considerations.

Paras. 449-50. 29. We make suggestions for placing Secretariat officers more in touch with district work, and we draw attention to an undesirable tendency to uniformity in Provinces whose constituent portions are not homogeneous.

Paras. 452-3. 30. Executive Councils of the character we propose should allow of more satisfactory arrangements for the control of public works and finance in the Provinces.

Board of Revenue and Financial Commissioners: Chapter XI.

31. We think that, with the Local Governments constituted as at present, Boards of Revenue and Financial Commissioners should be retained; but that they might advantageously be absorbed in the Executive Councils which we have suggested. Paras. 465-9.

32. In that event, the existing Board of Revenue in Madras should be replaced by a system of territorial Commissioners. Under existing conditions, we would enlarge the functions of the Board of Revenue so as to include matters, outside revenue, dealt with by Commissioners in other Provinces. Paras. 473-4.

33. In Bombay, where there is no Board of Revenue, Commissioners should have full opportunity for collective consultation, while an enlarged Executive Council should afford the further co-ordination in respect of revenue matters which is elsewhere provided by a Board of Revenue or Financial Commissioner. Para. 476.

34. So long as Boards of Revenue and Financial Commissioners remain, they should have larger powers than at present, the control of the Local Government in matters dealt with by the Board, etc., being confined, as far as possible, to matters of principle and policy. Paras. 477-8.

Commissioners: Chapter XII.

35. We consider it essential to give larger powers to Commissioners, and reject proposals for their abolition, or their conversion into mere advisory and inspecting officers. Paras. 485-6.

36. It is specially necessary to entrust them with the co-ordination of the work of the various special departments within their divisions. A Commissioner should have full right to call for any information from the officers of such departments, and to have it given to him spontaneously in regard to any proposed new departure of importance. Any views he may express should receive the fullest consideration, and he should be able to stop any action of a department which he considers undesirable, reference to the Local Government being thereupon made if the departmental authorities ask for it. Paras. 487-8.

37. We make specific suggestions for co-ordination in respect of local public works expenditure. Para. 494.

38. We make proposals for giving Commissioners and Collectors a voice in regard to secondary and collegiate education, and in respect of training and technical schools. Para. 502

39. We suggest larger financial powers for Commissioners. Paras. 505-9.

40. We consider that they should have power to appoint tahsildars and officers of like standing; that they should be able to post junior Civilians and Deputy Collectors within their divisions; and that they should be competent to invest officers with magisterial powers. Paras. 512, 515-6.

41. In matters connected with land revenue and general administration, Commissioners should be given all powers which cannot safely be delegated to Collectors, and the exercise of which is not deemed an essential function of the headquarters officers. Para. 518.

Paras.
522-3.

42. We suggest the general adoption of a system of Provincial conferences similar to that adopted in Bengal. Such conferences would consist of (a) Commissioners of divisions ; and (b) members of the Board of Revenue, or the Financial Commissioner, of the Province (so long as these exist), Secretaries to Government, and heads of Provincial departments. Non-officials of standing should also be invited to attend for the discussion of particular subjects.

Para. 524.

43. Commissioners in all Provinces should also meet by themselves for the discussion of important questions, and should be able to submit joint representations to Government on questions of policy and procedure.

Para. 525.

44. We suggest that the Provincial conferences should be supplemented by analogously constituted conferences in each division.

Paras.
533-4.

45. We do not consider it advisable to create special advisory councils for Commissioners and Collectors, in view of the fact that the Commissioner will have the benefit of the opinions of the divisional conference above suggested, while the Collector can consult his district board. We should like to see the practice of consultation with the district board on matters outside their legal sphere, extended.

Collectors: Chapter XIII.

Paras.
538-9.

46. We consider it necessary to enhance the powers and position of the Collector. He should be recognized as the head of the district in all administrative matters ; and he should be entitled to call for information from officers of special departments, and to have such information given to him spontaneously in matters of importance, while any views he may express should receive the fullest consideration from such officers.

Paras.
544-5.

47. The Collector should have a weighty voice in regard to the distribution of irrigation water, outlay on Provincial roads, and other matters dealt with by the Public Works Department ; but his relations with the officers of that department in such matters must be left for Local Governments to determine.

Paras.
547-8.

48. His present position in regard to police matters should in no case be weakened.

Paras.
552-3.

49. In all matters affecting the people, district forest officers should be regarded as assistants to the Collector ; and minor forest lands and pastures might be transferred to the control of the land revenue authorities.

Paras.
554-5.

50. In matters connected with land revenue and general administration, our recommendations for the universal application and development of the sub-divisional system will make the Collector mainly a supervising, controlling, and appellate authority in regard to the ordinary district administration. The relief from detailed work thus given to Collectors will enable the transmission to them of a variety of powers hitherto reserved to Commissioners. The general presumption should be that, in cases which come up to him, the Collector should be the deciding authority ; and while there are certain matters, financial and otherwise, in which he cannot be given a free hand, the sphere of these should be limited as far as possible.

Paras.
556-9.

51. We make suggestions for giving larger financial powers to Collectors, and for improving their office establishments.

52. District establishments which deal with land records or with work in connexion with assessments outside a special land revenue settlement, should be under the Collector, and the main results of land revenue settlement schemes should be submitted by the Settlement Officer through him. Paras. 563-4.

53. The Collector should be the final authority in matters affecting village officers. Para. 565.

54. The necessity for a general increase in the district staff cannot be gauged until the full effect of our proposals has been considered, but we are satisfied that an increase in the cadre is of primary importance in several Provinces, and we think this question should be taken up without delay. Para. 570.

Sub-divisional, and other subordinate district, officers:
Chapter XIV.

55. We consider that the sub-divisional system should be universally applied; and that the Sub-divisional officer should be a Collector of first instance, having the tahsildars of his sub-division under him, and dealing himself with revenue matters which they cannot dispose of, or with appeals from them. Apart from special difficulties in decentralizing work affecting the realization of the land revenue in the two Bengals, the general presumption should be, that the Sub-divisional officer is competent to dispose (subject to appeal to the Collector) of questions with which the tahsildar cannot deal; but we indicate exceptions which must apply to such a general proposition. Paras. 582-7.

56. Sub-divisional officers should deal with the appointment and removal of village officers, and of junior clerks within their sub-divisions. Para. 589.

57. They should hear appeals in criminal cases from second and third class magistrates in their sub-divisions. Para. 590.

58. They should reside permanently within their charges, but they may spend some portion of the year at the headquarters of the district, if the Local Government considers this expedient. Para. 591.

59. In Provinces in which Collectors, Sub-divisional officers and tahsildars now dispose of civil suits, they should be relieved of this duty as soon as circumstances permit. Para. 594.

60. The tahsildar should be the disposing officer (subject to appeal to the Sub-divisional officer) in matters in which his opinion must in practice be accepted. We would not, however, give tahsildars financial powers, save in the matter of agricultural loans, nor the power to appoint to village offices, or to fill up vacancies, other than those occurring in menial posts, in their own office establishments. Paras. 595-6.

61. Tahsildars who discharge criminal functions should receive second class magisterial powers as soon as they have proved their fitness as magistrates of the third class, and some may expediently be granted first class powers. Para. 597.

62. We have had much evidence as to tahsildars being over-worked. In so far as they cannot adequately be relieved by the grant to them of larger powers, by the transfer of criminal case-work to separate officers, or by Para. 598.

the delegation of some of their functions to deputy tahsildars, the necessary remedy is reduction in the size of the heaviest tahsils.

Para. 599. 63. Deputy tahsildars should have powers of their own, and should not be merely head clerks to the tahsildar.

Para. 600. 64. We condemn the system of recruiting tahsildars from the clerical ranks which prevails in Madras. The subordinate revenue service should be divided into two grades, an upper and a lower, and the upper grade, which would include tahsildars and deputy tahsildars, should be separately recruited from young men of good character and family, and superior educational attainments. We would not, however, preclude the promotion of deserving men from the lower ranks.

Para. 601. 65. In the two Bengals, owing to the absence of charges corresponding to the tahsils of other Provinces, the direct communication of the administration with the people is mainly through the police. We propose to remedy this by the creation of circles, within the subdivisions, which would be in the local charge of sub-deputy collectors, who would hold the same position here as the tahsildars elsewhere.

Para. 602. 66. We desire to extend the system of appointing non-official gentlemen of position and influence to deal with criminal cases which would otherwise go before stipendiary courts.

Suspensions and remissions of land revenue, Agricultural loans, Acquisition of land for public purposes, and Court of Wards administration : Chapter xv.

Paras. 609 & 12. 67. We make proposals with the object of giving freer discretion to Commissioners and Collectors in respect of suspensions and remissions of land revenue.

Paras. 617-19. 68. We also propose larger powers to Commissioners, Collectors, Sub-divisional officers and tahsildars in respect to agricultural loans.

Paras. 622-3. 69. We suggest that Commissioners should be able to deal with minor cases of land acquisition for public purposes, which now have to go up to the Local Government.

Paras. 629-32. 70. We think that Commissioners and Collectors should have larger powers in the administration of Court of Wards estates, and we propose to effect this by dividing such estates into three classes. The management of all must rest primarily with the Collector, but his final powers in regard to third class estates might be much fuller than in respect to others, while Commissioners might similarly be entrusted with very full powers in respect to all but first class estates.

Para. 633. 71. Subject to their retention of general control, Collectors should be permitted to delegate to Sub-divisional officers or to local managers, all or any of their powers in Court of Wards matters.

Para. 635. 72. In the event of the disappearance of Boards of Revenue and Financial Commissioners, the Local Government would have to take their place as the central authority in Court of Wards matters ; but in that case, still larger powers ought to be given to the Commissioners.

*Method of appointment of Commissioners and Collectors, and the principal officers of other departments;
Transfers; Knowledge of the Vernaculars; Touring; and Contact with the people: Chapter XVI.*

73. Promotion to Collectorships should be by seniority, but subject to rigorous rejection of the unfit. This principle has already been laid down, but is not adequately applied in practice. Paras. 637-41.

74. When a man is found definitely incompetent to be a Collector, the Local Government should have the power to retire him on a suitable pension. Paras. 642-3.

75. The same principle should apply in regard to District Judges, and to high district officials in other departments. Para. 646.

76. Commissionerships should be filled by the best Collectors of the Province, seniority being only regarded when other qualifications are practically equal; but special pensions need not be granted to men not selected. Paras. 647-8.

77. The same principle should apply to the highest officers of other departments. Para. 649.

78. Transfers of district officers are far too frequent, and the attendant evils have not been adequately recognized by the Provincial Secretariats. We make suggestions for material reduction in transfers, and we consider that every effort should be made to keep an officer for three years, at the very least, in the same district. We draw attention also to the fact that transfers are particularly undesirable when they involve frequent changes of men between different language areas. Paras. 650-64.

79. We find that European officers, more especially in Madras, Bombay and the two Bengals, are not sufficiently acquainted with the vernaculars, and we suggest remedies for this. Paras. 665-8.

80. We also make some suggestions in regard to touring. Para. 671.

81. We consider that the officers of Government, and especially the European officers, are not in sufficient contact with the people; and while indicating the difficulties which have to be met, we make some suggestions for improvement. Paras. 673-4.

Appeals: Chapter XVII.

82. In Chapter IX. we have considered the question of appeals from decisions of Local Governments. We now deal with appeals within the Provinces.

We think that at least one appeal should be allowed to Government officers against any order which affects their prospects materially. Subject to this, we would leave the question of restricting appeals from such officers in the hands of Local Governments. No appeal should, however, be admitted from an officer passed over for promotion to a post to which considerations of seniority are not usually held to apply. Para. 684.

83. As regards other administrative appeals, each Local Government must fix its own conditions, but one appeal should ordinarily suffice as regards questions of fact, and when an appeal is allowed it should be to the next highest authority. Paras. 688-9.

- Para. 691. 84. The exercise of special revisionary powers in cases where a regular appeal does not lie should be very closely restricted.

Village organization : Chapter XVIII.

- Paras. 699-706. 85. It is most desirable to constitute and develop village panchayats for the administration of certain local affairs within the villages. This system must, however, be gradually and cautiously worked. The headman of the village, where one is recognized, should be ex-officio chairman of the panchayat; other members should be obtained by a system of informal election by the villagers. The panchayat should be a small body of about five members, and only in exceptional circumstances should different villages be brought under the same panchayat.

- Paras. 707-10. 86. The functions of panchayats must be largely determined by local circumstances and experience. We make the following general suggestions :—

- (i.) They should have summary jurisdiction in petty civil and criminal cases.
- Para. 711. (ii.) They should be allowed to incur expenditure on the cleansing of the village and minor village works.
- Paras. 712-13. (iii.) They might be entrusted with the construction and maintenance of village school-houses, and with some local control in respect of school management.
- Para. 714. (iv.) Selected panchayats might have the management of small fuel and fodder reserves.

- Paras. 715-19. 87. We consider it essential for the success of the panchayat system that it should not be concomitant with any new form of local taxation. Panchayats should receive a portion of the land cess levied for local board purposes in the village, special grants for particular objects of local importance, receipts from village cattle-pounds and markets entrusted to their management, and small fees on civil suits filed before them. Their application of the funds entrusted to them should be judged by general results, and should not be subject to rigid audit.

- Para. 721. 88. With the panchayat system thus developed, we do not consider it necessary to retain artificial local agencies such as village unions and sanitary committees.

- Para. 722. 89. Such outside supervision of panchayat affairs as is necessary, including the creation of new panchayats, enhancement or diminution of powers, and, where necessary, abolition of an unsatisfactory panchayat, must rest with the district officers. Panchayats should not be placed under the control of district or sub-district boards.

- Para. 723. 90. We call attention to evidence received in some Provinces as to the under-payment of village officers, and their resort to corrupt practices.

Rural Boards : Chapter XIX.

- Para. 736. 91. We think that sub-district boards should be universally established, and that they should be the principal agencies in rural boards administration.

- Ibid.* 92. Ordinarily a sub-district board should be established for each taluka or tahsil, but where sub-divisional boards have been working, or may be made to work, satisfactorily, the sub-division may remain the jurisdictional area.

93. We do not, however, propose to abolish district boards, or to make them mere councils of delegates from the sub-district boards for the settlement of matters of common interest. Nor, on the other hand, do we desire to place sub-district boards entirely under the control of the board for the whole district. We suggest a scheme under which the sub-district boards will have independent resources, separate spheres of duty, and larger responsibilities within these; while the district board, besides undertaking some direct functions for which it seems specially fitted, will possess co-ordinating and financial powers in respect of the district as a whole.

Paras.
737-40.

94. Sub-district boards should have the charge of minor roads in the district; of primary and (where they desire it) of middle vernacular education; of medical work; of vaccination; and of sanitary work in rural areas where this has not been entrusted to panchayats.

Paras. 746,
751-3,
758-60.

95. They should have a freer hand than at present in respect of school curricula and other matters dealt with in the Provincial Educational Codes, and should seek to promote education by grants-in-aid to indigenous or private institutions rather than through board schools. The board school staff, and the local inspecting agency required for board and aided schools, should be under their control, but there should be a further inspection of such schools on behalf of Government.

Paras.
753-6.

96. The district board should keep up the main roads in the district, with the exception of trunk roads which should be a Government charge; and should maintain district services, for work under the sub-district boards, in respect of roads, education, medical relief and sanitation.

Paras. 746,
748, 755,
758 & 760.

97. District boards which desire to maintain their own engineers should be allowed to do so, and it should be left to the discretion of the Local Governments to employ such engineers to execute minor works for Government.

Paras. 747
& 750.

98. The present restrictions on the sanction of ordinary works and sanitation estimates by rural boards should be abrogated, but they should have the right to call upon Government engineers and sanitary officers for assistance in regard to such matters.

Paras. 749
& 761.

99. We see no objection to district boards levying a special cess for the construction of tramways or light railways, subject to the conditions now in force in Madras.

Para. 765.

100. The Government should place rural boards on a sounder financial footing—

(i.) By letting them have the whole of the land cess.

Para. 773.

(ii.) By rateable distribution of the special grant of 25 per cent. on the land cess now made.

Ibid.

(iii.) By increasing this grant when circumstances permit.

Para. 775.

(iv.) By taking over charges in respect of trunk roads; famine and plague relief; local veterinary work; and any charges now incurred by the boards in regard to police, registration of births and deaths, etc. Nor should rural boards be required to make any contribution in respect of Provincial services, for other items of Provincial administration, or for assistance rendered to them by Government officers in the ordinary course of their duties.

Paras. 746,
751, 762-4,
& 773.

- Para. 773. 101. Where poor districts require special grants from Government, these should be made in lump sums, or as percentages of expenditure incurred on specific services, and they should be given under a quasi-permanent settlement.
- Para. 774. 102. District boards should not be allowed to increase the land cess beyond one anna in the rupee on the annual rental value, and sub-district boards should not raise any separate land cess. Otherwise rural boards should be able to levy rates and fees at their discretion within the limits laid down by law. Where no definite limits have been prescribed, the sanction of the Commissioner should be required to changes in the rates.
- Paras. 776-7. 103. Sub-district boards should receive a fixed proportion, generally one-half, of the land cess raised in their areas, and certain sources of miscellaneous revenue. Additional resources would come from grants distributed by the district board.
- Para. 777. 104. The district board's principal items of revenue would be the rest of the land cess, less the amount to be assigned to village panchayats; certain miscellaneous receipts; and grants from Government. Such monies as are not required for direct district board services should be distributed among the sub-district boards, with reference to their varying needs.
- Para. 778. 105. Rural boards should not be bound to spend specific proportions of their income on particular services.
- Para. 779. 106. Sub-district boards should not have borrowing powers. District boards may borrow under present conditions.
- Paras. 780-3. 107. Rural boards, whether district or sub-district, should have full power to pass their own budgets. They should, however, maintain prescribed minimum balances, which should not be drawn on without the sanction of the Commissioner in the case of district boards, and of the district board in the case of the sub-district boards.
- Para. 787. 108. The sanction of the Commissioner should be required in regard to the appointment, removal and salary of district board engineers, paid secretaries and health officers, where these are entertained. Otherwise, the only outside control required over rural boards in establishment matters is the promulgation by the Local Government of model bye-laws or schedules, laying down general rules in regard to such matters as leave, acting and travelling allowances, pension or provident funds, and the maximum salary to be given to officials of various classes. Departure from these schedules should require the sanction of the Local Government, or of the Commissioner in salary matters.
- Para. 789. 109. Sub-district boards should contain a substantial majority of elected members, with a nominated element sufficient to secure the due representation of minorities, and of official experience. The method of election should be suited to local circumstances and should be such as to provide for the due representation of different communities, creeds and interests. District boards should also contain an elective majority, to be chosen by the non-official members of the sub-district boards.
- Paras. 795-7. 110. The Collector should be president of the district board; and the sub-district board president should be nominated, and should usually be the Sub-divisional officer or the tahsildar. The vice-presidents should, however, be elected non-officials.

111. The appointment of nominated members of rural boards and of presidents of sub-district boards, and the gazetting of elected members and vice-presidents, should rest with the Commissioner. Para. 798.

112. Rural boards should have power to delegate any of their administrative functions to committees, and to include in them persons who are not members of the board. Para. 799.

113. The proceedings of sub-district boards should be conducted in the vernacular, and those of all rural boards should be published in the vernacular. Para. 800.

114. The creation, suspension or abolition of rural boards, and all alteration in their constitution, must remain in the hands of the Local Government, but there need not be previous reference to the Government of India as is now required in some Provinces. Para. 802.

115. The Commissioner should be able to direct a board to perform any specific act or duty imposed on it by law, and, if his warnings have been neglected, should be competent to take action at its expense. The present powers given to Commissioners and Collectors to intervene in urgent cases, where action of a board is in excess of its legal power or seems likely to lead to a breach of the peace, etc., must remain. Para. 803.

116. The right of inspection of rural board works and properties now given to Commissioners and Collectors should remain. Officers of special Government departments, such as those dealing with public works, education and sanitation, should also have the right to inspect rural boards' works and institutions. Ibid.

117. While we look forward eventually to a system of rural boards in Burma, the time and method of introducing these should be left entirely to the discretion of the Local Government. We would leave similar discretion to the Local Government as to the creation of district boards in Assam, where there are now only sub-divisional boards. Paras. 805-6.

Municipalities: Chapter XX.

118. A number of the petty municipalities now existing will not be fit to exercise the large powers which we propose for municipalities in general, and should, like the present "notified areas" and some of the existing local fund "unions," be administered, on more simple lines, by committees which may be styled "town panchayats." Paras. 814-15.

119. Municipalities should have the same full powers as we suggest for rural boards in respect to the services assigned to them. Paras. 819-829.

120. They should undertake primary education and may—if they are able and willing to do so—devote money to middle vernacular schools. Paras. 820, 823, & 831-4.

Otherwise, the Government should relieve them of any charges they now have to incur in regard to secondary education, hospitals at district headquarters, famine relief, police, veterinary work, etc. Nor should they contribute for services which are made Provincial, or be made to devote specific proportions of their income to particular objects.

We do not propose to relieve them from plague charges, but where these are heavy the Government should contribute substantially.

- Para. 837. 121. While we do not propose that municipalities should receive any regular subvention from Government, corresponding to the 25 per cent. on the land cess given to rural boards, they should receive assistance in respect to specially large projects, such as those concerned with drainage or water supply ; and in the case of the poorer municipalities some subvention for general purposes will probably be required. Grants of this latter description should, as in the case of rural boards, be of a practically permanent character.
- Para. 839. 122. Municipalities should have full powers in regard to taxation, within the limits of the laws under which they work.
- Para. 841. 123. Government control over municipal borrowing should continue, and any permanent alienation of municipal property, or lease of the same for periods of seven years and upwards, should require outside sanction.
- Paras. 843-4. 124. Subject to the maintenance of prescribed minimum balances, municipalities should have a free hand in respect to their budgets.
- Paras. 847-8. 125. The control of municipalities over their establishments should be of the same character as has been suggested for rural boards.
- Paras. 849-52. 126. Municipal councils should ordinarily contain a substantial elective majority, and should usually elect their own chairman. Government officers should not be allowed to stand for election ; but where a nominated chairman is necessary, he should be an official.
- Para. 853. 127. In some of the larger cities it might be desirable to vest the executive administration in the hands of a full-time nominated official, apart from the chairman of the municipal council. Such an officer would, however, be subject to the control of the council as a whole, and of a standing committee thereof.
- Para. 854. 128. Where a vice-chairman of a municipal council is required, he should be an elected non-official.
- Para. 855. 129. The appointment of nominated members and chairmen of municipal councils, and the gazetting of elected members and chairmen should be entrusted to the Collector ordinarily, and to the Commissioner in the case of cities. The removal of a member for special reasons should always rest with the Commissioner.
- Para. 856. 130. Municipal councils should be able to delegate any of their administrative functions to committees, which may include persons not on the council.
- Paras. 859-61. 131. The general outside control of the Local Government, and of the Commissioner and Collector, should be of the same character as in the case of rural boards ; and officers of special Government departments should enjoy similar right of inspection.
- Para. 867. 132. The corporations of the Presidency municipalities, in which category we would also include Rangoon, should all have powers as large as those which the Bombay municipality now possesses.
- Para. 869. 133. We consider that the Bombay system of vesting the executive municipal administration in the hands of a separate Commissioner, responsible to the corporation (which elects its own chairman), and to a standing committee thereof, is preferable to the Calcutta and Madras method of making the chairman an official nominated by Government.

134. Where it is considered expedient that hospitals and educational institutions in a Presidency town should be directly controlled by Government, the municipality should not be forced to contribute thereto. Para. 870.

SCHEDULE I.

CIVIL SERVICE REGULATIONS.

Schedule of certain Articles of the Civil Service Regulations in which alterations have been proposed, together with the recommendations of the Commission thereon—vide paragraph 158 of the Report.

No. of Article.	Nature of Article or Power.	Reference to Local Government or Witness proposing.	Recommendations of the Commission.
89.	Power to suspend the lien of an officer on his permanent appointment when he is likely to be seconded therefrom for a period exceeding three years.	—	The powers of the Local Government might be delegated to heads of departments* in respect of officers whom they can appoint.
94-95.	Power to give special charge allowances to an officer appointed to be in charge of the current duties of an office.	Madras, Vol. II., App., p. 335 ; United Provinces, Vol. VII., App. III., p. 183 ; Bengal, Vol. IV., App. II., p. 206.	The powers of a Local Government might be delegated to heads of departments.
188.	Power to grant allowances during transit to an officiating officer having no permanent appointment, when transferred from one station to another.	Madras, Vol. II., App., p. 335 ; Eastern Bengal and Assam, Vol. V., App. II., p. 228 ; United Provinces, Vol. VII., App. III., p. 183 ; Punjab, Vol. IX., App. VI., p. 188.	The powers of the Local Government might be delegated to heads of departments competent to order such transfer.
229 (Note 2).	Power to grant to officers, who, through no fault of their own, overstay furlough or sick leave, an extension of such leave up to a week, provided leave is to their credit.	Madras, Vol. II., App., p. 332 ; Burma, Vol. III., App. II., p. 179 ; United Provinces, Vol. VII., App. III., p. 172.	The power vested in the Government of India might be granted to Local Governments and other authorities competent to give the original leave. Similarly, subordinate authorities, such as heads of departments, might be authorized to exempt an officer who, through no fault of his own, overstays leave granted by them, from loss of appointment.
232.	Retrospective conversion of absence without leave into leave without allowances.	Madras, Vol. II., App., p. 335 ; United Provinces, Vol. VII., App. III., p. 183.	The powers of the Local Government might be delegated to the officer having power to make the appointment and grant pension.
253-254.	Power to grant exemption from the rule that overstay of privilege and examination leave, or joining time, ordinarily involves an interruption of duty.	Madras, Vol. II., App., p. 335.	The authority which can grant the leave might be allowed to grant the exemption.
353.	The Government of India have now power to grant a compassionate allowance to an officer dismissed for misconduct, insolvency or inefficiency, provided that he was not appointed in England, that his pay does not exceed Rs. 250 a month, and that the compassionate allowance does not exceed two-thirds of the pension which would have been admissible if he had retired on medical certificate.	Q. 44870.	The limit might be raised to Rs. 500 a month, and the power delegated to Local Governments in the case of officers serving under the latter.
357.	Power to allow (in special cases) service which is pensionable under military rules to count for civil pension on the inferior scale.	Madras, Vol. II., App., p. 330.	The powers of the Government of India might be delegated to the Provincial Governments in respect of a quasi -military service, such as the police.
368.	Power to allow temporary service to count for pension where the pension does not exceed Rs. 10 a month.	Madras, Vol. II., App., p. 330 ; Burma, Vol. III., App. II., p. 179 ; Bengal, Vol. IV., App. II., p. 206 ; United Provinces, Vol. VII., App. III., p. 171 ; Q. 44870.	The limit might be raised to Rs. 50 a month, and the power delegated from the Government of India to Local Governments in the case of officers serving under the latter.
399 and 402.	Power to make certain exceptions to the rule that inferior service does not ordinarily count for superior pension.	Eastern Bengal and Assam, Vol. V., App. II., p. 226 ; United Provinces, Vol. VII., App. III., p. 171.	The powers of the Government of India might be delegated to Local Governments.
422	Condonation of interruptions in pensionable service, by the Government of India and by Local Governments within the limits prescribed in the Article.	Madras, Vol. II., App., p. 330 ; Burma, Vol. III., App. II., p. 179 ; Bengal, Vol. IV., App. II., p. 206 ; Eastern Bengal and Assam, Vol. V., App. II., p. 226 ; United Provinces, Vol. VII., App. III., p. 182 ; North-West Frontier Province, Vol. IX., App. III., p. 233 ; Q. 44870.	The authority which has power to grant a pension might condone any interruption. It is not a case of adding to an officer's pensionable service, but of bringing together periods of service actually rendered.

* The term "heads of departments" as used in this column includes the Commissioners of divisions.

No. of Article.	Nature of Article or Power.	Reference to Local Government or Witness proposing.	Recommendations of the Commission.
423.	Condonation of deficiencies in pensionable service up to a period of three months, now exercisable by the Government of India in all cases, and by the Local Governments for the same period where the pension is a Provincial charge.	Burma, Vol. III., App. II., p. 179 ; Bengal, Vol. IV., App. II., p. 206 ; United Provinces, Vol. VII., App. III., p. 182.	These powers might be delegated to the authority which has power to grant a pension.
436.	Power to grant a gratuity, not exceeding three months' emoluments, where it has been impossible to comply with the general rule that three months' notice of discharge should be given to an officer.	Burma, Vol. III., App. III., p. 184.	The authority which has power to dispense with an officer's services might also have power to give him such a gratuity.
455.	Power to permit an officer who has submitted a medical certificate of incapacity for further service, to count for pension service rendered after the date of such certificate.	Burma, Vol. III., App. III., p. 184.	The officer who can fill up the appointment might exercise this power, which is now vested in the Local Government.
474 (a).	Grant of gratuities for service of less than ten years.	Burma, Vol. III., App. III., p. 184 ; Eastern Bengal and Assam, Vol. V., App. III., p. 228.	The authority competent to grant such gratuity might exercise the power, allowed to a Local Government, to calculate it on average instead of on actual emoluments when that course would be beneficial to the man retired.
524.	Power to re-employ a pensioner, without loss of pension, for bonâ fide temporary Government work lasting for not more than a year.	Madras, Vol. II., App., p. 330 ; Bengal, Vol. IV., App. II., p. 206 ; Eastern Bengal and Assam, Vol. V., App. III., p. 228 ; United Provinces, Vol. VII., App. III., p. 183.	This power, now vested in Local Governments, might be delegated to any head of a department competent to order such re-employment.
739.	The Local Government may grant a gratuity not exceeding six months' pay or Rs. 600, whichever is less, and the Government of India may grant a gratuity not exceeding six months' pay or Rs. 1,000, whichever is greater, to an officer sustaining serious injury while on duty.	Burma, Vol. III., App. II., p. 179 ; Eastern Bengal and Assam, Vol. V., App. III., p. 226 ; United Provinces, Vol. VII., App. III., p. 172.	The power of the Local Government might be the same as that of the Government of India in respect of officers serving under it.
740.	The Government of India may grant a pension, not exceeding Rs. 25 a month, to an officer injured, or to the family of an officer killed, in the execution of his duty, while a Local Government, in like circumstances, can give pension up to Rs. 10 a month.	Burma, Vol. III., App. II., p. 179 ; Eastern Bengal and Assam, Vol. V., App. II., p. 226 ; United Provinces, Vol. VII., App. III., p. 172 ; Punjab, Vol. IX., App. VI., p. 241 ; Q. 44870.	The power of the Local Government might be the same as that of the Government of India, and some increase in the existing powers of the latter Government seems desirable.
743.	In cases which do not fall strictly within the ordinary rules for gratuities or pensions for injury, etc., the Government of India have power to sanction a pension of Rs. 25 a month (or a gratuity not exceeding Rs. 1,000) to the officer himself or to his family, when injury or death is caused by devotion to duty.	Burma, Vol. III., App. II., p. 179 ; Eastern Bengal and Assam, Vol. V., App. II., p. 226 ; United Provinces, Vol. VII., App. III., p. 172 ; Q. 44870.	The same powers might be conferred on Local Governments.
744.	A Local Government may, as a special case, grant a gratuity not exceeding Rs. 20, or two months' pay, whichever is less, to a day labourer or mechanic injured in the execution of duty (or to his heir if he is killed) if the injury, etc., is not such as to allow the grant of a wound, or extraordinary, pension being granted.	Burma, Vol. III., App. II., p. 179.	These special powers might be increased to Rs. 60 or six months' pay, whichever is less.
825.	Provides that applications for leaves should be submitted to the Local Government, or other authority whose duty it would be to fill up the applicant's appointment if it were vacant.	Bengal, Vol. IV., App. II., p. 207 ; United Provinces, Vol. VII., App. III., pp. 177 & 185.	Heads of departments might grant short leave, and deal with subsidiary matters connected therewith, in the case of officers serving under them but appointed by a Local Government, where the appointment of a substitute is not required.
924 (b).	The Government of India have power to grant pensions up to a limit of Rs. 10 a month, or gratuities not exceeding the equivalent of that amount, without reference to the Secretary of State, where no pension or gratuity is admissible under rule, provided that the general spirit of the Regulations is observed.	Eastern Bengal and Assam, Vol. V., App. II., p. 227 ; United Provinces, Vol. VII., App. III., p. 172 ; Q. 44870.	The powers of the Government of India might be raised from Rs. 10 to Rs. 25 a month, and Local Governments might have the same powers in the case of officers serving under them.

No. of Article.	Nature of Article or Power.	Reference to Local Government or Witness proposing.	Recommendations of the Commission.
941.	By permission of the Government of India, a gratuity may be converted into an annuity for life, or for a fixed number of years, subject to adherence to certain prescribed tables of commutation.	United Provinces, Vol. VII., App. III., p. 172.	This power might be given to Local Governments, in respect of gratuities granted by them.
997.	Travelling allowance may be calculated, for special reasons, by a route other than the shortest and cheapest.	—	This power, now vested in the Local Government, might be delegated to heads of departments.
1,010.	Grant of travelling allowance attached to an office to an officer merely placed in current charge thereof.	—	This power, now vested in the Local Government, might be delegated to the authority empowered to give such charge.
1,056	Exemption from the ordinary rule that daily allowances cannot be given for a halt of more than 10 days at one place.	—	This power is now vested in the Local Government. Heads of departments might be empowered up to 30 days.
1,059	Permission to draw expenses for maintaining camp equipage during a halt, not exceeding 10 days (as a rule), at the officer's headquarters.	—	The power, now vested in the Local Government, might be delegated to heads of departments.
1,085	Exception, as regards journeys by sea, to the rule that an officer is not entitled to travelling allowance on joining a first appointment.	—	This power, now vested in the Local Government, might be delegated to the officer making the appointment.
1,159 and 1,162.	Bills for travelling allowances, other than those of the head of a department, require counter-signature by a controlling officer, and such officer may not delegate the duty of counter-signature to subordinates.	Q.'s 30825-33, 37997 and 42378-82; Punjab, Vol. IX., App. VI., p. 244.	The nomination of the controlling officer rests with the Local Government. The chief officer of any department within a district or corresponding area might act as a controlling officer for the purpose of his own bills and those of his subordinates. Further, where a higher official is designated as controlling officer, he might be empowered to allow counter-signature to be made for him, on his responsibility, by a subordinate.
1163.	An Audit officer may accept counter-signature by proper authority as final evidence that the facts of a journey on which a claim for travelling allowance is founded are correct, and that the claim is admissible under rule. It is the duty of the controlling officer, and not of the Audit officer, to enforce departmental rules, but the Audit officer is expected to check distances as entered in travelling allowance bills.	Q. 41141.	It is for consideration whether the detailed audit of travelling allowance bills might not be localized in the offices of Collectors or other local controlling officers.

SCHEDULE II.

CIVIL ACCOUNT CODE.

Schedule of certain Articles of the Civil Account Code in which alterations have been proposed, together with the recommendations of the Commission thereon—vide paragraph 170 of the Report.

No. of Article.	Nature of Article or Power.	Reference to Local Government or Witness proposing.	Recommendations of the Commission.
2 (Note 1).	The lodging of cash chests of another department for safe custody in a district treasury requires the orders of Government, and the fact has to be reported to the Accountant-General.	Madras, Vol. II., App., p. 334.	This might be a matter for the Collector's discretion.
5 (b).	No claim against Government, not preferred within six months of its becoming due, can ordinarily be paid without the sanction of the Accountant-General.	United Provinces, Vol. VII., App. III., p. 188.	The present limit might be extended to a year.
5 (c).	Claims for arrears of pay and allowances, or to increments of salary, which have been allowed to remain in abeyance for more than two years can only be investigated by the Accountant-General under the orders of the Local Government.	Bengal, Vol. IV., App. II., p. 207 ; Eastern Bengal and Assam, Vol. V., App. II., p. 227 ; United Provinces, Vol. VII., App. III., p. 184.	The power to give such order might be delegated to the authority which appoints the officer by whom the claim is made.
73-75 and 80.	Local officers receive lump sums for certain "contract contingency" charges in regard to which their power of sanction is more complete, and the audit is much more summary and general, than in respect to other items of expenditure.	United Provinces, Vol. VII., App. III., p. 188 ; Bombay, Vol. VIII., App. II., p. 344 ; North-West Frontier Province, Vol. IX., App. III., p. 233 ; Q's 26778, 26889-90, 28097-8, 31396-9, 33120-2, 33166-8, 36087-8, 36807-8, 41141 and 41213-5.	The system of contract contingencies might be considerably expanded. Officers might be permitted, further, to incur non-recurring expenditure on special outside assistance in office matters, such as copying, and in regard to office furniture and equipment. There seemed to be an impression among some witnesses that in matters relating to contingent charges the real power was exercised by the Accountant-General, and not by the Local Government; and the Committee, which we have suggested for the revision of the Code, might examine this point with a view to making the discretion of the Local Government really effective.
77. (Note 1).	Determination of the amount of "permanent advance" for petty expenses in each office.	Madras, Vol. II., App., p. 334.	This power, now exercised by the Local Government, on application made through the Accountant-General, might be delegated to heads of departments, subject to the concurrence of the Accountant-General.
98 (n).	No charge which binds Governments beyond a single payment, such, for instance, as rent, may be incurred without the sanction of Government.	Madras, Vol. II., App., p. 334 ; Burma, Vol. III., App. III., pp. 183-4 ; Bengal, Vol. IV., App. II., p. 208 ; Eastern Bengal and Assam, Vol. V., App. III., p. 227 ; United Provinces, Vol. VII., App. III., p. 184 ; Punjab, Vol. IX., App. VI., p. 242.	Power might be given to heads of departments or other controlling officers, to sanction up to a period of 6 months, expenditure which does not exceed Rs. 10 per mensem in any one case. They might also be allowed to sanction payments of rent for buildings leased by Government, in consultation with the officers of the Public Works Department.
130A (1).	A Local Government may not, without the sanction of the Government of India, remit the payment of interest falling due in ordinary course, on Government loans to local bodies.	Eastern Bengal and Assam, Vol. V., App. IV., p. 225.	This power might be given to the Local Government where it would bear the loss.
136 (a) I.	Advances to public officers for house building require the sanction of the Local Government.	Burma, Vol. III., App. III., p. 184 ; Bengal, Vol. IV., App. II., p. 208 ; United Provinces, Vol. VII., App. III., p. 184.	Within the existing general rules, these advances might be sanctioned by heads of departments.

278A.	Local Governments may, subject to certain provisos, sanction non-recurring charges in cases customarily recognized as fit objects of public expenditure, but in which they have not powers under ordinary rules. Such sanction must not involve the setting aside of any existing rule of the Government of India as distinguished from the grant of an exemption from its operation, justified by special circumstances, and it must not establish a new rule or practice involving expenditure.	Q.'s 10626-8, 43671-6, 44911- Burma, Vol. III., App. II., p. 180 ; Bengal, Vol. IV, App. II., p. 208 ; Bombay, Vol. VIII., App. II., pp. 256 and 383 ; Punjab, Vol. IX., App. VI., pp. 240 & 244. Bombay, Vol. VIII., App. II., p. 236.	Under our proposals many of the matters in which this Article has hitherto been applied will hereafter be within the discretion of the Local Government. In regard to the rest, it is suggested that Clause (2) of the Article should simply require that the powers given shall not be used to cover an express contravention of an existing rule, or to meet future charges which are really recurring. Further, the Local Government, and not the Audit officer, should interpret the phrase "customarily recognized as fit objects for the expenditure of public money" in the main body of the Article. The limit of a Local Government's power of sanction might be extended to Rs. 5,000 in the case of provincial expenditure. The present limit is Rs. 1,000. We do not agree with a suggestion made by the Government of Bombay that the powers vested in the Local Governments by this Article should be capable of delegation, within certain limits, to heads of departments and other authorities. The present Article is of such a very special character that its application should be reserved to the Provincial Governments.
279.	Local Governments have power to write off the value of stores or public money lost by fraud, negligence or other causes, subject to report to the Government of India when (1) the loss exceeds Rs. 1,000, and falls upon Imperial revenues, or (2) some defect of system is apparent the amendment of which requires the orders of the Supreme Government.	Madras, Vol. II., App., p. 334 ; Bengal, Vol. IV., App. II., p. 208 ; Eastern Bengal and Assam, Vol. V., App. IV., pp. 224 & 227 ; United Provinces, Vol. VII., App. III., p. 184.	Power might be delegated to heads of departments within certain limits, provided such loss has not been caused by defect of system or negligence, which ought to be reported to the Local Government.
279A.	Local Governments have power to remit, in the case of officials serving under them, disallowances by Audit officials which affect payments made more than six months before the date when they were challenged ; provided they consider the amount to have been drawn by the official under a reasonable belief on his part that he was entitled to it. The sanction of the Government of India, and, where necessary, of the Secretary of State, must, however, be obtained to remission of any disallowances made within six months from the date of payment.	Madras, Vol. II., App., p. 334 ; Bengal, Vol. IV., App. II., p. 208 ; United Provinces, Vol. VII., App. III., p. 173 ; Punjab, Vol. IX., App. VI., pp. 240 & 244 ; Q. 44869.	Local Governments might have full powers of remission in such cases, provided the expenditure would not require the sanction of the Secretary of State, and that the overdrawal does not evidence some defect in system which should receive the notice of the Government of India. The Accountant-General should have the usual power of bringing to notice cases in which he thinks the intention of the rule is being misapplied.

MINUTES OF EVIDENCE

TAKEN BEFORE THE ROYAL COMMISSION UPON DECENTRALIZATION.

FIRST DAY.

MADRAS, Friday, 22nd November, 1907.

PRESENT :

C. E. H. HOBHOUSE, Esq., M.P., Under Secretary of State for India, Chairman.

Sir FREDERIC LELY, K.C.I.E., C.S.I.

Sir STEYNING EDGERLEY, K.C.V.O., C.I.E., I.C.S.

R. C. DUTT, Esq., C.I.E.

W. S. MEYER, Esq., C.I.E., I.C.S.

W. L. HICHENS, Esq.

The Hon. Mr. H. BRADLEY was called and examined.

1. (Chairman.) You are the acting Chief Secretary to the Government of Madras?—I am.

2. How long have you been in the Indian Civil Service?—This is the end of my 29th year.

3. Would you tell us briefly what your appointments have been?—Assistant Collector, Head Assistant Collector, District Forest Officer, on special duty under the Commissioner of Salt—I was that for nearly two years—Deputy Commissioner of Salt, Secretary to the Commissioner of Salt and Excise, Judge for six weeks, Collector of Kurnool, Malabar, Coimbatore and Madras, and Member of the Board of Revenue.

4. Therefore, you are fully acquainted with the workings of Government both in the districts and at the headquarters of the provincial Government?—I have considerable personal knowledge of it.

5. Have you any knowledge at all of the Central Government in India?—I have none whatever; I served under it on a Special Committee, but I know none of the details.

6. You have never been employed in the Secretariat of the Government of India?—No.

7. Having therefore all this experience which you have set out to us, I suppose you have some ideas as to the relations which ought to obtain between the Central and the provincial Governments, especially in regard to your own province?—I had nothing to do with the relations between the Central and the provincial Governments, until I became Acting Chief Secretary.

8. Perhaps it would assist us in our enquiry if you would kindly give us, as briefly as you can, the constitution of the Government of Madras?—The Government consists of three Members: the Governor and two Members of Council. They each hold portfolios, and pass orders individually upon matters connected with their own portfolio. The Governor holds several portfolios; the principal ones he holds are the Political, Public Works, Ecclesiastical, Marine and Military. He has also one or two smaller portfolios. Members pass orders upon matters connected with their own portfolios, and others are brought before Council, either by the Chief Secretary or by the Members of Government.

9. Does each Member of the Council have power to pass, without reference to his colleagues, orders within his own department?—Yes.

10. Unless they affect the general Government of the Presidency?—Quite so. Important questions are discussed in Council, and, out of Council, by notes.

11. Apart from the Governor, where do the Members of the Council do their work?—In their own houses. They come to the Secretariat for Council meetings. The Governor also frequently calls meetings of the Members, which are held at Government House separately; not formal Council meetings. Sometimes he confers with one Member.

12. Then what is below the Council?—Below the Council come the members of the Board of Revenue, four in number, who are really Heads of Departments. They meet as a consultative body occasionally, and they consult one another upon matters connected with their own departments. There are certain matters referred to the Board of Revenue as a whole by Government, and any member can consult any other member, independently, with regard to the affairs of his own portfolio. The members of the Board tour in the different districts. One of the four members is head of the Settlement Department—all matters connected with agriculture go to him; survey and famine are also under him. Then one member is in charge of forests; one is in charge of separate revenue, that is to say, excise and customs, stamps and salt; and one is in charge of inams and the Court of Wards. The two members who are in charge of forests, and inams and the Court of Wards, respectively, are called the Land Revenue Members, and they do all work connected with ordinary land revenue questions.

13. That practically concludes the description of the work of the members of the Board of Revenue?—Yes.

14. Now, in the hierarchy of Government, below the Board of Revenue, who comes?—The Collector.

15. What are the Collector's duties?—He is the head of his district. Everything practically in the district is more or less under him.

16. All executive power in the district rests with the Collector?—Practically.

17. Into how many collectorates is the Presidency divided?—At the present moment I cannot say for certain; the number has altered; there are between 23 and 25; the number varies from time to time. There is one appointment in fact which counts as a collectorate which is not a collectorate at all.

18. Then below the Collectors who come?—The next link is the Sub-Collector or Divisional Officer. They are divided into Sub-Collectors and Head Assistant Collectors. There is no difference between a Sub-Collector and a Head Assistant, except that one is the senior officer?—They are really grades.

19. There is no difference in authority?—None practically.

*The Hon.
Mr. H
Bradley.*

22 Nov., 1907.

The Hon
Mr. H.
Bradley.

22 Nov., 1907.

20. Then below the Sub-Collector?—Below the Sub-Collector there comes the Deputy Collector. He is co-ordinate really with the Sub-Collector and the Magistrate in certain of his powers; he holds charges generally of divisions which are less important than those of the other officers.

21. Then beneath them who comes?—The Assistant Collector, but the Assistant Collector as a rule, as soon as he is fit to be in charge of a division, is acting as a Head Assistant and is in charge of a division.

22. Are all these gentlemen Europeans?—The Deputy Collectors are mainly Indians.

23. And the Assistant Collectors?—They are young members of the Indian Civil Service who are under training.

24. Beneath an Assistant Collector who comes?—The next officers below the Divisional Officer are the tahsildar and the deputy tahsildar.

25. Of what are they in charge?—The tahsildar is in charge of a taluk of his district. The deputy tahsildar is subordinate; he is in charge of a portion of a taluk.

26. Is the tahsildar the lowest executive officer in charge of a geographical area?—Of a taluk.

27. Then the next?—The deputy tahsildar's charge is smaller, and he is sometimes in independent charge of a portion of a taluk.

28. Is there anything below the taluk?—There are revenue charges below running down to villages; but, practically, there is nothing of importance below the taluk.

29. In explanation of this system of Government, do you wish to add anything that would enlighten the Commission?—The unit, of course, is the village; that is at the very bottom. The head of the village has small magisterial and executive powers. A taluk is really a number of villages.

30. Then, taking these in rotation, you have explained to us the duties of the Board of Revenue; will you explain in brief the duties of a Collector?—The Collector is the Head of the administration generally in his district; he is the Head Magistrate and he is responsible for the peace. He is supposed to be the Head of the police, and he directs the Superintendent of Police in his duties. The Superintendent of Police reports to him weekly as to the state of crime and so on in his district. The Collector is also responsible for the collection of the revenue in the district.

31. Then with regard to the Sub-Collector?—The Sub-Collector, the Head Assistant Collector and the Deputy Collector, who hold executive power, are all Divisional Officers in charge, as magistrates, of divisions of the district under the Collector; they have first-class magisterial powers, and all the tahsildars and deputy tahsildars within their own divisions are under their orders. They report to the Collector.

32. You say that these gentlemen have first-class magisterial powers; I do not think you have said anything about the judicial powers of the Collector?—He is the Head Magistrate in the district.

33. He has appellate powers only?—No, he has original powers, too, if he chooses to exercise them. He does not as a rule take up original cases, but he does at times take up important cases.

34. Criminal cases only?—Criminal cases only; the Judge has to attend to civil matters.

35. Has the Sub-Collector, the Head Assistant, or the Assistant Collector any civil jurisdiction?—Very rarely. In out-of-the-way places, here and there, the officers have civil jurisdiction.

36. Has the Assistant Collector any civil jurisdiction?—No.

37. Or criminal?—The Assistant Collector as a rule has no territorial charge; he only takes up the magisterial cases that are referred to him.

38. Has he any executive powers as an Assistant Collector?—The Assistant Collector as a rule does the work that is given to him; he is merely a youngster who is under training.

39. And therefore he is put to do either executive or judicial work?—Either revenue or magisterial work. We distinguish between the Magistrate's duties and civil duties.

40. Now with regard to the tahsildar?—The tahsildar is a Second-Class Magistrate as a rule, but he has no original work in these days. He is chiefly a Revenue Officer, but he tries such magisterial cases as are referred to him by the Divisional Officer; he has no appellate powers.

41. He is principally a Revenue Officer?—Principally.

42. Now with regard to the deputy tahsildars?—Some of the deputy tahsildars are magistrates mainly; others have revenue powers also.

43. When you say revenue powers, perhaps you will explain to us exactly what you mean by that?—They actually assist in the collection of revenue.

44. The deputy tahsildar takes the cash from the person who owes the revenue to Government?—No; the head of the village receives the cash and pays it in either to the deputy tahsildar's treasury or to the tahsildar's treasury, and thence it goes to the district treasury.

45. How often is the cash sent into the district treasury?—It is laid down how many rupees a subordinate treasury may hold at a time, and the cash remains there until that amount is exceeded.

46. Then the Deputy Collector actually comes to these tahsildars and collects the money?—The Deputy Collector stands in the same position as the Sub-Collector and the Head Assistant Collector. The Deputy Collector is a First-Class Magistrate, and is in revenue charge of a portion of a district—what is called a sub-division.

47. Who actually collects the money?—The money is actually collected by the head of the village from the raiyats.

48. But who collects it from the local treasury?—It is sent by the head of the treasury; the tahsildar or deputy tahsildar sends it under the charge of the police to the district treasury.

49. And gets a receipt for it from whom?—From the Deputy Collector in charge of the treasury.

50. When you say that a Collector or a Sub-Collector is a Revenue Officer, what is it that you mean? He does not, so far as I understand it, actually collect the revenue?—The Collector does not actually collect from the raiyat.

51. What is it that he does as a Revenue Officer?—He supervises the revenue accounts, the village accounts and taluk accounts. He has under him several other links; there is the revenue inspector who has certain villages under his charge; he has to inspect the lands and so on in the villages.

52. Does the Divisional Officer supervise the accounts?—He supervises the collection of the revenue and the accounts.

53. And besides that what else?—As a Revenue Officer he inspects fields—sees to the granting of land and the transfer of lands from one raiyat to another. All that is done under his supervision.

54. It is only some part—although, no doubt, a considerable portion—of his time which is taken up in the matter of collecting and auditing revenue?—A considerable amount of his time is taken up in that way.

55. And what else does he do?—Magisterial work. He is the First-Class Magistrate of the division to which he is assigned, and he takes first-class cases.

56. Revenue cases?—Magisterial cases. He is the police Magistrate who tries original cases which are triable by a First-Class Magistrate. (Under the Criminal Procedure Code there are three classes of Magistrates.) He has to take original cases, and, as a rule, he also hears appeals from the Second and Third-Class Magistrates in his division.

57. Therefore, briefly, one may describe both the Collector and Sub-Collector as Revenue Officers for the purpose of collecting revenue and seeing that the accounts and revenue are complete?—Yes.

58. The Sub-Collector is a Magisterial Officer for hearing criminal cases both on appeal and in important matters of original jurisdiction?—He has very considerable original jurisdiction; it amounts to 250 cases and sometimes more in a year—important, heavy cases, too. A first-class case is very often a heavy one. He has also to hear land suits.

59. Then he has various miscellaneous duties besides?—He also hears all suits between raiyats relating to the rent of land under the Rent Recovery Act; they are rather important. Then, he has to deal with excise and matters of that sort in his sub-division.

60. You differ from other provinces, in the fact that you have no Commissioners here?—We have no Commissioners here.

61. In your judgment, the system of a Board of Revenue, which goes on tour, works satisfactorily in the place of a Commissioner?—I know nothing about Commissioners, but I consider that the Board of Revenue does very good work here.

62. Is there any gap in the machinery of Government which could be more satisfactorily filled by Commissioners?—No, I do not think there is a gap here.

63. Therefore, so far as you are concerned, you think that the Board of Revenue and Collectors, between them, satisfactorily do the work which is done in other provinces by Commissioners?—Yes, I think they do their work here satisfactorily.

64. How often do they tour?—They tour at all times of the year. When I was a member of the Board I suppose I spent three, sometimes four, months of the year away from Madras.

65. Have you under you as a member of the Board of Revenue a specified number of Collector's districts, or have you general duties?—You have general duties, within your own branches, in every district.

66. But no settled number of Collector's districts are assigned to you to manage in toto?—No.

67. You are well acquainted with the financial working of your own province, having been a member of the Board of Revenue and now Financial Secretary?—The Board of Revenue has practically no original financial powers.

68. You have been member in every branch of the Board of Revenue?—Yes.

69. Therefore you are well acquainted with the financial system of the Government of Madras?—Yes, I can say that I am acquainted with it, but the Board of Revenue has very little to do with finance from the point of view of doing anything but receiving grants and using them. They have no powers practically in the way of transfers, and they are tied hand and foot by the Codes.

70. When you talk of their being tied hand and foot by the Codes, is that a consequence of the wishes of the provincial Government or the Central Government?—I think the Central Government; the Codes are framed by them.

71. And therefore in respect of these financial powers you think there might be a considerable delegation?—I think there might be a very considerable delegation.

72. Without any harm either to the provincial or to the imperial revenues?—I think without any harm.

73. Do you think there might be a more complete separation between imperial and provincial revenues?—I think so distinctly. I think that the Government of India might settle the amount of revenue that was to be at the disposal of the Government of Madras, and leave it a free hand in the disposal of that revenue.

74. Is that not largely the case now with regard to the financial settlement?—No; we are controlled in every possible way after the settlement.

75. You are not free within the limits of the financial settlement?—We have to send up a budget, which is cut about by the Government of India; that budget comes back to us once with alterations and suggestions and corrections, and it goes back again, and then it is returned to us with final alterations, about which we have nothing whatever to say; we have to deal with sums of money which are placed at our disposal for particular purposes, and we have very limited powers of transfer from one head to another.

76. With regard to budgets, which are founded upon this system of what I may call a grant-in-aid under an admixture of imperial and local finance, do you think that that system of grants-in-aid unduly fetters the provincial Government?—I do not think the grant-in-aid fetters us at all, but I think that, if the Government is fit to govern, and when it has a certain sum of money placed at its disposal to run its concerns for the year, it ought to have an entirely free hand as to the disposal of the money within those limits.

77. You get now from the Imperial Government certain revenues assigned to you in toto?—I do not think there is anything assigned to us in toto; we have certain shares. We receive what is called an assignment.

78. There are certain revenues which are assigned to you absolutely and which you do not share?—Certainly, there are certain sources of revenue; there is Registration for instance—we get the whole of that. Still, it all goes into the budget.

79. You get the whole of the police receipts?—Yes.

80. Jail receipts?—I think so.

81. Education?—Yes.

82. Law and Justice?—Yes.

83. Medical?—Yes, there is nothing in that.

84. Minor irrigation works?—Yes, they cost us more than we receive.

85. But you get the whole of them?—Yes.

86. The provincial rates?—Yes, those we pass on to the local officers.

87. Stationery and Printing?—Yes.

88. Then there are certain services which you share with the Government of India?—Yes.

89. Stamps, excise, income-tax, forests, large irrigation works?—Yes.

90. Land revenue you share?—Yes.

91. You share the revenue, but you bear the whole of the expenditure?—Yes, but we are not given a free hand in spending that money even in provincial matters.

92. You are not given a free hand in spending even the money that you receive the whole of?—That is so.

93. Do you think it would improve your administration if, in addition to these registration receipts, stamps, and so on which I have read out, you were given, say, the whole of the land revenue, provided that, on the other hand, you gave up your share of the excise and of the forests; also if the grants-in-aid were stopped, and you were required to make good out of the excess land revenue the sums now paid to you by way of grants-in-aid?—I think we should get a lot of money; without looking into it in detail I cannot say. I should think our finances would be better off, but that is not the point. The point is that we have not got control of the moneys that are given to us; we have not got a free hand in spending the money.

94. If you are given a grant-in-aid by the Government of India, do they hand it over to you en bloc, or is it earmarked for certain purposes?—The grant is handed over to us en bloc practically, but for special purposes special grants are given. Still, we have to follow the budget which is drawn up by us, and which is altered by the Government of India, and we have not got a free hand in re-appropriating from one source to another. If we find that we cannot spend the money we have in one branch, we cannot without orders use it for another, although it might be a much better purpose.

The Hon.
Mr. H.
Bradley.

22 Nov., 1907.

The Hon.
Mr. H.
Bradley.

22 Nov., 1907.

95. Do you know of any system of Government which permits of that?—No, I do not; I am not acquainted with the details of the work of other Governments.

96. Either in Great Britain or elsewhere?—No.

97. You do not know whether the Treasury in England, for instance, permits the free reappropriation of major heads of expenditure?—I do not know.

98. You are not prepared to say, supposing the system of grants-in-aid were abolished and certain heads of revenue were transferred to you en bloc, whether you would prefer that to the existing system or not?—It all depends upon the extent to which our budget is supervised by the Government of India in regard to the details of expenditure.

99. But at the present moment if the Government of India make you grants-in-aid, are they not entitled to examine your books to see whether you are spending those grants properly or not?—The Government of India receive a great deal more from us than they give us.

100. Do not the Government of India make you grants-in-aid?—Yes.

101. And are they not therefore entitled, while they make these grants-in-aid, to supervise your expenditure in order to see that you have spent the sums allotted to you properly?—Yes; if those grants-in-aid are provided for any particular purposes.

102. Then if you removed the whole system of grants-in-aid and you were given free sources of revenue, would that not be more satisfactory and not necessarily be more expensive to them?—If we had the power of using the money without control.

103. May you not use your own present sources of income without control?—No; it is all put into one budget.

104. Where certain revenues are assigned to you, the sums arising from these sources of income go into the general budget?—That is so.

105. You have no borrowing powers as a provincial Government?—No, not without the sanction of the Government of India.

106. Have any of the local authorities subordinate to you got borrowing powers?—Not without sanction from the Government of India.

107. What about municipalities?—They have to obtain sanction.

108. In all cases?—In all cases that I am aware of. Municipalities are not allowed to raise money in the local market without sanction under any circumstances.

109. Or District Boards?—Not without sanction.

110. Do you think that if you were given a free hand within limits to borrow from local markets, you could borrow without destroying the borrowing powers of the Government of India?—I do not think it would do us any good, because I think the Government of India can borrow more satisfactorily than we can.

111. With regard to the restrictions exercised upon your borrowing powers, you as a Government have no complaint to make?—I cannot speak for the Government, but as an individual, I think it is much better that the Government of India should borrow for the provincial Government.

112. And you think it is an advantage to you?—Yes; or else to be permitted to borrow under theiregis.

113. You have no complaint at all as an administrator to make under that head?—I do not think we find any difficulty here; of course, I am only speaking as an individual.

114. Now could you tell me with regard to the possible further delegation of financial powers?—I think you have handed in, on behalf of the Government of Madras, some papers about appointments, pensions, and so forth?—Yes, we have sent in a lot of detailed suggestions.

115. You point to the relaxation of control as regards pensions. The Government of Madras ask that power to grant pensions to subordinates drawing Rs.100 and less, where there is no question of deviation from rule, should be delegated to Heads of Departments?—Yes.

116. In how many cases would this have avoided references to Government?—The cases which would have been disposed of by Heads of Departments without coming up to Government were, during 1904, 93; during 1905, 92; during 1906, 97. The total number of cases disposed of were, during 1904, 986; during 1905, 1,045; during 1906, 996.

117. Do you think the Heads of Departments are entitled to this freedom of relaxation?—The only proposal is that this power shall be granted in cases which are entirely free from doubt—where the officer is of good character, and where the Accountant-General certifies that the pension is due. It is a mere formal order now.

118. A formal reference?—It is a formal reference which is disposed of by an Under Secretary.

119. Who is junior as a rule to the Head of the Department who applies to him?—Far junior.

120. Then with regard to the creation of new appointments, you ask for the provincial Government greater freedom than they possess at the present moment?—Yes.

121. You ask that the limit should be raised to Rs. 6,000 per annum?—Yes; that is, Rs. 500 per month.

122. Is that not a very great extension of the present powers?—It is double; Rs. 250 is the limit now.

123. Do you know the number of cases which would arise to which this extension of power would apply?—It varies from year to year; it is quite impossible to say.

124. You think that such freedom as the Government of India receives, you ought to receive in turn?—Yes.

125. In all respects so far as regards the creation of new appointments?—In provincial matters, yes.

126. And also so far as regards the revision of establishments?—Yes.

127. It is proposed to abolish the half-yearly return of petty and unusual expenditure prescribed by article 1343-A, Civil Account Code. Do you know how much such expenditure amounted to in the case of the Government of Madras in recent years?—The figures are these—

Period.	Amount.
Half-year ending—	Rs.
31st March 1905	465
30th September 1905	385
31st March 1906	707
30th September 1906	287
31st March 1907	794
30th September 1907	196
Total for three years	2,834
Average for a year	945

128. It is quite clear that although these items may be petty in themselves and even unusual, they might amount in the aggregate to a very large sum?—I do not think they do.

129. With reference to the writing-off of irrecoverable items, why do you claim for the provincial Government the power to wipe off losses, without reporting them, which fall upon the imperial revenues?—We are already allowed to do it.

130. But you asked to be allowed to do it without reporting them?—We are already allowed to do it when the loss does not exceed Rs. 1,000 even if it falls on imperial revenues, but we do not ask not to make a report when a defect of system appears. The rule is this: the provincial Government has power to wipe off irrecoverable losses, but it must report such losses to the Government of India when the loss exceeds Rs. 1,000 and falls on imperial revenues or when some defect of system appears. We think that, when there has been no defect of system but through a crime or something of that kind loss has fallen upon the imperial revenues, it is unnecessary to make a special report to the Government of India, no matter how large the sum may be. If there is a defect of system which requires the orders of the Government of India, we should then report, whether it was below or above Rs. 1,000.

131. But take the case of crime, which you yourself have instanced. Suppose a crime has robbed the Government of Rs. 999, you need not report it. Suppose a crime, or an aggregate of crimes, robs the Government of Rs. 10,000, do you think that that ought not to be reported?—I do not think that that is likely to occur, but if it did occur, and if there is a defect of system, it ought to be reported.

132. You think then that no limit should be observed above which a report should be made in all cases?—I do not think it is necessary.

133. You desire to dispense with the rule requiring the sanction of the Government of India, and, where necessary, of the Secretary of State, to any remission of disallowances from an officer's pay made within six months from the date of payment?—I consider that the sanction of the Government of India or of the Secretary of State is a needless formality.

134. As regards the power of reappropriation I understand you desire to have power to practically reappropriate from one head to another any local revenue, no matter how widely divergent the heads of revenue may be?—Yes.

135. You claim complete freedom?—In local revenues, yes.

136. Would that not practically mean the abolition of the necessity of submitting your budgets to the imperial Government?—The budget for local revenues, yes.

137. As regards the recommendation that the Local Government should have power to grant an additional pension of Rs. 1,000 to the officers specified in articles 475 and 642 of the Civil Service Regulations, without reference, as at present, to the Government of India: Would it be as satisfactory to you if you were only to be bound by the veto of the Government of India?—The necessity of addressing the Government of India in a matter of this sort when it is perfectly certain that the Government of India will not object, is the only thing that we want to get rid of. In the case of an officer who has held a high appointment for three years, we make a formal report, and the Government of India says yes. There has never been any question raised about it; it has always been done.

138. From a financial point of view you have no objection to delegate these powers to your subordinate officers?—No.

139. And you speak as financial adviser to the provincial Government?—These are the recommendations made by the provincial Government.

140. But, as their financial adviser, you agree that they would not endanger the finances of the provincial Government?—Every one of these has been discussed with the Member in charge of Finance, and he has agreed to them. I cannot say that in all of them my personal opinion has been followed, but all these recommendations have received the approval of the Financial Member.

141. Do you yourself see in any of these proposals any serious danger to the finances of the provincial Government?—I do not see how it could possibly do any harm to provincial finances.

142. Do the Government of Madras still have to make quarterly returns through the administrative department concerned to the Government of India in the Financial Department showing every change made in the pay of every officer, every new office created and every existing office abolished?—I cannot say.

143. Somebody in your department makes it?—If it is made, it is sent from the office as a purely routine return.

144. Do you see any necessity for it?—I imagine it is necessary for the Government of India if they hold a check over our budget. I do not know what is done with the return by the Government of India.

145. (Mr. Meyer.) You at all events know nothing about these returns?—No. I do not sign them.

146. I venture to think that it is not sent at all now. If sent, I assume that it is necessary.

147. (Chairman.) Now with regard to the rules which require you to submit your budget. I think you said that there were great alterations made in the provincial figures by the Financial Department?—There very often are.

148. Do they give you reasons for their alterations?—Sometimes, not always.

149. Do they make them autocratically?—I do not think so. For instance, last year we had various things cut out of the budget. Generally we lump together a lot for establishments of which we are not able to give the details; these were cut out with a remark to the effect that if the money was wanted during the course of the year it would be found, and that kind of thing; but sometimes figures are cut out without any remarks at all.

150. Do you lump together a whole list of charges?—I mentioned that as an instance.

151. That would not be unreasonable as long as these budgets have to be submitted?—It was known that the establishment would be required in the course of the year.

152. You could not give the details, but you hoped to be able to give them?—We hoped to be able to give them when the final budget notes went up.

153. Under your system you submit an estimate, and then six months later you submit a revised estimate?—Yes, we send up a revised estimate with the budget figures for the next year.

154. Is that usually done?—Yes.

155. It is done in every case in India you think?—Yes.

156. Do you think it is a good provision?—I think if you are going to have your budget estimates in detail it is almost a necessary provision.

157. Do you think it leads to a proper accuracy of estimate to begin with, or perhaps to a more careless estimate to begin with, because you know that you are subsequently forced to present a revised estimate?—I do not think it necessarily leads to greater inaccuracy.

158. Do you not think it might possibly have that tendency?—If you know you are to get what you may call a second shot, is not the tendency to write out your bill quickly and send it in?—I think not.

159. Then with regard to lapses which take place in your budgets. Are they regranted at the end of the year automatically, or do you have to present fresh estimates?—We do not present fresh estimates, but we ask for a fresh appropriation.

160. They do not automatically go to you?—No.

161. You do not know one way or the other?—No.

162. Do you think it leads to extravagance or economy—the fact that you have to reclaim your lapses?—I do not see why it should lead to either, unless you pre-suppose either wastefulness or economy.

163. You have never heard it suggested that the departments of your Government would hurry up to spend money?—They do undoubtedly hurry up to spend money in order to avoid lapses.

164. Does not that lead to extravagance sometimes?—It may lead to extravagance at times.

165. Do you think that if it were known that the money would not be confiscated at the end of the year, you would spend your money more economically?—I do not think so. I think the Government, either way, whether there was a lapse or not, would spend its money as economically as it sees its way to do.

166. But you have said that the money is spent in a hurry, and money spent in hurry is not always well spent?—I was speaking of the subordinate spending departments. I was thinking specially of the Public Works Department, for instance. It is not the Government that is spending the money; it is being spent under Government, but I do not think the Government can control that detail. It must trust its officers to control that.

167. But as a matter of fact it is the officers of the Government that spend all money; it is not the Government itself. Is there not a tendency on the part of the officers of the Government to spend the money extravagantly if they have to spend it in a hurry?—I should think there might be.

168. Would it not, therefore, tend to economy if the lapses were allowed automatically to go back to the provincial Government?—Yes, it might.

169. It is only a case of "might" in your judgment?—I think there would be that tendency.

170. (Mr. Hitchens.) Do I understand that any money which is unexpended by the provincial Government at the end of the year lapses to the Imperial Government?—No.

171. (Chairman.) Suppose you were granted a sum of money that was earmarked for particular purposes and it lapsed?—It does not lapse to the Government of India.

172. To whom does it lapse?—It goes into the provincial balance.

173. Then the department concerned has to claim it from the provincial Government de novo?—Yes, and it practically always gets it.

174. Any grant made by the Government of India and earmarked for any purpose always remains; it never goes back to the Government of India?—No, I do not know of any case in my time where it did.

175. Therefore, the extravagance, if it occurs, would occur as between the department concerned and the provincial Government, and not between the department concerned and the Imperial Government?—If it occurs at all, it is simply the hurry of the spending officer to spend as near to allotments as he can every year so as not to have to apply for re-allotments.

176. Is there any way in which you could give extended powers to the Board of Revenue?—I think they might be given increased powers. We have sent in certain lists showing detailed powers which could be delegated.

177. With regard to the further delegation of powers to Collectors; would you deal with that?—Financial powers I should deal with, not revenue powers.

178. Could you suggest any financial powers which you think could be advantageously delegated to Collectors?—The Local Government has made various proposals. For instance, the sanctioning of temporary establishments in district presses; permission to deposit the cash chest of one department in the treasury for safe custody.

179. Does that cause much correspondence now?—No, not much.

180. It would be no real relief to the provincial Secretariat?—There would only be an occasional letter about it, but of course taking all these lists the total would be very considerable; these are all details in which there is unnecessary reference to higher authority.

181. It is suggested that the power of entertaining temporary criminal process-serving establishments should be vested in District Judges and District Magistrates. Here again is there much correspondence?—Not very much. I remember perhaps in the course of the last two or three years half-a-dozen cases.

182. I suppose, practically, you very seldom refuse to accept the proposals?—Very seldom.

183. Have you ever had to refuse them?—I do not remember any case in which they were refused.

184. That is in a great number of years?—I have only had a year in the Secretariat.

185. But when you were a District Magistrate, you do not remember any case in which your own proposals were refused?—No.

186. It is proposed that the first supply of a type-writer should be sanctioned by the Local Government, and subsequent renewals by the Superintendent of Stationery. What officers have to ask for type-writers?—The Inspector-General of Police we will say, or the Inspector-General of Registration, or the Inspector-General of Jails, etc.

187. Then it is asked that the Heads of Offices should be empowered to obtain cloth umbrellas. I suppose a cloth umbrella is not a very costly purchase?—No.

188. What does a cloth umbrella cost?—I suppose you could get a cloth umbrella for about Rs. 2, perhaps less.

189. How long does it take you to get the sanction for the purchase of these articles?—Not very long; it depends upon the distance the district is from headquarters. These do not have to go to the Secretary of State or anything of that kind; they go merely to the Secretariat.

190. Do you know that with regard to the Telegraph Department it is proposed that Superintendents of districts should be allowed to purchase bicycles for their officers?—I know nothing about that.

191. Then with regard to the proposal that Heads of Departments should be empowered to sanction charges for window delivery tickets, is that a Collector's business?—There is a system now by which you can get your letters from the post-office more rapidly if you have a window delivery ticket; to get that now they have to apply to the provincial Government; I had one application to-day. I think it was from the Criminal Investigation Department.

192. Under whose orders are these references made to the Head of the provincial Government?—It is under the Financial Code.

193. As sanctioned by the Government of India?—Yes.

194. Has any application been made to the Government of India for freedom in these matters?—Not in detail. This particular one happens to be in the Madras Treasury Manual.

195. Who is responsible for the Madras Treasury Manual?—Without examining the Manual I could not say.

196. Is the Collector concerned with the disposal of escheated estates or property?—The proposal is that the Board of Revenue should be authorised to dispose of such cases not exceeding Rs. 1,000 in value, and that the annual statement to the Government of India should be discontinued.

197. Then it is proposed that all Heads of Departments should be empowered to sanction the grant of travelling allowance to an inferior servant on transfer: would that concern a Collector?—No.

198. Has he power to give travelling allowances to inferior officers?—No.

199. On no occasion?—In ordinary travelling he would make the allowance without reference—under the Civil Service Regulations the man would get an allowance.

200. Are you aware that there is a proposal to eliminate local funds from the imperial budget?—I am not aware of it.

201. Although you know nothing about this matter yourself, can you tell us whether or not that would diminish correspondence with the Central Government?—Yes it would.

202. Very considerably?—I should think considerably.

203. Would it increase the correspondence between the local authorities and the provincial Governments?—I should think not.

204. Would it diminish it?—I do not think it would make much difference either way.

205. You think it would really diminish your correspondence with the Central Government?—Yes.

206. And therefore you would welcome any such arrangement?—Certainly.

207. Do the details of the expenditure of district authorities come to the Heads of Departments?—Yes.

208. Do they come in great detail?—In considerable detail.

209. Have you sufficient experience to enable you to tell us whether that detail could be diminished?—I have not considered that question, but I think it might be diminished.

210. For what purpose is that detail now insisted upon?—I can hardly say without thinking it over; it would take me a considerable time to look it up and find out the history of the thing.

211. But could you not tell us what is the practical reason for now asking the local authorities, the District Boards and municipalities and so on, to submit their estimates in detail?—I do not deal with local estimates at all here. All the local budgets go to the Secretary of the Local and Municipal Department; they do not come to me at all.

212. But you have had experience as a Collector?—Yes.

213. Speaking from your experience as a Collector do you think it is a good or a bad thing?—I think that a great deal of it might be abolished, and that a very much greater control should be given to the local bodies. When I was replying to you before I thought you were speaking of the provincial finance, but, as to local finance, the details I certainly think could be greatly diminished.

214. That would greatly decrease your correspondence with the local bodies?—Yes.

215. It would decrease the correspondence between the Collectors and the local bodies and between the Collectors and the Secretariat?—It would very much decrease the bulk of the correspondence generally.

216. Do District Boards and taluk Boards render their accounts in much greater detail than municipalities?—I think they do, but there have been many changes made since I have had to deal with local bodies as a Collector ten years ago.

217. To the best of your judgment you think that not only the District Boards and taluk Boards could have their details reduced, but the municipalities also?—Yes.

218. So that there would be saving of correspondence and clerical work all round?—I think there would be.

219. Do you give to these District Boards large grants-in-aid from the provincial revenues?—Yes, considerable.

220. Would it be simpler and perhaps more satisfactory if you gave them larger sources of revenue?—I do not think we could do that. We give grants-in-aid for special purposes.

221. Such as —?—Water-supply, drainage, and things of that kind.

222. Would it be possible to raise a water-rate or a water-tax?—A rate is raised, but the grants are to cover the capital expenditure.

223. Then it would be impossible to recover from the district directly the capital expenditure?—That is so.

224. All you can do is to charge a sum which represents interest on that capital?—No; they are free grants in many cases, chiefly to municipalities. We very often contribute half the capital cost. It depends entirely upon the funds of the municipality, how well off it is and so on.

225. So that to that extent the municipality has the advantage of the general revenue of the province?—Yes.

226. Would you allow Collectors greater freedom of expenditure in their districts?—Collectors have not much expenditure to deal with except from local funds.

227. They have power to remit revenue in case of famine?—They have power to remit revenue in case of damage to crops due to the excessive or insufficient supply of water, but for general losses on dry crops, which are not irrigated, they have to get sanction; special remissions may be made on dry lands over large tracts of country, but the ordinary remissions are only on irrigated crops.

228. What is the practical reason for making the distinction?—In ordinary years different sources of irrigation may fail, or a channel may break, and a Collector can remit the revenue in such circumstances; the rest of the country all round may have splendid crops, but for some reason there may be a shortage at one particular place which is ordinarily irrigated, and then he remits revenue there. At a particular place there may be many fields that have a splendid supply of water and individual fields that have none. In case of an occasional failure of crops over a large area a complete remission, both on wet and dry lands, is given, and that is given by the Board of Revenue or the Government.

229. In the case of a shortage in a particular village which for some reason or other does not receive its full share of rain during the season, or by reason of locusts appearing, or something of that sort, the Collector would have no power to remit?—As a rule not.

230. What is the reason for that distinction?—Because in the one case the Government makes itself responsible for the supply of irrigation water, and the crop failure in the other is due to Providence, and we make a deduction in our settlement arrangements for failure of crops. After arriving at what ought to be the revenue, a percentage is deducted in order to cover all ordinary losses of crops from ordinary causes.

231. That will not bring relief to the village affected?—But the village affected is very slightly affected; a man may lose his individual crop, but he has ordinarily to pay much less than he would have to pay if the Government gave him remission in special cases.

232. That is to say the system of land assessment is calculated on the law of averages, and assumes that a good crop in one year will pay for a bad crop in a previous year?—Yes.

233. Is that found to work well in practice?—Yes; very often a man does not cultivate a dry field every year.

234. You rely in the case of a wet crop upon the discretion and judgment of the Collector?—Yes.

235. Why should you not rely upon it in the second case?—Because we know exactly what the size of the field is; we know that this particular field is an acre and a half in size, that its assessment is so much, and that it had no water and bore no crop. In the other case an individual field perhaps is not cultivated, but still the man pays upon it.

236. Is not the Collector aware of the facts in that particular case?—Yes.

237. Then why should not he be trusted to remit revenue in a case of real necessity?—Because the percentage reduction covers the cases of fallows and things of that sort.

238. In cases where the Collector knew that for one reason or another the percentage had not been worked up to on that particular field, would you give him no discretion? Is he not fit to exercise discretion in such a case?—He is particularly fitted, but it would increase his work enormously. Take a good season; a man very often does not cultivate his field; he does not attempt to plough it; he is responsible for the revenue; if he allows the field to go fallow, he pays the assessment just the same whether he cultivates it or not. In the year in which there is a failure of crop over a small area, say, over part of the village fields, it is impossible for the Collector to know whether this man has failed to grow his crop in consequence of the lack of rain, or has simply allowed the field to go fallow. I think we should have to have a very large increase of establishment if we went into all that.

239. The suggestions you have previously made are all intended to free the local officers from clerical work?—Yes.

240. If the Collector had time to go into these matters, you would have no objection to give him the power?—It would be a very difficult thing.

241. I do not say it would not, but in principle you would have no objection?—We should have to revise all our settlements. If we agreed to remit the land revenue upon all the fields which were uncultivated in a particular area——.

242. I was not suggesting that for a moment. What I suggested to you was, in cases where there was real and general distress in the case of dry crops, whether the Collector held such a position that he was fitted in that case to remit revenue, just as he was considered fit and specially responsible by the Government to remit revenue in the case of wet crops?—The one is an individual field, and the other is a great tract of country. The rule about dry crops is this——.

243. I am not talking about rules. It may be that the climatic conditions of India are such that it is impossible that scarcity should visit one particular village without visiting a large area, therefore bringing the place within what you define as a "large area"; but what I suggest is that if scarcity visits a particular field and that cultivated with dry crops, ought not the Collector to be in a position to remit revenue in such a case?—If he considers that revenue should be remitted, he reports the matter and it is remitted.

244. But ought not the Collector to have that power; is he not fit to exercise that power?—I think he is fit to exercise the power.

245. And therefore that power of remission, under the special circumstances I have indicated, might well be added to the powers of the Collector?—Certainly it might be, but it is not the practice.

246. I was not talking of the practice; I wanted to know whether it was possible?—It is certainly possible.

247. And advisable?—It might be advisable, but we do not grant remissions on particular lands in small areas.

248. Now, are there not other directions in which you think the powers of a Collector might be increased?—I cannot make detailed proposals. I think you might ask the Collectors themselves as to that.

249. But I wanted to get an opinion about it from above as well as from below?—I have not thought the matter out.

250. To go back to the question on which I was pressing you as to the delegation to the Collector of power to remit revenue in times of distress, there would be no real danger to the local funds?—There might be very great danger if the losses were spread over a very large area.

251. But in the case of a large area he now has power to go to the Government?—He goes to the Government.

252. But with regard to remissions over smaller areas which I have rather hinted at, that would probably not cause any serious dislocation of the finances?—It would not cause any serious dislocation of the finances; we should have to revise our settlements of course.

253. Now, with your knowledge of Secretariat work—which I understand has only lasted for about a year—is that so?—I have had this appointment for a year now, and I previously had it for a few weeks on two occasions.

254. Suppose we get rid of some of this correspondence which you have indicated, what is going to be the result upon the Secretariat?—It will reduce the work, not very appreciably.

255. Could you reduce the numbers?—I do not think so; we might be able to. The total altogether may be very considerable, especially if we are able to get rid of the Local and Municipal business.

256. Does that occupy the greater portion of the time of the Secretariat?—It occupies a portion of the Secretariat a considerable time.

257. A very considerable portion?—Well, say a fourth or a fifth.

258. Can you give me in general terms what in the remaining four-fifths of the time the Secretariat is occupied in doing?—The Secretariat is divided up into branches.

259. May I put it in this way that you could only therefore so far reduce the Secretariat in that branch which has to deal with the administration of municipal affairs?—Yes—District Boards and municipalities.

260. That is the only part of the Secretariat that would be reducible under the proposals of the Government of Madras?—I do not know what the proposals from the other departments will amount to.

261. Perhaps you mean a reduction by one-fifth of the work in the Local and Municipal Department?—Yes: a reduction in the Local and Municipal Secretariat of one-fifth. I take it that we should still have to watch their budget, and to have a very strict audit of the accounts.

262. How many members of the Secretariat are there in your Local and Municipal branch?—I do not know how many clerks there are.

263. Is there nobody who knows the total numbers of the Secretariat?—It varies almost from day to day; temporary clerks are taken on.

264. Are there many of them?—Yes, they run up to over a hundred altogether.

265. One hundred superior clerks?—No, a hundred altogether.

266. You could get rid of one-fifth in the Local and Municipal Department?—Yes.

267. You have read more or less these proposals of the Government of Madras for getting rid of references and correspondence?—I have only read those that have passed through our hands. I have not seen all of them I think.

268. Would these enable the Secretariat to be still further reduced?—I do not think so; I cannot judge what the result would be without working it out.

269. Have you found the Secretariat, speaking of it as a whole, rather inclined to look at things from the point of view of "how much money are we going to get"? Is that their first aim and object—to get their revenue?—I do not think so. The Secretariat has very little to do with the getting of the revenue.

270. But do they refuse to exercise their powers of remission or relief because their first fear is lest the revenue should unduly go down?—I think not.

271. Do you think that the Government as a whole is too much inclined to look at matters from the revenue point of view?—I think not. I think that is a very minor consideration.

272. Now you have made a great many suggestions as to decreasing references to the Government of India. In your judgment, do you think as a whole the proposals for change come from inside the Government of Madras or outside the Government of Madras?—The proposals we have made are entirely from inside.

273. Have you never had considerable proposals for improvements from the Government of India which have turned out to be really advantageous, although they were first regarded with hesitation or alarm?—I have not had sufficient experience of the Secretariat to answer that.

274. You have never had any proposal from the Government of India which you received perhaps with alarm and eventually accepted with alacrity?—Unless one is in the Secretariat itself, one does not know very often what comes from the Government of India.

275. Would it not be the custom of the Government of Madras to say: "We write to you for your opinion upon this or that suggestion that has been made by the Government of India?"—The Government of Madras does not know what comes from provincial Governments and what comes from the Government of India. The Government of India send down certain proposals, but they very often do not tell us that they have come from provincial Governments; they simply say: "It has been suggested," and so on.

276. Is that a good state of things?—I do not know that it matters very much whether a proposal comes from the Government of India or from a provincial Government, if it is a good one.

277. What you would rather like to see is a freedom from the control and supervision of the Government of India generally, so that you could conduct your own administration in your own way and make your improvements at such times and by such methods as seem best to you?—We should always be glad to get suggestions from other Governments or from the Government of India—I mean generally.

278. Do you get proposals, say, from the United Provinces or from Bombay?—We frequently get letters asking "what do you do in such and such a matter," or asking what is the usual practice.

279. And you make the same enquiries from other Governments?—Yes; we often write to Bombay and other provinces.

280. Can you give me a concrete example of some major point?—I cannot give you a concrete example on any major point.

281. This would only occur on minor points?—Yes.

282. Such as —?—The other day there was a question as to how a certain rule under the Arms Act was worked; it came from Bombay; Bombay referred to Bengal; an order was passed here differing from the practice in Bombay and Bengal, and there was correspondence about it between Madras and Bombay and Bengal.

283. That is a small matter; on larger matters you do not get proposals or suggestions from other provincial Governments?—I think not.

284. I understand there is a right of appeal in all administrative matters from the Local Government to the Government of India, either by law, or by rules having the force of law, or by practice?—Yes.

285. Can you make any proposals that you think would be an improvement on the existing system?—I think it would be a great improvement if it were arranged that wherever an order was made against an officer, he should have the right of appeal to the officer immediately superior to him; I think the appeal should stop after the immediate superior of the person who passes the order has heard the appeal. I think that is quite sufficient.

286. You think that there should be one appeal from the judgment pronounced?—Yes. I am not speaking of a judicial judgment; I am speaking of executive orders; I think it would be quite sufficient if the person aggrieved had one appeal to the immediate superior of the officer who passed the rule.

287. For instance, if an Assistant Collector thought himself aggrieved, he would have an appeal to the Collector?—In his case the person who felt himself aggrieved by the order of the Assistant Collector, would have an appeal to the Collector, and there it should stop.

288. And therefore in the case of an order passed by a Collector, there should be an appeal to the Board of Revenue, and there it should stop?—Yes.

289. Now what is the present practice? Take the case of a tahsildar?—If a tahsildar passes an order, the person who considers himself aggrieved appeals direct to the Divisional Officer, who might be a Deputy Collector; then the Deputy Collector passes an order, and as a rule there is an appeal to the Collector; it often goes as far as the Board. There are certain rules which have had the effect of reducing the number of appeals; still, there may be two or three appeals, or sometimes more.

290. In your judgment, however high or however low the person aggrieved may be, you think the right of appeal should stop at a point where it has been heard by some person superior to the original pronouncer of the decision?—I think so.

291. I was told the other day by a District Officer that (in a case I think it was of land revenue) supposing a Collector pronounced judgment in such a case there would be an appeal along two lines; first, through him up to the Commissioner, and then from the Commissioner gradually up to the Local Government, and then, supposing the verdict was not satisfactory to the original appellant, the whole appeal might be further repeated in a Civil Court. Is that so?—That is not so, as a rule, but it is possible that cases may be found in which a civil suit might be brought.

292. Is that in your judgment satisfactory?—Most unsatisfactory.

293. Does it occur often?—I do not think it occurs often in this Presidency.

294. Not so often as to be an abuse of the right of appeal?—I should call it an abuse if it ever occurred.

295. And if it did occur, you think it ought to be confined to one line of appeal and not extend to two lines?—Yes.

296. Have you known of any case being pursued along two lines in such a way?—I have not known of such a case.

297. Who makes the selection for the promotion of officers in this Presidency?—In the case of the Indian Civilians, the Governor has the right of promotion.

298. And that is exercised through whom?—In higher appointments the Governor in Council makes the selection.

299. Then with regard to the lower appointments?—With regard to the lower appointments, the Member of the Council in charge of the particular branch makes the selection. A note is put up stating the appointment which is vacant and who are in the running for it; then it passes through the Member in charge of the portfolio to the Governor.

300. Is a record kept of the conduct and service of every officer?—Yes.

301. Do you know at all what weighs in the selection or rejection of an officer for a particular appointment, what is the principal factor which would weigh in the selection?—Ability.

302. Ability in doing his work?—Yes.

303. In what sort of work?—The work which he is about to be put to.

304. Is it by his clerical powers?—It depends upon the nature of the appointment.

305. Take the appointment of a Collector; suppose there are two candidates for a good Collectorship?—All Collectors of the same standing are paid the same. There are two grades of Collectors, and all the senior ones are paid alike. The only question is whether it is a pleasant district or not.

306. What would weigh in the selection of a man principally; would it be his power of writing a good report?—A man is made a Collector in order of seniority, unless he has shown that he is unfit to be promoted, and when there is a district vacant, the next man for promotion gets that district.

307. Seniority is the first claim?—Seniority is the first claim up to the rank of Collector.

308. Where does that right of seniority stop?—After the rank of Collector.

309. Then it goes by merit?—Yes. Other things being equal, Collectors are put in, in order of seniority, unless the man has shown himself unfit. Then the Board of Revenue is selected by merit, and the Governor in Council selects in the case of higher appointments.

310. Do you know at all what weighs in the selection? I am trying to get at whether the fact that a man writes a good report—has a ready pen and that sort of thing—is practically what carries promotion with it?—I do not think so; I think it is his general ability; I do not think writing has much to do with it.

311. Is a great deal of weight attached to the fact that a man would, or would not know the people amongst whom he lived?—That would be so certainly.

312. How would you arrive at a knowledge whether a man did or did not know his work?—From the reports he sends in.

313. That is to say the written reports?—From the knowledge he shows of his district. The Board of Revenue in travelling about would see his work, and they would tell the Members of the Government what they thought of him. Sometimes they are consulted in writing. I have often been asked to report upon a man, not as to promotion, but, generally, as to what I thought of him. All these communications go to the Chief Secretariat and they are recorded, and the record is used in the Council when the appointment is made by the Governor and the Members of the Council.

314. Is some personal knowledge by somebody or other always insisted upon?—The Governor or the Members of the Council have a personal knowledge of every Collector.

315. Either the Members of the Council or the Governor?—Yes. The Governor, of course, knows some of them; by this time he probably knows half or more; the Members of the Council know them all.

316. Personally?—Yes, personally.

317. There would be no Collector throughout this Presidency who would not be known to one or other and probably to all the Members of the Council?—I do not think there is a single Collector now that one or other of the two Members of the Council does not know.

318. How do you recruit your local Secretariat?—From the members of the Civil Service as a rule.

319. How are they chosen?—They come in first after they have had about 6 or 7 years' service—the juniors—then they go out again.

320. Is it an unbroken law that they should go out?—Practically.

321. How long do they stay in the Secretariat before they are returned to the districts?—The highest pay of the Under-Secretaries is Rs. 1,050 a month; then when their turn comes for promotion above that they go out.

322. Have you any officers in this Secretariat who have been here continuously for say 6 or 7 or 10 years?—No, not one.

323. How long would a man return to the district for?—Until his turn came for promotion; it might be 10 years.

324. How long does it keep him out of the Secretariat in practice?—I think the officer who has been longest in the Secretariat now is the Revenue Secretary; he was Inspector-General of Jails for a long time; I should think he was away from the Secretariat about 10 years.

325. Without coming back?—Without coming back. He became Inspector-General of Jails, I think, direct from the Secretariat; I cannot be certain about it; then after some time he became a Collector.

326. Have you got any fixed rule or is it merely the practice of this Presidency?—It is the practice. I know of only one case of a man who got into the Secretariat and stayed.

327. When was that?—That was many years ago.

328. Practically now the rule obtains, and is strictly observed, that all members of the Secretariat who come in are recruited at about six or seven years' service, and go out and remain out for some considerable period?—Yes.

329. Are there not a great number of languages spoken in Madras?—There are four that are classed as languages of a district. For the purpose of work in the district, each district has a language, and there are four.

330. When you appoint a young Civilian to a district, how many charges would there be in that district?—In the biggest there would be four or five.

331. Then he is appointed to a district in which a particular language is spoken?—Yes.

332. When does he pass the language test?—At the beginning of his service, he passes in two languages.

333. Before he comes out?—No; he passes out here in two standards—the Higher and the Lower Standards.

334. When does he pass the Lower?—At once, as soon as he can. A good man will pass the Lower Standard within a year, and the Higher sometimes in eighteen months or two years; sometimes it may be three or four years.

335. Is there any limit of time laid down?—Yes. Without looking it up, I think it is about five years; then if he has failed to pass, he is placed under suspension and made to learn.

336. Then, after he has passed, he is appointed to a district and learns the language of that district?—An officer is appointed to a district and learns the language before, not after, he has passed.

337. Is he often removed from that district?—Yes.

338. For what reason?—He goes away—he asks for leave—and his appointment is filled up, and then he goes to another district because there is a vacancy there.

339. Is that a satisfactory state of things?—I think it is; I think an officer should know something of more than one district.

340. How many districts does the ordinary Civilian go through?—They do not now go through so many as they did formerly, because we have graded the service; formerly men were moved about very much.

341. A man comes out first of all as a stranger more or less to the language spoken in his district?—No, because as a rule he has passed in a language that is spoken in the district in which he has to serve.

342. When is an officer selected for the province in which he has to serve?—Before he comes out.

343. What language does he study?—He studies the language which is spoken in the Presidency for which he is selected.

344. Take the case of Madras?—When I came out I studied two languages, but I understand the younger men—some of them—have only studied one. I was at home two years, and these men are at home for one year only.

345. If a man has come to a district in which the language which he has studied is not spoken, he must find himself in a difficulty?—Those who have studied the language of a district are sent to that district, so that it makes no difference.

346. He is a stranger in any case?—Just so.

347. What is the practical use of an officer in a district with large executive powers who cannot speak to the people of the district?—He is under training.

348. But take the case of a man who having studied the language in his district goes on leave and then is removed to a new district?—He is rarely removed to a new district the language of which he cannot understand. Every man studies two languages; it is very unusual for a man to be sent to a district in which he has not passed in one of the two languages.

349. But there are four languages?—There are four languages; two of them are spoken only in a single district, Malabar and South Canara; in all the other districts either Telugu or Tamil is spoken.

350. Suppose a man finds himself in a district of which he cannot speak the language; for about

The Hon.
Mr. H.
Bradley.

22 Nov., 1907.

12 or 18 months he is not much good as an officer in that district?—Oh yes, he is.

351. Why?—Because a great deal of English is spoken in this Presidency.

352. By the village people?—No.

353. But are not his duties among the village people as well as among persons who speak English?—Yes.

354. Then he is unable to communicate during this period with the village people?—He is able.

355. How?—Because we have hardly any villages in which there are not people who speak English.

356. In other words he has to speak through an interpreter?—He has to communicate through an interpreter until he can speak the language.

357. Is that a satisfactory system?—It is a system which cannot be helped.

358. Is it a satisfactory system?—It is not a satisfactory system.

359. Is there no way of avoiding it?—None whatever.

360. None?—None. We have a certain number of men trained for instance in Telugu; if all these men happened to be at home on leave, men must be sent who cannot speak the language.

361. You think the advantages to be gained by transfers from district to district are greater than the disadvantages of a man knowing hardly anything at all of the language of the district in which he finds himself?—It is very unusual for a man to be sent to any district the language of which he has not passed an examination in.

362. Can he speak it?—Not always when he first gets there; but in a very short time he is able to.

363. In two of the four divisions there is a duplicate language, but in two there is only a single language; is that not the position?—There are four languages in the Presidency; two of them are spoken in all the districts, but two languages are spoken in two single districts. If a man who is trained in South Canara is transferred from South Canara, he must have passed in Canarese and one other language; then if he is transferred to some other place than Canara, he will be sent to a district in which the language spoken is the other language in which he has passed.

364. Then in the re-appointment of an officer who comes out from leave, the language which he is able to speak is a considerable factor?—It is.

365. And he is sent (as far as it can be done) to a district in which he can speak the language?—To the district in which the language in which he has passed is spoken.

366. I thought you told me a little while ago that a man might come out from leave and find all the appointments filled up in the district the language of which he could speak?—In the case of South Canara that might happen.

367. Might there not be cases in other districts?—It is very unlikely that in the whole of the Telugu country every appointment would be filled up.

368. You say it is unlikely that it would happen?—Very unlikely.

369. Therefore you are practically always able to appoint a man to a district the language of which he knows, I mean the language is spoken by the raiyats themselves?—Yes.

370. Will he have good knowledge of that language?—Many of them have.

371. A fair knowledge?—A very fair knowledge.

372. Quite enough to enable him to talk about village crops and common-place matters—sufficient for a man to be able to hold a conversation with an educated native?—The educated natives, almost all of them, speak English.

373. But would he be able to hold a conversation with educated natives in their own language?—He would not perhaps be able to carry on a scientific conversation in the vernacular.

374. Will a man open his mind as readily to you speaking in another language as he will speaking in his own language?—A man who knows both languages, I think, will.

375. A man who can talk a little English will, you think, speak quite as freely to the Assistant Collector or Collector as he would if he talked in his own language?—I was speaking of a man who understood English, not a man who was a poor English scholar.

376. And there are a great number of people who are good English scholars?—There are a great number of people in the Presidency who talk English very well.

377. Would you say certainly one man in every village?—I do not think there are many villages in the ordinary tracts of the Presidency in which there are not people who speak English.

378. And who can act as interpreters?—Yes.

379. Therefore you think it really does not matter very much that an English officer may not be able to speak except through an interpreter?—It really does not very much matter.

380. Do the Government give rewards for the acquisition of languages?—Yes.

381. Are these largely made use of?—Not so largely as they used to be.

382. Is that on account of the accumulation of clerical work?—I happened to be looking at the list the other day, and I think more men have passed latterly than in the few years immediately previous.

383. There has been an increase lately in the acquisition of the native languages?—Yes.

384. That you would regard as very satisfactory?—Yes.

385. Is that merely a power to pass a set examination, or is it a real increase of linguistic knowledge?—I should say probably the power to pass an examination. I think some of our best linguists are men who have not passed the High Proficiency Standard.

386. They can talk the language thoroughly well without knowing the language classically?—They can talk it very well indeed, and they are up in the handwriting of the country.

387. Is any attempt made in this Presidency to instruct young gentlemen who come out from England in the etiquette and customs and habits of the races within the Presidency?—Not in the sense of instruction being imparted to them here. I do not think there is any attempt made before they come out.

388. Is any attempt made afterwards?—The young men under training go into camp with the Collector, and the Collector is called upon to report how they are getting on every six months, and one of the questions he reports upon is how the Assistant gets on with the natives; that is a regular portion of the Collector's report.

389. As to his conduct and so on?—Yes, he reports on that very point.

390. At what age do young officers come out?—About 23 and 24.

391. Do they all come out as single men?—No.

392. Some come out married?—Some, not many.

393. Would you say 25 per cent.?—Nothing like that—about one a year out of 6 or 7 on the average—perhaps an eighth.

394. I suppose this has a deterrent effect upon his going into camp while he is under training?—No, I think not; I think they go into camp and take their wives with them.

395. Would it be satisfactory if there were some—I hardly like to use the word "manual," because manuals seem to me to be things that are very much overdone—but would it be satisfactory if there could be some little book prepared, not in the shape of a manual, which would enable officers in this and other Governments to know something of the habits and the social customs of the people amongst whom they were going to work?—I think it would be a good thing.

396. Is there anything of that sort?—I am not aware of it.

397. It would be desirable that it should be very short?—Yes.

398. The shorter the better?—The shorter the better.

399. But it might in your judgment be of service?—If it could be made reliable.

400. There are a great number of manuals published?—Yes, there are departmental manuals in each department practically.

401. Which a District Officer is supposed to know?—A District Officer is supposed to be able to refer to them—I mean, they will use the index.

402. Have they been overhauled at all?—Yes, they have been regularly overhauled.

403. Every year?—Not every year, but as alterations are made, corrections are sent out and they are entered in that way in the book itself.

404. How many of these manuals would an officer of necessity have in his library?—I have not the least idea.

405. Eight or ten?—More than that.

406. Twenty?—I do not think that he would have twenty in use.

407. Could they be reduced by codification or something of that kind?—If you take this manual for instance (the Civil Account Code), the thickness of this book could be reduced, because it contains a lot of forms at the end.

408. If you could reduce the number of volumes through which a District Officer has to wade in order to arrive at a just decision upon this, that or the other point, would it not be desirable?—It would be desirable, but I think manuals are always found useful, and they are continually used.

409. Do you think they could not be compressed advantageously?—I do not think so.

410. There are a great number of recent appointments of Inspectors-General?—Yes, there have been several.

411. Have they paid much attention to Madras?—Several of them have been here. I hope they all pay attention to Madras; we have not seen many of them.

412. Do you think on the whole their influence has been for good?—No, I do not.

413. Have they attempted to interfere with your administrative powers?—The tendency is distinctly to interfere.

414. You find that they begin by correspondence and they end by orders?—That is the tendency distinctly.

415. Do you think there is any benefit to be derived from the concentration of the knowledge of practice and of what is occurring in other Governments, and the dissemination of this concentrated knowledge to the various Governments?—Yes.

416. Could that be done by any better method than through the Inspectors-General?—I think so.

417. In what way?—By correspondence between the Heads of Departments.

418. In the various Governments?—Yes.

419. Or by conferences?—Yes.

420. Has the practice of conferences been much taken up? I understand it began with a conference of Directors of Education when Lord Curzon was Viceroy?—I do not know when it began.

421. Quite recently, I think?—I do not know whether that was the first or not. I know that Police Officers for instance in adjoining territories have conferences, and have had them for years.

422. In preference to the present system of Inspectors-General you would like to have a system of conferences?—I should prefer a system of conferences.

423. Do you think that system in itself is necessary?—I certainly think it would be unnecessary to have regular conferences at fixed times.

424. A conference once a year you think would be unnecessary?—Yes, I think it would be quite sufficient for correspondence to take place and for these men to consult one another and to meet occasionally. For instance, I would allow the Bombay Excise Officer to meet the Madras Excise Officer and talk over matters independently of any formal conference.

425. Has that ever been done?—Not as to Excise Officers.

426. They meet as friends?—They meet in other ways.

427. Has this appointment of the Inspector-General of Excise been of use to you here?—Giving you my own opinion only, I do not think the appointment of that official has made any difference here at present; so far I have not heard of him in any way.

428. Still this suggestion that Excise Officers or similar officers might meet is not actually put in practice by the Local Government?—No. The reason I mentioned Excise Officers was because I was on a Committee with the chief Excise Officer in Bombay, and I had some talk about it with him then.

429. Have not the Government of India to sanction expenditure under various heads?—Yes.

430. How are the Government of India to know that the policy which the various Local Governments are carrying out is wise or not—whether they are sanctioning the expenditure of money for a good purpose or for no purpose whatever—unless they have something like an Inspector-General?—If the Government is fit to be a Government, I think it ought to be trusted to spend the moneys entrusted to it to good purpose. I do not think the appointment of an officer at Simla, who may be inferior in position and service and everything else to the Head of a Department under the Local Government, will make any difference.

431. I will put it in this way. Has any attempt been made by the various provincial Governments to find out what other provincial Governments were doing in the same class of matter; for instance, in the matter of police; would your Inspector-General at Madras write all round to see what was going on in the United Provinces or the Punjab for instance?—I cannot tell you, but I know that Superintendents of Police and Deputy Inspectors-General of contiguous portions of India have met in conference and talked things over.

432. Officially?—Officially; I know of several individual cases. The Superintendent of the Bellary district would meet the Superintendent of Dharwar.

433. In different Presidencies?—In different Presidencies, and I am pretty confident that the man at Ganjam has met the man at Puri.

434. But they have not gone outside?—No, except the Criminal Investigation Department; they go outside sometimes.

435. May I take it that so long as a Director or Inspector-General confines his attention to inspecting and suggesting, if it could be confined to that, you would have no objection to it?—I do not think his inspections would be of much use.

436. You think that the time he would have to give would be so small that it would be of not much use?—I think it entirely depends upon the position which the particular branch has reached in the Presidency; for instance, I do not think that in Bombay the inspection by the Commissioner of Salt for the Government of India would be of any benefit whatever.

437. For what reason?—Because he has really no experience of sea salt, and all Bombay salt is practically sea salt.

438. Then with regard to the inspection of Public Works, would the experience of a man who had been round all the great irrigation works of the north be of no value to you here in your irrigation works in Madras?—I do not know enough about the details to speak as to that.

439. I understand that the complete administration of excise rests with the provincial Government?—At present.

440. You share the revenue?—Yes, the revenue is shared.

441. Could it be advantageously taken over by the imperial or local exchequers?—I do not think it matters at all.

442. Not for the simplification of accounts?—I do not think it makes any difference; the proportion is to be half now, and I do not think it would make much difference.

443. Does it lead to much correspondence?—I do not think so.

444. You simply collect half your revenue and say: "This is half the revenue and there it is"?—That is so.

445. And they ask no questions about it?—No.

446. Practically nothing?—No.

447. Has there been much interference with the administration?—There has been none hitherto.

448. You have an Inspector-General of Excise?—I do not know what he is called, and I do not know what will happen.

449. You have not yet seen him?—I have seen him and I know him well, but I have had nothing to do with him officially.

450. Who is the responsible Excise Officer in the district?—The Collector is the Head of the Excise.

451. Then you have an Excise Commissioner?—There is an Excise Commissioner, and he has Assistant and Deputy Commissioners under him and inspectors.

452. It has been suggested somewhere that the control of the Government of India over the Excise Department of the provincial Governments is necessarily closer than its control in other branches of administration. Is that so?—I have not found any control of the Government of India in Madras; I do not know how far it is due to the fact that it is assumed, from the way things have turned out, that we have been working on correct lines.

453. With regard to the Inspector-General, you know nothing of him officially?—No, he has been appointed since I had anything to do with excise.

454. There is this restriction upon the action of Local Governments which I should like you to explain. You are not allowed to alter the rates on exciseable articles without the sanction of the Government of India?—I think we are.

455. Do you often do it?—Often.

456. Upon the same articles of excise?—Yes.

457. Would you give me an illustration?—The duty on spirits was raised on the 1st April last.

458. Was that not done under the direction of the Government of India?—No, I think you are talking of customs.

459. No, I am talking of excise?—I am not aware that the Government of India did it.

460. Here in Madras you on your own account raised the duty on spirits?—We have often raised it. I have not had anything to do with excise now for two years, but the duty was raised from the 1st April last. It was the result of the Government of India raising the customs duty which enabled us to do that; otherwise our duty on spirits would have been higher than the customs duty.

461. Then you are practically dependent for your excise duty upon the amount of the customs duty?—We are to a great extent.

462. All the customs duties being under the control of the Government of India, you cannot practically raise your duties?—Not beyond the tariff rate.

463. And you cannot practically alter them unless the customs duties are altered?—If they are to remain below the customs duties.

464. I am not talking of the theory of government, but of the practice; you cannot practically raise them, unless the customs duties also are raised?—Yes we can, because in many parts of the country the excise duties are lower than the customs duties; if they were higher, the spirit would enter the country from outside, and the local product would not be used.

465. In that case you are independent of the customs duties?—Yes.

466. You think this advantageous?—Yes.

467. You submit an excise report?—Yes. A yearly report is prepared by the Commissioner and sent to the Government, and the Government send it to the Government of India for their information.

468. Is that necessary?—I think it is advisable.

469. Very advisable?—Yes.

470. Is it a lengthy document at all?—I should think about 16 pages of print with statements at the end.

471. Customs is entirely an imperial department?—Yes.

472. Has that been a wise change; has it changed the classes of officers?—Well, it has not entirely. Except Madras, all our local ports are under the customs authorities of this Presidency.

473. Do you think that is wise?—I think so, because the Government of India have not the establishment under them to control those in charge of the local ports. We have got a whole sea-board with over a hundred ports.

474. And the ports controlled by the Government of India are, although very important, few in number?—Yes.

475. Is there any interference as between the Government of India and your customs administration?—I have not heard of any.

476. Nothing unnecessary at all events?—I have not heard of anything.

477. Have you got a Director-General of Customs?—I really do not know; I think not.

478. The customs duties of course are fixed by the Government of India?—Yes.

479. There is not much correspondence, as I understand, between you and the Government of India in the matter of customs?—No.

480. Nothing more than is expedient?—No.

(The witness withdrew.)

Adjourned.

W. L. HICHENS, Esq.

Surgeon-General WILLIAM RICHARD BROWNE, C.I.E., was called and examined.

Surgeon-
General
W. R.
Browne.

23 Nov., 1907

481. (Chairman.) You are Surgeon-General with the Government of Madras?—Yes.

482. What are your duties?—The administration of the Civil Medical Department in the Presidency.

483. How is that department constituted?—It is made up of Commissioned Medical Officers, of a large body of Assistant Surgeons, Civil Apothecaries and Hospital Assistants.

484. How are you recruited?—The Commissioned Medical Officers belong to the Indian Medical Service; they are recruited in the ordinary way in England by competitive examination; the others are all recruited locally; the Assistant Surgeons, Civil Apothecaries and Hospital Assistants are all trained here.

485. What departments have you got under your control?—The whole of the medical administration of the province. That includes all the hospitals and dispensaries, and I am an official visitor of jails and allied institutions.

486. Who appoints you?—I am appointed by the Government of India on the recommendation of the Local Government.

487. And who appoints your subordinates?—The Indian Medical Service officers are men lent from the Military Department to the Civil Department, at first temporarily, then permanently; they are liable at any moment to be required, as we still are a Military Service.

488. Have you the full power within the limits of the Presidency to promote and appoint your subordinates?—All, except the Commissioned Medical Officers; the appointments of Commissioned Medical Officers go chiefly by seniority, not to certain appointments, but as regards rank. They belong to the Indian Medical Service, and their rank goes by seniority.

489. Entirely by the efflux of time?—Yes, as regards promotion to military rank, which of course governs their pay to a great extent; but as regards appointments, they are made by the Local Government on the recommendation of the Surgeon-General.

490. Then you have under you the hospitals and some part of the jail administration?—As an official visitor.

491. Only as an official visitor?—Only as that. Lunatic asylums come under the head of the general medical administration.

492. Do you know why your appointment as Surgeon-General has to be referred to the Government of India? Is there any reason in the working of the Presidency Medical Service that would require that?—No, not as regards directly the working of the Presidency, but the selections to the administrative grades, viz., what are known as Colonels' appointments, Principal Medical Officer, and to the Surgeon-General grade are supposed to be by selection and merit—not merely by seniority—and they have to obtain the approval of the Secretary of State.

493. You are part really of the central organisation which is loaned out to the various provincial Governments?—Yes, but with this difference, that we are entirely independent.

494. Once you are appointed you are entirely independent?—Once we are appointed. I correspond with the Director-General, but apart from that the Local Government is supreme in all matters relating to the Department in Madras.

495. You correspond direct with the Director-General?—Yes.

496. Now you have got a Sanitary Commissioner under you?—Yes, he corresponds direct with the Local Government. He is not under me.

497. Is he co-equal with you?—He is of course junior, and not of the same rank.

498. Is he under your control in any way?—Not in any way.

499. Have you any control over the Sanitary Board?—I am a member of the central Sanitary Board of the province, which consists of three members. There is only one Sanitary Board consisting of the Chief Engineer who is the President, the Secretary in the Local and Municipal Department who is a member, and the Surgeon-General who is the third member. All matters in connection with sanitation are referred to that Board for approval and for recommendation to the Local Government.

500. Has the Board plenary power?—No.

501. No power at all?—No power at all beyond that of recommendation.

502. Who has the power in the Sanitary Department?—Plans and everything else must be approved by the Sanitary Board.

503. Who has the power of deciding sanitary questions?—The form in which they run is this. They go through the Sanitary Commissioner and the Sanitary Engineer to the Sanitary Board; the Sanitary Board recommends to Government, who pass the final orders without question.

504. Who is the person in the Government who, as a matter of fact, passes these final orders?—Chiefly the Secretary in the Local and Municipal Department, who is also a member of the Board.

505. Has he any practical knowledge of sanitary questions?—No, not beyond that derived from his general knowledge in administrative work throughout the Presidency.

506. Then what is the necessity of going behind the Sanitary Board for further decision to a member of that Board?—The Government do not disagree on sanitary matters, of course, but you then come to the financial aspect, that is to say, who is to provide the money to work these different sanitary problems and sanitary measures. That must, I take it, rest with the Local Government; they have to provide the funds.

507. Does the Sanitary Board budget at the beginning of the year?—No, we do not budget.

508. You live from hand to mouth?—The Board outlines certain works which have to be done. The big works with which we are chiefly concerned run into lakhs of rupees; these are outlined at the beginning of the year; certain works have to be undertaken in the course of the year; when they get to anything like completion they go up, and provision is made on the financial side.

509. What do you mean by saying that when they arrive at completion the plans go up? I should have thought they would have gone up before the works were completed.—They take some time, because there are nearly always alternative designs for any of these big works in connection with drainage or water-supply; there are perhaps three or four different schemes; these are outlined, and the local bodies and the Government have to agree what particular scheme is feasible under the circumstances.

510. That you call outlining?—I call that outlining, because no definite orders have been passed.

511. Then having got your plans for your sanitary works, you then send your plans up to the Secretary in the Local and Municipal Department?—Yes.

512. Who is also a member of the Sanitary Board?—Yes.

513. Therefore one member of the Sanitary Board recommends to the Government either to accept or to reject the plans of his colleagues; is that the proceeding?—Yes.

514. Do you think that that is a good procedure?—In a way, yes, because he is thoroughly acquainted with what has gone on as regards plans and estimates, and so he is at home with the subject when it comes before Government.

515. He, of course, having received it as Municipal Secretary, refers it to the Financial Department?—Yes.

516. And the Financial Department decides then whether the money can be spent or not?—Yes.

517. And then who finally sanctions the expenditure?—Government eventually. When, we will say, an estimate for any big drainage works has been settled as to technical details, it is referred for the supervision of the technical details to the Department of Public Works—the Chief Engineer.

518. Then it goes round to another Department?—It has to go in that way for professional scrutiny of the plans.

519. Which the Sanitary Board is quite unable to give it?—Well, they have been advised by their professional adviser, viz., the Sanitary Engineer.

520. Then it goes from the Sanitary Engineer and in course of time finds its way to the criticism of another expert in the Public Works Department?—That is so.

521. Is there any other expert who has to be called in after these two gentlemen?—No, not after those two; but on sanitary lines the Sanitary Commissioner has expressed his views.

522. He has already intervened in the matter?—Yes; the Sanitary Commissioner and the Sanitary Engineer have been consulted on the sanitary problem.

523. Suppose some district or some municipality has to be drained or provided with sewage works; in that case the plan, I take it, originates with the municipality or with the District Board?—Yes.

524. Passing during that time under the inspection of their engineer?—Not necessarily. For instance, take Bellary, or any other town; it is decided that a water-work is necessary for that town; the proposal is sent up to Government in the ordinary way through the Local and Municipal Department.

525. Whom is it sent up by?—It is sent up by the Chairman of the municipality.

526. Have the Chairman of the municipality and his colleagues consulted their expert engineer?—They have hardly got an expert engineer; they have a Local Fund engineer, but for the municipality they may not even have that; the District Boards have an expert engineer.

527. You do not mean to tell me that the Chairman of a municipality is competent to frame a drainage scheme?—No.

528. Then who frames the drainage scheme to begin with?—First of all it is decided that it is advisable to undertake this work; then it is referred to the Sanitary Engineer and the Sanitary Commissioner; they consult; then their plan is outlined; as soon as it becomes tangible it is referred to the Sanitary Board.

529. Who also have an expert engineer?—There is no other expert engineer on the Sanitary Board.

530. One of the members of the Board is an engineer?—Yes.

531. Then he is the second expert who examines this scheme from the engineering point of view?—Yes.

532. It then goes from there to the Secretary of the Local and Municipal Department?—Yes.

533. Who then passes it on to the Finance Department?—Yes.

534. Who then pass it on to the Public Works Department?—Yes, for the ultimate revision.

535. There it receives a third engineering criticism?—There I must tell you this:—The Chief Engineer serves in a dual capacity also in this case. He is a member of the Sanitary Board.

536. The Chief Engineer examines it first of all as a member of the Sanitary Board, and then as a member of the Public Works Department?—Yes.

537. Does that seem to you a sound and economical procedure?—I do not think it adds to the cost.

538. It does to the delay?—Yes.

539. And do you not agree that time means money?—But I mean that no further charges are incurred.

540. Then what happens to this unfortunate scheme finally?—Then we have arrived at the final stage. After the Chief Engineer has expressed approval of the plans and estimates, the orders are passed in his department, the Public Works Department, as regards the carrying out of the scheme.

541. Then it goes back to the Financial Department?—No, it has already been sanctioned by the Financial Department.

542. Is it sanctioned by the Financial Department before it passes to the Public Works Department?—Yes.

543. So that the Financial Department passes it, whether it is a good scheme or not?—It has already been through the hands of two experts as it were, the Sanitary Engineer and the Sanitary Board, and therefore when it comes to that stage it is in fairly good working order; there may be small technical details, as to the strength of a girder or something of that sort, that may require revision from an engineering point of view.

544. But still the Financial Department have agreed to the cost before the final expert examination by the Public Works Department?—I would not like to say definitely whether a final formal reference is made in the Secretariat on that point.

545. Now have you any other powers in the Sanitary Board?—Not in the Sanitary Board.

546. That is enough for their exertions to cope with schemes in that way?—I think so. You then of course go into the financial question.

547. I take it that what you have told us about this supposititious scheme covers the whole of the relations of the Sanitary Department with the provincial Government; you have no power of decision at all, but you have power of recommendation?—That is so.

548. You have no power of decision?—No power of decision, but merely of recommendation.

549. Can you tell me anything about the relations of the Civil Surgeon to the Collector?—Either from the sanitary or the medical point of view are those relations satisfactory?—Yes, on the whole they are.

550. The executive authority lying with the Collector, he gives all the necessary support and assistance to the Civil Surgeon?—Yes.

551. And there is no unnecessary complication of decisions or orders?—No. As the head of a district, for instance, the Collector must sanction, on the recommendation of the Medical Officer, such a thing as privilege leave to the Medical Officers serving in the district. Therefore, as the head of the district, I do not think that needs alteration.

552. You think there is no unnecessary delay in carrying out orders that the Civil Surgeon may give?—No. The District Officers never interfere in purely professional matters.

553. I understand that there is a Director-General of the Medical Service in India?—Yes.

554. Is he also a Military Officer loaned to the Imperial Government?—Yes.

555. And he is loaned practically throughout the greater part of his career?—Yes, in the ordinary course of events he is in exactly a similar position to that in which he is in the different provinces, viz., that he has probably been in civil employment, as we call it, for the greater part of his service, and then he becomes a Colonel—a Principal Medical Officer—and then becomes Surgeon-General.

556. Will he have served as Surgeon-General under a provincial Government?—No.

557. When was this appointment created?—The constitution of the service was altered in 1880; then he was not called Director-General; I think it was in 1894 or 1896 that he was again called Director-General.

558. What I understand to be the position is this, that an officer who has not necessarily had experience as a Civil Medical Officer, and who certainly has not as a rule had experience as a Civil Officer in the higher grades, is selected by the Government of India to be Director-General of the Medical Services; is that, roughly speaking, the position?—No, not quite, because they have invariably had extensive experience on the civil side.

559. But not the highest?—Well, the highest of course is the Director-General's appointment itself, but leading up to the highest, yes. The present one is a good illustration.

560. Has he been Surgeon-General under a provincial Government?—No.

561.—That is what I mean; he has not had the experience of a Surgeon-General under a provincial Government.—No, he has not.

562. What are his relations to you?—As regards the administration of the Civil Medical Department in Madras, I do not consider that there is any necessity to adopt any measure that would alter the existing relations between the Director-General of the Indian Medical Service and the administrative Head of the provincial Medical Department—the Surgeon-General with the Government of Madras. The Local Government is supreme in all matters relating to the department, and reference is only made to the Director-General in questions connected with the grant of furlough to officers of the Indian Medical Service and the filling up of vacancies (caused by death, retirement, or leave) in the number of officers lent to the province for civil duty. The Director-General also supplies the Military Assistant Surgeons who, to the number of 22, are lent for civil work. The Director-General has the right to ask for any information he may require from the Surgeon-General with the Government of Madras, but the latter is not subordinate in any way to the Director-General, but is entirely under orders of the Local Government.

563. With regard to the grant of furlough, is that necessary because you draw all your officers from the Government of India?—Quite so.

564. And as long as you continue to have a central and not a provincial system, you must refer the question of furlough to the authority who is to supply you with the substitute?—Yes, in case a man is wanted.

565. Do you find that the Director-General tends in any way to interfere with the provincial Government?—No, not in the least.

566. Not in the way of giving orders?—Not in the least.

567. In this particular case, the papers of which have been laid before us, do you think that the Director-General in the matter of the control exercised by him over the officers of the Madras Civil Medical Department exceeded his functions?—Yes, technically he did.

568. And practically?—Well, I take it his view was that this was a purely professional matter which the Director-General and the Surgeon-General would know more about than anybody else.

569. Do you think that the direct correspondence between yourself and the Director-General saved or did not save time?—It probably saved time.

570. Now if that was constantly the practice of your department—if it became the general practice—do you think it would involve the provincial Government in difficulties?—I can imagine it might; it would depend upon the two officers concerned; you would have to take the personality of the men into consideration.

571. But a practice like that, once begun and continued without protest on the part of the provincial Government, might grow into a custom so strong that the provincial Government could not overthrow it?—They could always come down and say "please stop it," or without the "please" they could always tell them to stop it. The local Surgeon-General is under the orders of the provincial Government; they can pass orders to him.

572. And this direct correspondence with the Director-General you do not look upon as an infringement of that rule?—As I said, I think it was technically an infringement.

573. But practically you do not think any harm was done?—Practically, I do not think any harm resulted.

574. Then with regard to the second case that has been referred to, which relates to the selection of senior officers of the Indian Medical Service in civil employ for training in military medical administration; was that an instance where the Surgeon-General and Director-General corresponded directly with each other?—They did.

575. Was that, do you think, to the detriment of the provincial Government?—It would have added a little to the time, but it ought to have been sent through the provincial Government.

576. What department of the provincial Government are you under?—I am under all. In the Public Department I correspond with the Chief Secretary. Many matters come up in the Local and Municipal Department as well.

577. Do you correspond direct with the Chief Secretary?—Yes.

578. You do not correspond with the Under Secretary?—No; with the Chief Secretary.

579. Have you seen anything of the Sanitary Commissioner of the Government of India?—I have practically nothing to do with the Sanitary Commissioner of the Government of India.

580. Does any correspondence go on between your Sanitary Board and the Sanitary Commissioner?—None at all.

581. Has the Sanitary Commissioner ever been in Madras?—Yes, I know him; he has been here since his appointment was made.

582. Do you know at all what he did when he came here?—Yes, I am acquainted with what he did, because he came and called on me, and we discussed matters—really in connection with plague.

583. You think, as far as you can judge as a Medical Officer of experience, that the appointment is a good appointment?—The new appointment, undoubtedly.

584. You think that that would aid the Government of India in taking up sanitary questions?—Undoubtedly.

585. Is it better to have a Sanitary Commissioner with a conference say of the various Surgeons-General, or could a conference do the work of the Sanitary Commissioner?—I do not think a conference could do the work of the Sanitary Commissioner. On the other hand, I am not sure that as regards these particular questions a conference of the different heads is required. Personally, I do not see why the work cannot be equally well done without any conference of the Surgeons-General in India; there is only one other Surgeon-General, viz., the one in Bombay.

586. You think that an annual conference of these gentlemen could serve no useful purpose?—Yes, I do not think so.

587. Or at all events that such purpose as it might serve is served better by the Sanitary Commissioner of the Government of India?—Or could be served quite well by correspondence.

588. Does any correspondence take place between the Heads of the Medical Service in different Governments?—No, very little. Occasionally the Director-General sends round a general note regarding medical matters, as they affect India altogether. He may draw attention, when the various annual reports come before him, to different things that come up out of the reports.

589. And suppose you, as Surgeon-General here, take no notice of his suggestions or recommendations, what happens?—Well, that has not occurred. If one had reason to doubt the advice tendered, one would at once represent the matter.

590. Direct to him or to your Government?—It would probably be an important question, and would come through the Government; unless it was on a purely professional matter, such as the way in which a return of operations or something like that ought to be sent in.

591. Then, in your judgment, both the Director-General and the Sanitary Commissioner of the Government of India are good and necessary appointments?—Undoubtedly.

592. And they have rendered you service in your department?—It is not perhaps quite so easy to say that they have rendered the department any particular service, because I think I have stated already that the local administration is entirely independent.

593. Then in what way are these two appointments of use?—Take the Director-General: owing to the fact that it is one large Imperial Service for India, it is absolutely necessary that there shall be some central man, even if for no other purpose than to allocate the men to the different provinces.

594. Is it necessary that a person whose duty it is to allocate officers to the various Governments should be a Director-General? I should have thought a much less ambitious title would have been sufficient.—Then you come to another question as to the number of Surgeon-Generalships. There happen to be four; two in Bengal, one in Bombay, and one in Madras. I understood that you were thinking whether some central office might do that duty; that would mean of course the doing away of an appointment.

595. And the promotion which goes with that appointment?—Yes, it is the highest-paid appointment in the service.

596. I thought you told me a little while ago that these gentlemen who were at the head of the Service were practically not promoted to be Director-General?—No; they are not.

597. Therefore, if the office of Director-General were abolished, it would not affect the promotion of these Surgeons-General?—It would affect the promotion of all the men in Bengal.

598. I ask you whether it would affect the promotion of these Surgeons-General, the Heads of the Medical Service under provincial Governments?—No.

599. Then with regard to the Sanitary Commissioner; does the creation of that post affect promotion?—Yes; it has made another post with high pay.

600. Has the Sanitary Commissioner been of service to your Government here?—Yes.

601. In what way?—The point I have in mind is purely a professional one, viz., a most excellent report written by him in connection with jails and all the medical questions springing up from the treatment of prisoners.

602. Is there a Director-General of Jails?—There is an Inspector-General of Jails in each province.

603. But not of the Government of India?—I think not.

604. You did get, as a practical matter of fact, from this Sanitary Commissioner, some excellent advice concerning jails?—From the sanitary point of view, yes.

605. Do you know what the salary of the Sanitary Commissioner is?—The salary of the Sanitary Commissioner of India is Rs. 2,000; I forget whether it rises. The appointment from about 1880 was amalgamated with that of the Director-General; he was called the Surgeon-General and Sanitary Commissioner with the Government of India.

606. Now there is a separate appointment?—Yes; since 1904.

607. When did you get this valuable report on the sanitary condition of jails?—Last year.

608. Do you remember any other notable service that he has rendered to your department?—You mean in Madras itself?

609. Yes.—No, off-hand, I cannot say that I do.

610. I mean, is he generally useful?—I think the Government of India finds him useful.

611. I am not talking of the Government of India: I am talking of Madras.—I think you will have to ask that question of the Sanitary Commissioner; he will be able to tell you better.

612. So far as you are concerned as the Surgeon-General, you do not know of anything in particular that he has done for your department?—No; it does not concern me particularly.

613. (Sir Frederic Lely.) Can you tell us approximately how many hospitals and dispensaries there are in the Presidency?—610, including dispensaries.

614. There would be a few large civil hospitals?—Yes. Perhaps I may say that we here use the term "hospital" as those in which in-patients are treated; "dispensaries" as those in which out-patients are treated. We have about 267 institutions with in-patients, and the balance, up to 610, are dispensaries.

615. The great bulk of them would be rural institutions?—Yes.

616. In remote places many of them at a great distance from head-quarters?—Yes.

617. Some of them 50 miles or more away?—Perhaps if you said 40 miles it would come to about the limit.

618. The men in charge of these small rural institutions are of the grade of Hospital Assistants?—Yes; that is, in the dispensaries. The hospitals are nearly all in charge of men of the Civil Assistant Surgeon or Civil Apothecary grades.

619. And the rest are dispensaries?—Yes.

620. So that practically all dispensaries are under Hospital Assistants?—Yes.

621. Men of very limited education?—Well, we do not think so down here; we think that our Hospital Assistants up to recently have been the best trained in India.

622. Possibly that is not very extravagant praise?—It is not very extravagant.

623. Anyhow, you would not regard them as qualified medical practitioners in the European sense of the term?—Not in the European sense of the term.

624. What is their pay?—Their pay begins at Rs. 25. The question is now before the Government of India as to an increase of their pay. Rupees 25 is the pay in the fourth grade; it rises to Rs. 35, Rs. 45 and Rs. 55, and 10 per cent. of them are senior Hospital Assistants whose pay is Rs. 70. Then there are small allowances in addition.

625. What are the arrangements for supervising the work of these men?—They are supervised by the District Medical Officers.

*Surgeon-General

Browne.*

Surgeon-
General
W. R.
Browne.

23 Nov., 1907.

626. How do they exercise that supervision?—By visiting and inspecting and examining the books and looking at their work generally.

627. How often in the year would that supervision be exercised?—If possible, twice. In a large district like Madura, where there are some forty institutions, it is nearly impossible to get round twice a year.

628. Practically I suppose you may say that each one of these men is visited—can only make sure of being visited—once a year by the Civil Surgeon, who comes and looks over the building and the instruments and makes enquiries about the work, makes his return, and goes away again?—Yes.

629. In the case of a suspected murder in the locality, is the hospital assistant solely responsible for the post-mortem?—Solely.

630. That is, it practically lies with him to say whether the man has died of a blow, or whether a murder has been committed or not?—Quite so.

631. Is that not a very great responsibility for a man of that class?—Undoubtedly. I may say here that the Government have been good enough to acquiesce in a proposal of mine of sending as many men as I can spare for a course of post-scholastic training at the Medical College and General Hospital after their ninth year of service. As far as possible I restrict the control of dispensaries to men of the second grade. Then before they get promoted to that grade, I want to train as many as I can in the second course of training, with special reference to this very point of training for post-mortem examinations.

632. I take it it is not only a case of professional competence, but of moral reliability?—I think it is chiefly professional; of course, there have been instances of the other.

633. Do you recognise the duty or the right of the Head of the district to co-operate with you in supervising these men? For instance, to take a concrete case, suppose the Head of the district wrote to you and said: "I consider a certain man to be totally unfit for his place"—not professionally—that would be out of his sphere altogether—but morally unfit?—He might do that; that does occur occasionally.

634. Do you interfere as a matter of course then?—Undoubtedly.

635. You have had cases of that kind lately?—Yes, in my time.

636. Are they frequent?—No, not very; they are not frequent, but they have occurred.

637. Suppose the Head of a district thought a Medical Officer was unfit, and he wrote to you and you declined to take that view, would you recognise his right to demand an enquiry?—I cannot imagine myself declining to interfere. If for no other reason than to defend a man who might be wrongly accused of incompetence, I should take up the case and have it investigated through my District Medical Officer.

638. That is, you would send your District Medical Officer to enquire whether the opinion of the Head of the district was justified or not?—Yes.

639. If the Civil Surgeon thought that the Head of the district had interfered without reason, what then?—He would communicate with me, and I should take any further action that I considered necessary.

640. But the probability is that you would take your subordinate's view?—It would depend upon the evidence adduced in the first instance. If the man had made himself thoroughly unpopular for any reason and the evidence was quite clear, I should probably at once transfer the man to some other work. That I do constantly when it is called for.

641. You would not only receive the opinion of the Head of the district, but you would expect it of him?—Undoubtedly.

642. And then you would make your own departmental enquiry through the Civil Surgeon, and if you thought there was no occasion to intervene you would allow the matter to drop?—I would directly inform the District Officer concerned that in my opinion no further action was necessary, or the contrary.

643. (Mr Dutt.) Is there a Civil Surgeon in charge of every district here; is not the District Medical Officer generally a Civil Surgeon?—Our term down here is "District Medical and Sanitary Officer." We also have Civil Surgeons in a few places, but the 22 districts are provided with a District Medical and Sanitary Officer; emphasis is laid on that to show his dual duty.

644. They are generally members of the Indian Medical Service lent from that service?—Exactly.

645. What is the number of them in this province?—We have 54 sanctioned appointments.

646. I mean those that have belonged to the Indian Medical Service.—They number about 57 on the Civil List.

647. And what is the number of Assistant Surgeons approximately?—We have 22 Military Assistant Surgeons lent. We have Civil Assistant Surgeons and Civil Apothecaries.

648. I am not speaking of apothecaries now.—I will tell you the total strength; there are 677 Medical Subordinates, and there are 466 Hospital Assistants; that leaves us 211 approximately.

649. How are these Assistant Surgeons selected?—The Assistant Surgeons are all local graduates who enter the service by competitive examination. I fix the date when sufficient vacancies occur to render it necessary to have an examination.

650. Is the examination held annually?—According to circumstances. I have held three in the last 15 months.

651. But generally there is always one examination every year?—At least one.

652. What is the pay of the Assistant Surgeons?—The Assistant Surgeons begin at Rs. 100 and go on to Rs. 150 and Rs. 200.

653. And you consider them well qualified doctors in the European sense of the word?—The Assistant Surgeons undoubtedly are.

654. Are they in charge of some of the important hospitals and dispensaries?—Yes.

655. Whereas the least important ones are in charge of apothecaries?—Yes, and also of the Hospital Assistants. The selection I may say is left entirely to me; I select men for the different places according to my knowledge of their professional capability.

656. But Assistant Surgeons are always selected by means of competitive examination?—Quite; they must be graduates.

657. How are the apothecaries selected?—The apothecaries are now dying out. They were a class of men who were stipended by Government during their college career.

658. Did I understand you to suggest that there was a question pending about their pay?—That is with regard to the low grade Hospital Assistants who only begin at Rs. 25 a month.

659. We come to the Civil Hospital Assistants. What is the rule about their selection?—These Civil Hospital Assistants are men who pass a qualifying literary examination, and they are then stipended during their four years' course at the Medical College; they are examined every session by a Medical Board of Examiners, and they pass a final qualifying examination at the end of their fourth year; if they satisfy the examiners, their names are sent to me and I admit them into the service.

* 660. Supposing more names are sent to you than you want, do you keep them on your list?—I fix the number of men who are in the college.

661. Their pay is from Rs. 25 rising to Rs. 45?—Rupees 25 rising to Rs. 70.

662. Is any question pending as to their pay?—There is a question before the Government of India as to increasing, especially in the lower grades, the pay of these Hospital Assistants.

663. Has a specific recommendation been made as to the minimum pay of these Hospital Assistants—that the minimum should be so much?—It has been recommended that the minimum should be Rs. 30. I think the maximum is the same.

664. Are some of these Medical Officers paid by District Boards; are there any dispensaries and hospitals made over to District Boards in this province?—The great bulk of the institutions are paid by District Boards and municipalities.

665. And is the Medical Officer in charge of such hospitals and dispensaries paid by the District Board?—If he is a District Medical Officer, he is paid from provincial funds; he has nothing to do with the local funds.

666. The local funds never pay the District Medical Officer?—No, not the District Medical Officer.

667. But the subordinate Medical Officers?—They are paid locally.

668. Their service is lent to the District Boards, and they meet the cost?—Yes.

669. You said that, when privilege leave is granted to subordinate Medical Officers, the District Medical Officer generally does it with the sanction of the Collector?—The formal sanctioning authority is the Collector.

670. Those questions do not come up to you at all?—If necessary they might, because it might be necessary for me to send a man in his place to act for him.

671. But the Collector's sanction is considered sufficient?—Yes.

672. The cases are placed before the Collector by the District Medical Officer, and there is an end of it?—Exactly.

673. In reply to a question from the Chairman, you told us something about the Sanitary Commissioner of the Government of India and the Director-General of the Indian Medical Service. Formerly I understood there was only one officer?—Exactly; it was an amalgamation; he was Surgeon-General and Sanitary Commissioner with the Government of India.

674. And now the second officer has been created?—The duties have been split up, and two officers perform them now.

675. I understood you to say that so far as your duties were concerned, the Sanitary Commissioner's suggestions have not been of any particular use?—I do not want to "crab" the work of the Sanitary Commissioner with India. It is a recent appointment. As I said, I think that is a question that the Sanitary Commissioner here in Madras would be better able to speak about, because it does not concern me directly.

676. What is the length of service of the Surgeon-General with the Madras Government, and the Sanitary Commissioner with the Madras Government?—As regards length of service, the Surgeon-General, as a rule, is a good deal senior; it depends on circumstances. May I illustrate it from my own case? My service is 34½ years; the Sanitary Commissioner's service is 24 years; but until two years ago, when Colonel King was promoted to be Inspector-General in Burma, we were nearly co-equal in service, though not in rank; he was only one year my junior. It varies. Colonel King held it for years, until his turn for promotion to the administrative grades came.

677. He is not in any way subordinate to you?—The Sanitary Commissioner is in no way subordinate to me. When the reconstitution occurred in 1880 that was made quite clear.

678. Is there anything to prevent a senior officer being appointed Sanitary Commissioner and the Surgeon-General being junior to him in service; is it possible that a senior officer may be selected as Sanitary Commissioner?—Of course it is possible.

679. There is nothing to prevent it?—No, but it is very improbable.

680. The usual practice is the other way?—Quite so.

681. (Mr. Hitchens.) Is it the case that all the dispensaries in the districts are under the Local Boards?—Yes; of course we have provincial ones. For instance, almost all those in Madras City are provincial, and all the expenditure is defrayed directly by Government.

682. But in the districts?—Up-country they are all financed from local funds.

683. Who makes the appointments to the hospitals and dispensaries?—The appointments of the medical staff are made by me.

684. Has the District Board any voice?—None whatever; not as regards medical subordinates.

685. They find the money?—They find the money.

686. But what responsibility would the District Board have in regard to a hospital or a dispensary; would they have any responsibility?—None. They provide the funds for running the hospital or dispensary; I provide the staff. They have no direct responsibility beyond that. Of course, they have to finance it, and so the budgeting has to go to them for approval. The Local Medical Officer budgets all the wants of his institution, and that is passed by the Local Board.

687. But they do not interfere in any way—that is to say, they have not got a Hospital Visiting Committee?—Occasionally; in a few cases they have. If they wish they may appoint a Hospital Committee, and they do exist in certain places in the Presidency; but they are not common.

688. Do you find that they give valuable advice?—No.

689. You do not encourage the formation of such bodies?—Not in the mufassal; in some of the larger towns it would be advisable, or might be.

690. Even in the district, would not a local Committee bring to your notice any little grievance that they might have; for example, one of your subordinates might be rather imperious let us say; would they not be just the people to bring a matter of that kind to your notice?—I have no hesitation in saying that I get a great many complaints, anonymous and otherwise.

691. I am talking of a responsible report of a responsible body as opposed to anonymous communications?—I understand, but my experience is that in the smaller and more remote places in the Presidency these local Committees rather tend to unnecessarily interfere with hospital work, and do not aid in the efficient working of the institutions.

692. Are the dispensaries under the taluk Boards or under the District Boards, or under both?—Under certain circumstances they may be under the taluk or under the District Board; they are under both in some cases.

693. Are you brought into contact with the local authorities in any other way than through the hospitals and dispensaries?—No.

694. For example, in regard to vaccination?—No, in this province that is under the Sanitary Commissioner.

695. That is the only point of contact between you and the local authority?—That is the only one.

696. Your medical inspectors do not go into the villages to inspect for any purpose?—In certain districts here we have Sanitary Assistants who do the sanitary work; that is directly under the Sanitary Commissioner.

697. (Mr. Meyer.) I think you told us that the only hospitals directly maintained by Government are in Madras City itself; is that so?—We have a few others scattered through the Presidency. Take for example the Leper Asylum at Pallipattinam and a few others in the Presidency.

698. I am speaking of hospitals for general relief?—The great bulk are, of course, supplied by the local bodies.

Surgeon-General
W. R.
Broome.

23 Nov., 1907.

Surgeon-
General
W. R.
Browne.

699. Is there any place outside Madras where there are Government hospitals?—Yes, in the Agency Tracts.

700. Where there are no Local Boards?—Just so.

701. And at Ootacamund?—That is local, but largely subsidised by Government.

702. In the headquarters of a district if there was a municipal hospital, it would be a purely municipal institution?—Yes.

703. With a subscription possibly from the District Board?—Yes.

704. Outside in the rural areas they belong to the District Boards and the taluk Boards?—Yes.

705. Therefore your Medical Officers are practically serving under these local bodies, except District Surgeons?—That is so.

706. And therefore I take it that the reason that the Collector gives privilege leave to these persons is that he gives it, not as Collector, but as Head of the District Board?—Quite so; he is the head of the civil authority.

707. As the President of the District Board, has he any disciplinary authority?—Yes. He can fine a subordinate, but in those cases if it is on a professional matter it must be referred to me to see if I agree. Should I disagree with the punishment, I inform the Government to that effect, and then the decision I give is final.

708. That is to say, he would only fine a man for being late at hospital, or something like that?—He would probably reprimand him for being late.

709. What would he fine him for?—For absence without leave we will say, or some case where there was negligence in the administration of the hospital, such as being unnecessarily dirty, etc., or unduly late on many occasions; he would probably fine him for that.

710. As I understand, he could not make the fine valid—he could not recover the money, until it had gone up to you?—No, I must agree to it.

711. Do you happen to know whether this power of fining which is given to the District Board Presidents is confined to the Madras Presidency, or does it exist in other provinces?—I cannot tell you about other provinces.

712. Suppose the District Board President fines a Hospital Assistant and you do not agree, what happens then?—Then it is referred to Government, and their decision is final.

713. Has the Chairman of a municipality the same power?—Yes.

714. Ordinarily, the biggest hospital in the district would be in a municipality?—Yes.

715. And if it is at headquarters, it would be in charge of the District Surgeon?—Yes.

716. But as the District Surgeon travels a good deal, there would also be an Assistant Surgeon?—Yes.

717. Could the Chairman fine that Assistant Surgeon?—No, he could not fine the Assistant Surgeon.

718. It is only Hospital Assistants that he can fine?—The lower subordinates.

719. And in the same way with the District Board Presidents; they cannot deal with Assistant Surgeons?—The President of a District Board can deal with Assistant Surgeons. I should like to explain this: there is in each district an Assistant Surgeon told off, who is the special assistant to the District Medical Officer; the President of the District Board would not be able to fine him.

720. He is a provincial officer?—Yes.

721. You have other Assistant Surgeons who are gradually replacing your apothecaries?—Yes.

722. I am speaking of an Assistant Surgeon in a hospital belonging to a District Board; could the President of the Board fine him?—He could.

723. Then as regards provision for medical relief; do the District Boards send extracts from their budgets to you?—They do.

724. Then if you think they are spending too little—if they are not making hospitals enough and so on, you send your remarks to the provincial Government?—Exactly.

725. What happens then?—It is always a question of asking for more money. My point is that in this financial matter I can only advise that if possible more money should be spent on providing increased nursing, for instance, to a hospital; that is considered by the Board; if they have funds, they of course are only too willing to carry out the recommendation.

726. In making your recommendation, do you consider the financial position of the Board or the municipality, or do you simply say what you think ought to be done if they had the money?—I consider the financial position, because it is a mere waste of time recommending to a bankrupt municipality that they should largely increase their expenditure on hospitals.

727. Do you often have to differ from the budget provision made by municipalities or Boards?—Not often, for this reason; no increase can be entered in the budget, unless it has obtained previous sanction; and when they apply for previous sanction, it is sent to me by the Government for my remarks.

728. But I am speaking not of a case where the Board has proposed to increase the expenditure on medical relief, but of a case in which it does not propose to increase it and you think it should be increased?—In that case I should, in forwarding it, comment on the fact that it was insufficient.

729. Speaking generally, do you consider that, as a rule, the District Boards and municipalities do their best and that you have not to interfere much?—They do their best as far as their finances will permit them.

730. In case of a difference of opinion between you and a District Board, would it go back to the President for his opinion, or would the Government pass orders direct, or what?—I think the usual procedure is that Government would refer it; it goes through me to Government, and Government would send it back for the Board's reconsideration.

731. Have there been many cases in late years in which a District Board or a municipality has been over-ridden and your recommendation adopted?—No, very few.

732. Then we will take the other case that was in your mind. The District Board proposes to start more dispensaries or otherwise to increase the expenditure on medical relief. Do those proposals come to you for criticism?—They do.

733. And do you have to state whether you think a dispensary is necessary in such and such a place?—Exactly.

734. Are you also concerned with the estimates for the building?—Yes; I am also concerned, in smaller sums directly, and in bigger ones as a member of the Sanitary Board.

735. You said a little while ago that the Sanitary Commissioner was absolutely independent of you. Is that altogether the case? For instance, are you not the Head of the Medical Service in the province?—Yes.

736. Take a question of medical discipline. Suppose—if I may be allowed to put a purely hypothetical case—suppose some officer in the Sanitary Department had been accused of absolutely unprofessional conduct; would not that come to you as Head of the Medical Service?—If he was a medical subordinate, yes, but the Sanitary Commissioner has a large sanitary staff under him.

737. Are there not Deputy Sanitary Commissioners?—Yes.

738. Suppose there was any case referring to the future professional prospects or otherwise of the Deputy Sanitary Commissioner, would you not have to advise as the Head of the Medical Department?—It would come through me when he is in the Indian Medical Service.

739. Then is the Surgeon-General consulted, as to the selection of the Sanitary Commissioner?—Confidentially.

740. The Sanitary Board consists of yourself and the Chief Engineer to Government who is President, and the Secretary to the Local and Municipal Department?—Yes, three members.

741. The Sanitary Commissioner is not on the Board?—No, he is the sanitary adviser to the Board.

742. What is the general rule as to projects which have to come up to the Board; are they mostly from District Boards and municipalities?—Yes.

743. What sort of cases come up to the Board?—Everything of a large nature. The present drainage and water-supply at Madras, for instance, has been before the Board. All the large sanitary measures that are considered for the whole province come before the Sanitary Board.

744. Take the smaller cases; take the case of a dispensary. Would that come before the Board?—Yes, the expenditure of anything over Rs. 1,000.

745. The question of the expenditure of anything over Rs. 1,000 by a municipality or a District Board has to come before the Sanitary Board?—Yes.

746. Suppose they wanted to spend Rs. 1,500, would your Board have to approve the plans and so forth?—Yes.

747. In some cases do you refer back to them with advice, or does the case always go on to Government?—It must go through Government.

748. Would it not be possible for a District Board President or the Chairman of a municipality who was meditating some sanitary work to get a preliminary engineering estimate from the Sanitary Board, so that he could see what the design would cost, so that he would be able to consider it when he knew all about the scheme?—He could do that, but it would come through the official routine of Government; he does not address the Board direct.

749. But could he address the Sanitary Engineer or the Sanitary Commissioner?—Yes, he might ask for advice.

750. My point is how far do you act as advisers to the District Board; you say they do not come to you for advice except very indirectly?—Indirectly; I take it we are advisers all the time, but they do not communicate directly; it is not the usual official channel.

751. Then how does the case come before the Sanitary Board; it has been referred by the municipality to the Government, and the Government refers it to the Sanitary Board for their criticism; is that it?—Yes.

752. As a Sanitary Board, you simply consider what would be best from the sanitary point of view; you do not trouble about the finance of it?—We do in this way. There may be three different schemes. Take the case of Berham-pur; there were three different schemes that we considered; we ultimately decided, partly for finance and partly for sanitary reasons, as to which was the most feasible scheme.

753. Would the bulk of your schemes belong to municipalities?—Municipalities and District Boards.

754. There is very little work which comes direct from Government, although Government may contribute?—Not much from Government.

755. Then you think it is advantageous that you should do over again the work that the Sanitary Commissioner and the Sanitary Engineer have done?—Well, we criticise and determine what should be done.

756. (Chairman.) You said "determine." In answer to a question of mine, you said you had no power of decision?—Well, we cannot determine eventually that any particular plan shall be carried out, because it invariably hinges on the financial question.

757. (Mr. Meyer.) It is a matter that I have had put to me when I was serving in this province and otherwise, that sometimes the Sanitary Board adopted, if I may say so, counsels of perfection; that it works upon model plans that are really beyond the means of a necessitous municipality. Should you say that there was any truth in that accusation?—It is an accusation that is easy to make. On the whole, I think, we try to exercise as much common sense as we possess, and, on the whole, I should say the accusation is not true.

758. If a municipality cannot afford to have first-class latrines, you would let them have second class?—I should always consider that half a loaf is better than no bread.

759. Then with reference to the Government of India. You say that the Director-General of the Indian Medical Service has never been in medical charge of a province. Is that quite accurate?—Did I say never? I was thinking of the recent appointment. I see no reason why the Inspector-General of Hospitals in Bengal, for instance, could not be promoted to be Director-General.

760. Here in Madras and Bombay you have got Surgeons-General; in the other provinces you have Inspectors-General, but their functions are precisely the same?—As far as I know, they are precisely the same.

761. Is there any reason why the Director-General of the Indian Medical Service should not have been a Surgeon-General of Madras or Bombay?—There is. It was a question of policy decided years ago. It is necessary, in order to equalise the number of the highest administrative appointments for the whole of the Indian Medical Service, to have two Surgeons-General that will fall to the lot of the Bengal men, one to Bombay and one to Madras.

762. But are you not speaking of the time before the Indian Medical Service was amalgamated? You are all one Service now?—True, but we are still told off to different provinces.

763. But in theory would there be anything to prevent a Surgeon-General in Bombay becoming Director-General?—Not eventually; not after the men who have joined the Service before 1896 are provided for; there will not be in the distant future.

764. But apart from Madras and Bombay, the Director-General of the Indian Medical Service has generally had experience as an Inspector-General of a province in Northern India?—I cannot remember exactly what their former experience has been; I was thinking of the present Director-General.

765. Was not Surgeon-General Franklin in the Punjab as Inspector-General of Hospitals?—Yes, I think he was. Those points do not come before one in any way. I personally only speak from my general knowledge of what has happened to men in the Service.

766. Now you say that in medical matters the Madras Government is practically supreme here; is that quite the case? Is it not the fact that general lines of medical policy are laid down by the Government of India? Take the question of the reorganisation of the Hospital Assistant Service even for India as a whole; would the general lines not be laid down by the Government of India?—Quite so, if the Service was treated impartially, but I was holding chiefly in my mind our Assistant Surgeons and our Apothecaries. They are not exactly the same as they are in other provinces; they have grown up in course of time, and have developed on local conditions.

767. But are they not being amalgamated now?—Yes. The tendency is to adopt a general policy as regards these Services all over India; that is the tendency undoubtedly, but what I meant in Surgeon-General.

W. R.
Browne.

General

Browne.

saying that the Local Government was supreme was that they dispose of them in every way; the men act under their orders, and they can enrol them and dismiss them without any further reference.

768. Take again a matter like the policy dealing with plague; that is surely a matter for the Supreme Government?—I presume you know that the local policy has differed here from that of almost any other province in India.

769. As plague does not respect provincial boundaries, in the last resort the Government of India must decide what the general plague measures must be? It may, no doubt, make allowance for the different circumstances in different provinces?—No doubt.

770. There are functions of that sort that might rest, or do rest at any rate, with the Central Government?—Yes. May I say that they have not directly interfered with the local policy.

771. But if they thought that the local policy was wrong and injudicious, I suppose they might have interfered?—I suppose so.

772. Suppose (if I may put a purely hypothetical case) that the plague policy in some province had been such as to provoke serious political discontent, would not the Government of India be justified in intervening?—I think so undoubtedly.

773. The Government of India having these powers in regard to general medical administration, ought they not to have an expert officer of their own of the highest possible rank to advise them, such as the present Director-General?—I certainly consider it advisable. Let me just say that I did not mean to outline the duties of the Director-General; I was merely thinking of him in connection with the local medical administration here.

774. He is the officer of the Government of India in matters that come to it on all medical subjects?—Quite so.

775. And he ought to be the best man available in the Service?—Yes.

776. There was a reference made to some correspondence about Netley, in which you said there had been a technical infraction of orders. When did that take place?—That was in 1900.

777. That was a long time ago; has there been anything of the sort since?—There is a subsequent one of 1903.

778. That relates to the selection of senior officers of the Indian Medical Service in civil employ for training in Indian medical administration. There is a difference there, I think. In 1900, as far as I can recollect, the Government of India admitted that their officer was wrong, and they apologised. In 1903, I think they said their officer was right?—I think that is so.

779. Therefore although the Government of Madras thought that the action of the Director-General in corresponding with you was wrong, the Government of India did not think so?—That is so as regards this last instance.

780. And it saved time?—Perhaps it did.

781. Suppose the thing had been done as the Madras Government wished, it would have gone from the Government of India to the Madras Government, then to you, then back to the Government of Madras, then to the Government of India, and then to the Director-General of Indian Medical Service; am I correct in that?—But have you not omitted the military—is there not a further stage?

782. True; it would have gone to the Head of the Army Medical Department and to the Military Supply Department of the Government of India, and so on?—Quite so.

783. That was saved by a direct demi-official correspondence between yourself and the Director-General of the Indian Medical Service?—Quite so.

784. As to the Sanitary Commissioner: as you have brought out, he is only a new appointment as a separate officer; he used to be Director-General of the Indian Medical Service?—Yes, it was a combined appointment.

785. Suppose the provincial Government embarked on a large sanitary scheme, would that not have to go to the Government of India for approval, under financial rules?—I am not thoroughly well up in the financial rules. Surely that would depend upon whether they wanted to borrow money or not.

786. I was thinking of a financial rule which says that public works costing more than 12½ lakhs must go up for the approval of the Secretary of State?—That is so.

787. Then it may be a question of the Madras Municipality, say, being desirous to borrow money for sanitary works, and for that borrowing, I think, the sanction of the Government of India is necessary?—I think so.

788. Do you think it is advantageous for the Government of India to have an officer of their own whom they can send down here to give an outside opinion as to how matters stand?—I think in all large sanitary matters it might be advisable that they should have their own special man.

789. Who would look at it from the point of view of experience in other provinces, and so on?—Exactly.

790. Therefore you think it is a decided gain?—I think so.

791. (Sir Steyning Edgerley.) How do you recruit your service?—When vacancies occur, we apply through the Government of India to the Home Department, who refer the matter to the Director-General, and he consults with the Principal Medical Officer in India, and on their conjoint nomination a man is placed at the disposal of the Provincial Government.

792. The whole reserve, I understand, remains with India?—That is so.

793. Theoretically, you have got no voice in choosing A, B, or C; you have to take whomsoever they send you?—Theoretically; they objected to our asking for men years ago; they preferred our not asking.

794. So that if you happen to have a special appointment and you know that A B is a very good man for it, you cannot ask for A B to be appointed?—Theoretically, no.

795. (Chairman.) And practically?—I have done so.

796. Did you get what you wanted?—We should get it, if possible. My point was that they did not ask that we should not ask for men by name; they said that it might be inconvenient; but certainly I have not always strictly adhered to that.

797. (Sir Steyning Edgerley.) About what stage of service do they come in?—The average is about five years; they must spend two years in military service.

798. What becomes of the three years when they are not necessarily military?—They are continuously doing military service.

799. Are there many young men under five years' service in the Madras Presidency?—Do you mean in civil employ?

800. No, in military; do you happen to know what is done with them up to five years' service?—They are kept with regiments.

801. In sole charge, or attached?—It varies. They are nearly always in sole charge, acting.

802. When they first come out, is that so too?—When they first come out, the first thing they do is to attach them to a station hospital, and then as vacancies occur in regiments they are drafted to act.

803. How many would there be in a station hospital?—The station hospital is, of course, a purely military thing and for British troops.

804. But how many of these young officers might there be?—When the first batch comes out, there may be four or five or six temporarily attached to that station hospital. I think in the last list I got there was at Bangalore a batch of half-a-dozen.

805. Do you not think you might be lent some of these young men for a short time; would it be

Surgeon-General
W. R.
Browne.

23 Nov., 1907.

advantageous to them to serve in a civil hospital for a time?—That is a policy that has often been discussed; I personally think it would be advantageous.

806. For the civil administration, you get no help at all from the young reserve men?—No.

807. Then they come into the Civil Department, and they are confirmed there?—Yes.

808. After that, subject to a liability to military service, they never go back until they reach administrative rank?—They never go back, unless of course an unfavourable report is submitted and they are withdrawn; they can be reverted, but the process is rather an elaborate one.

809. It has to be a very bad case?—Exactly.

810. The first stage in promotion to the Administrative Medical Officer's stage is that these officers are put on what is called a selected list?—That is so. That is done while they are still in civil employ.

811. Who does that?—The Director-General.

812. What does he know about the men?—He gets annual confidential reports.

813. He does not know the men personally?—He may not know the men personally; the chances are he does not, but he has confidential reports from both sides.

814. It is all paper so far as he is concerned?—Quite.

815. When you come to special appointments, for instance college appointments, professional teaching appointments, have you difficulty in getting the Professors you want for your colleges?—That of course rests with the Director of Public Instruction, and the Surgeon-General; they are supposed to consult as to the men whom it is advisable to nominate. Here the college appointments are directly under the Director as regards the professorial chairs.

816. The Director must come to you as regards medical knowledge?—Quite so.

817. And under this system of recruitment do you find a difficulty in getting first-class men for the college?—Do you mean the original recruitment for the Indian Medical Service?

818. Let us say a Professor of Surgery goes away; do you find any difficulty in filling his place with a really first-class man?—I should make a selection from the men I know here serving in the province.

819. Suppose you know a man outside your Presidency, and you do not think you have a quite good enough man in civil employ inside the Presidency?—In that case, of course, the present system would stand very much in the way.

820. Are the Chemical Examiners under you?—No.

821. The Examiners for the Pasteur Institute, I mean?—The Chemical Examiner is not directly under me; he sends his reports to me.

822. Is he under the Sanitary Commissioner?—No, he is directly under the Government of Madras.

823. The Pasteur Institute at Coonoor you mean?—That is under me. That is of course a special thing; it is demi-private, and I am the President of it; I am President of the Central Committee.

824. It is a private institution?—Largely subsidised by Government.

825. Is a Government officer in charge?—Yes.

826. Then the King Institute?—That is under the Sanitary Commissioner.

827. As between the provincial Government and the Central Government, do you think that the work of research and enquiry in these big institutions is better managed by the provincial Government or by the Central Government?—Shall we take the King Institute as a case in point?

828. Yes, we have a similar institute in Bombay. I was thinking of the bacteriological laboratories; is it better that they should look to you for everything, or that they should look to a man who could co-ordinate better with regard to the other institutions?—I think on the whole it is better worked locally.

829. You think it is better that they should be under provincial management?—I think so.

830. In the interests of research?—Yes; because they will be able to get their wants more readily attended to, we will say, by not having to go through the longer process of appealing to India.

831. Do you think they would get money more easily?—That of course depends—judging from my experience here—upon the financial condition of Government.

832. I suppose you talk over these things with the Director-General when he comes round?—Yes.

833. Do you find that you get it more easily in Madras than in other provinces?—No, I doubt if we do.

834. Then I put it to you that it would be in the interests of research that they should be under the Imperial Government?—I was not thinking of the financial side of the question; if that is the only point, I think it would be better to have one central policy.

835. Now looking at the fact that your officers come to you for a permanency, and practically remain with you permanently, what benefit have you got out of the unification of the service in 1896?—I am not sure whether I can say that we have obtained any direct benefit.

836. I should say that it has simply tied things up in a knot and lessened your freedom; do you think that is so?—To alter it would mean a change in the whole policy of the Service.

837. That is not an argument, if you will excuse my saying so?—I know; it is not an easy question to answer directly.

838. You have been 34 years in the Presidency, and this change has occurred in the last ten years. Do you consider it is a change for the better or for the worse in the management of the department in the Presidency?—I do not think it has had any great influence as regards the civil administration beyond doing away with the reserve that in the old days existed.

839. That is a disadvantage?—That is a disadvantage; it is more cumbersome now to get men.

840. I suppose when the reserve was available for use, the liability to military service was exactly the same on occasion arising?—Exactly the same.

841. As to the change to an imperial reserve, do you happen to know whether there was any practical administrative reason for it, or was it simply a consequence of the unification of the department?—I think it was merely the latter.

842. You do not think that they have secured any great advantage from it?—I do not think so.

843. Your Civil Medical Officer in the district is the Head, in the district limits, both of the medical administration under you and of the sanitary work too?—Yes.

844. He serves two masters?—You may put it in that way.

845. Do you find that that ever causes any difficulty?—Yes.

846. You do not think it is a good system?—It has caused difficulty. It caused difficulty with the former Sanitary Commissioner, because he thought the men were not doing enough sanitary work and were doing too much medical work.

847. Do you think it would improve matters if the Sanitary Commissioner, being as a rule a considerably junior officer, were in a measure subordinate to the other?—It would not affect that other question; it would not relieve the District Medical and Sanitary Officer in any way.

848. I was thinking at the moment whether, supposing you were a Surgeon-General with a Deputy Surgeon-General for sanitary duties that would probably work more smoothly than amalgamating the work in the districts and then placing it under two distinct heads?—Personally, I think that if one or two or three Deputy Surgeons-General worked under the Surgeon-General, it would conduce to improving matters considerably.

General

849. Now the Civil Surgeon has to tour a great deal to see to all these subordinate things; in the meanwhile what happens at the hospital?—That is the reason that the Assistant to the District Medical and Sanitary Officer has been created in this province, and he is left in charge; he is a medical graduate, and the selection of these men is carefully gone into and they are very good men.

850. You do not consider them the equal of a Civil Surgeon?—No.

851. So that for a time the hospital is deprived of the services of the Civil Surgeon or of an officer equal to the Civil Surgeon?—That is so. That point actually came out upon one occasion, when the Sanitary Commissioner found that the men were not going out into the district sufficiently for sanitary work.

852. How long do they tour in the year as rule?—Our districts vary a great deal.

853. Would they be away two months in the year?—Quite.

854. Three months?—Hardly that; I should say between two and three months.

855. So that for nearly a quarter of a year your big hospital at headquarters is deprived of the services of the Civil Surgeon?—Yes, of course they are not necessarily all away at one time; that would make a great difference.

856. Then, is the Civil Medical Officer overloaded with routine work?—He has a great deal of routine work.

857. What sort of establishment has he?—He generally has two or three clerks—two or three writers—serving under him.

858. Getting 30 or 40 or 50 rupees?—Not so much; they run up to Rs. 40.

859. He has no head-writer?—No.

860. He has got to do the work personally, or almost personally?—Yes, he is supposed to do it and has to do it.

861. So that with the hospital and the sanitary work he has got a good load?—Quite a good load.

862. Does the Assistant Surgeon act as a sort of superintendent in the office, or help in the office?—I think not, as a rule; when he is at headquarters the Civil Surgeon does the office work himself.

863. The Assistant takes it up whenever the Civil Surgeon goes on tour?—Yes.

864. Then he will know nothing about the work?—He very quickly picks up the routine work.

865. (Chairman.) There was a question raised with regard to the Government of India considering the question of raising the pay of Hospital Assistants?—I believe so.

866. Who finds the money to pay these Assistants?—When they are lent to local bodies, the local bodies find the funds. Otherwise, provincial funds.

867. So that the Government of India are now considering the question of raising the pay of persons paid, not from their revenues, but from local or provincial revenues?—Yes.

868. What is the reason of that?—Eventually they come on the pension list; that is not paid by the local bodies but by the provincial Government. Of course, I do not like to state that that is the view held; I merely point it out.

869. At all events it is one of the financial reasons?—Quite so.

870. Who finds the money for the provincial Medical Service?—Is that raised from provincial rates or from provincial funds generally?—From general provincial funds.

871. Or is there a special sum assigned by the Government of India for medical services in the provinces?—So far as I know, no special sum is assigned by India.

872. It only comes within the general financial settlement?—That is all.

873. With regard to appeals from the decision of the Collector, you said that appeals might be made in the case of fines and so forth; how far can those appeals be carried?—To Government.

874. From the Collector to whom?—To me. That is to say, an appeal would lie from the decision of the Collector to the Surgeon-General.

875. Direct to him, or through some intermediate channel first of all?—The subordinate concerned would send it through his immediate superior.

876. The Hospital Assistant, for instance, is fined by the Collector; to whom does the appeal go?—He appeals to me through the Medical Officer.

877. Not to the Medical Officer, but through him?—Yes.

878. He says: "I have been fined by the Collector, and I desire to lay my case before the Surgeon-General"?—Yes, and he sends it up to the Surgeon-General.

879. Does the Surgeon-General decide?—No.

880. Who does?—Government.

881. Who is Government?—In that case probably the Secretary in the Local and Municipal Department.

882. What does he know about such establishments?—He would have the papers before him.

883. Would not the Surgeon-General have the whole case before him?—Of course.

884. But he is not allowed the decision?—No.

885. He has to apply to the Secretary in the Local and Municipal Department?—Yes, to get the orders of Government.

886. And the Secretary of the Local and Municipal Department knows nothing about the case, save as it is presented to him on paper?—Exactly.

887. Does the Secretary of the Local and Municipal Department actually decide, or does it go to the Council, or is there an appeal, if the Secretary of the Local and Municipal Department decides the matter, to the Council?—It goes first of all to the Secretary; then in any matter of importance it is the Member of the Council who has that portfolio who is communicated with.

888. There is no power of decision on the part of the Surgeon-General or on the part of the Secretary of the Local and Municipal Department, but the appeal has to be carried to the Member in Council?—Yes.

889. Does he decide that as a question of departmental procedure, or does he actually take it to Council?—I cannot tell you.

890. Do you think that this lengthy process of appeal is desirable?—Of course it is necessary to remember that these are the cases in which there is a difference of opinion.

891. Between the person who is convicted and the person who makes the decision?—And also between the Surgeon-General and the Collector.

892. You did not tell me that?—I think so. I was wanting to bring that point out quite clearly—that in case of a difference of opinion between the Collector and the Surgeon-General, the ultimate decision rests with the Government. Should the Surgeon-General agree with the Collector, there is an end of the matter; he simply sends it back.

893. Then there is no further appeal if you agree?—Not if we agree.

894. If you do not agree you go through the process you have described?—We go through the process I have described of getting the decision of Government on the matter.

895. What is the pay of the Surgeon-General?—Rs. 2,500.

896. What is the utmost fine that can be inflicted by the Collector upon a Hospital Assistant?—The limit is Rs. 5 for Hospital Assistants; Rs. 10 for Assistant Surgeons; then of course a bigger fine still is suspension.

Surgeon-General
W. R.
Browne.

23 Nov., 1907.

897. I am talking about fines, not suspension. —Suspension practically is a very severe fine.

898. Do you not think that an officer who is working for the Government at a salary of Rs. 2,500 a month is capable of deciding whether a man ought or ought not to be fined the sum of Rs. 10?—Yes.

899. You think that an official filling the post that you now hold ought to be sufficiently responsible to settle a case of that kind?—I certainly think so.

900. Do you get many of these cases?—No, not many.

901. Would you tell me how many departments of Government the medical budget submitted by a municipality or a District Board would have to go through? It comes up to you first of all?—Yes. It passes through me to the Secretary in the Local and Municipal Department.

902. What does he do with it?—I am afraid I cannot tell you the exact procedure in the Secretariat.

903. Does it pass to another department?—I am not clear as to that.

904. Has the Director-General of the Indian Medical Service ever intervened in the conduct of medical affairs in Madras? He has on small points, such as sending a particular officer to Netley or something like that, but on the large questions of medical administration has he ever effectually and beneficially intervened?—He has not directly intervened in any of the administrative work done in the Presidency; but, for instance, a very instructive report, as long ago as 1896, was sent round by Surgeon-General Clegghorn, who was then Director-General, on the total medical work performed throughout India. That is a case in point. He was the only one who would be able to issue such a general report, and it was very instructive.

905. That was eleven years ago?—Yes. It occurred to me just now, because it was a particularly instructive report and I saw it just recently.

906. Could that kind of report and the suggestions that went with it have been equally satisfactorily done by an officer specially deputed from time to time by the Government of India—a Government officer of high rank?—A specially selected officer you mean?

907. Yes.—Yes, I presume it could, but, underlying that, one is always supposed to keep in view the fact that the Director-General is a specially selected officer, and his views are probably those of a large and wide scope.

908. I would ask you to put yourself in the position of conceiving, not that there is a practice in existence which must be continued, but a new practice which would have to be instituted, viz., whether it would be better to have an officer perpetually in existence like the Director-General, or, in order to give the advice which provincial Governments might require, whether it might be as well, and more economical, to have from time to time a special officer selected and deputed for the purpose of making suggestions to the provincial Governments.—Do I understand you to mean as a temporary measure?

909. I am referring to an officer temporarily selected and replacing a permanent officer.—It would be a feasible plan; I am not altogether prepared to say that it would be a better plan.

910. You prefer the permanent Director-General?—I think so.

911. You said in the case of large sanitary works requiring reference to the Government of India entailing the expenditure of over 12½ lakhs, it was advisable for the Government to have a Sanitary Commissioner who could comment on or criticise the proposal. Does the Sanitary Commissioner ever come and look at such a work?—His appointment has only been recently started.

912. Two years ago?—Yes. I do not think he has visited Madras during that time.

913. During that time perhaps the Government of Madras has never made application in respect of such works, and the Sanitary Commissioner has never been called upon to criticise any proposals?—No, I do not think it has.

914. You said that there was a difficulty in reverting officers from civil to military service if they were unsatisfactory; has that been found to be of considerable detriment to the Civil Surgeons?—I could not say of considerable detriment.

915. Has it been detrimental?—No, I am happy to say that such cases do not often occur.

916. Suppose you had an absolutely free hand in discharging these officers, would you have exercised that power of discharge more frequently than you exercise the present power of applying to revert officers?—I should.

917. Therefore, you are now keeping in your service officers who, if you had a free hand, you would have got rid of?—Exactly.

918. I do not want the names, of course, but are there several such?—Yes, there are several.

919. To that extent, therefore, the centralization of administration is not a satisfactory feature?—It is hardly a question of centralization; it is a question between the Military Department and the Civil Department. The Military Department has hedged the process of reverting men to military service with very considerable difficulties.

920. In fact, they have landed you with all their bad hats?—Well, they do not want to get them back very naturally.

921. Since the centralization of 1896 has your correspondence with the Government of India increased very much, or has it kept stationary?—I think it is fairly stationary; there would be some little increase, but not enough to trouble my office greatly.

922. (Sir Steyning Edgerley.) You said it was an advantage to the Government of India to send down an officer who could examine a matter and make a separate report to them, and that the Director-General was useful from that point of view. That means that after an officer such as yourself has advised the provincial Government, and the provincial Government has considered the question with all their local knowledge, you think that it is not an inconvenience that an outside officer who has very little local experience should come down and report separately on the top of that?—Did your question arise out of these large sanitary problems?

923. Take any big question that has gone up to the Government of India through the provincial Government. Do you think it is an advantage that the channel of report and advice to the Government of India should be duplicated by an officer who simply comes down and visits the place?—My answer I think was founded upon whether eventually there was to be one general policy adopted throughout India.

924. You mean that, having got the officer, they could send him down to any place to see to anything?—Yes. I cannot conceive that it is a great advantage if it is purely a local question, but so many of these things tend to become important questions for India generally.

925. They do under the present administration, because it is centralized?—Certainly.

926. But there is no inherent necessity that they should go outside the province?—No, I think there is no inherent necessity.

927. Do you not think that it is likely to produce considerable difficulty between the provincial Government and the Government of India, if the Director-General comes down and differs strongly on a scheme from the provincial Government?—Yes, it is likely to cause difficulty.

928. Then you said again (this is a different illustration of the same thing) that the Director-General

Surgeon-
General
W. R.
Browne.

23 Nov., 1907.

sometimes circulates a note, and that you possibly act on it; and if you disagree with it, you then call in the provincial Government to represent matters; so that really if you yourself agree with it and do not call in the provincial Government, the provincial Government may be left entirely outside.—True, but the provincial Government would of course be cognisant of it, because it would not probably come direct, but it would come through them in the ordinary official routine.

929. Do you think there is any tendency among officers recently to look to the Director-General in matters of personal promotion and so forth, rather than to their own Government?—Am I to understand you to mean promotion to the administrative grades?

930. Possibly. Do you think it weakens their sense of being tied to the provincial Government and being under their control?—All appointments, as apart from promotion to different ranks, are in the gift of the provincial Government.

931. Under the selected list?—No; that is on the road to the administrative appointments; from those selected men the administrative officers are taken.

932. Quite so, but do you not think that the very fact that they have to depend upon the Director-General for entrance into the selected list has some effect in making them look to the Director-General rather than to the provincial Government?—Naturally it would have some effect.

933. (Chairman.) I still do not understand what the selected list is?—Officers are selected from the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel for higher pay, and from them the promotions to the administrative grade are made.

934. And appointments to the selected list are made by the Director-General?—By the Director-General in consultation with the Military Surgeon-General who is called officially the Principal Medical Officer in India.

935. And are you, under whom these officers are serving, not consulted (in the case of the Madras officers) as to whether they should or should not be placed on the selected list?—Probably it is on my reports that the selection is made.

936. But only probably?—In this way: they are selected from the record of their service; the record of their service is made up chiefly from the annual confidential reports made about them. I make these annual confidential reports, together with the opinion of the provincial Government which is also expressed, and they are filed in the Director-General's office.

937. Once on the list can they be moved from province to province?—When they are promoted from the selected list to the administrative grade—the rank of Colonel—they can go to any part of India.

938. With regard to the Superintendents of lunatic asylums, who appoint these now?—The provincial Government, on the recommendation of the Surgeon-General.

939. Is it proposed that these appointments should be in future made by the Government of India?—I have not heard so. I take it that if there were to be one general list, the appointments would be made by the Government of India. I can illustrate it by the case of the Chemical Examiners. In recent years they keep a separate list of men suitable for the appointment of Chemical Examiner; that has to be centralized of course.

940. But in the case of these Superintendents of lunatic asylums, ought they to be centralized?—It depends upon the question of specialisation. If you have specialisation, it is better to have it centralized, as you are likely then to get men to go in for special study. The off-chance of a man becoming a Superintendent down here in the future is probably comparatively small. Therefore, unless his study is likely to lead to such an appointment, he is not likely to take up the study of mental diseases especially.

941. I suppose, taking India all over, the competition to obtain such appointments would be equally great in all provinces?—I suppose it would; they are not favourite appointments.

942. Therefore, the throwing open to a man of the possibility of such an appointment in some other province would really open to him no greater career than is now already open to him in his own province?—No; but if he had specialised in mental diseases, he would be more likely to put that to practical use by being appointed to an asylum somewhere else.

943. Would there not be an equal number of people in other provinces also specialists in mental diseases?—There might be.

944. Therefore the openings would be no greater if the department were centralized?—We find I think in the special appointments that they do tend to be greater. For instance, take the Chemical Examiners; although other men may be appointed, still there is a greater chance of a man being appointed Chemical Examiner if there is a separate special list made and the man is upon that list.

(The witness withdrew.)

The Hon. Mr. H. BRADLEY was recalled and further examined.

The Hon.
Mr. H.
Bradley.

23 Nov., 1907.

945. (Sir Steyning Edgerley.) You said in answer to the Chairman that Government can refer questions for consideration to the full Board of Revenue, and that any member can consult any other member about a matter in his subject. Have you got any rules in the Board which render consultation regarding certain subjects obligatory?—Yes, there are certain subjects that are obligatory—the Court of Wards, the taking over of estates, and things of that kind.

946. Can the Land Revenue member run the whole of that subject?—Certainly.

947. If he chooses to consider himself strong enough, he need not consult anybody?—He need not, except on the particular things that are sent for the consideration of the whole Board.

948. I take it that they tour more or less about three or four months in the year?—Personally, I used to tour about three months in the year, sometimes more; I have been away for seven weeks at a time.

949. Do you divide the Presidency up, or do you go where the work happens to call?—At the time the work happens to come, but there is a rule that every district in the Presidency shall be visited by at least one member of the Board during the year.

950. How long would you stay when you visit a district?—It entirely depends on what the work may be. The Settlement Member stays a very long time in a district where a settlement is going on.

951. Is there one annual obligatory visit?—There is nothing laid down, but as a matter of fact nearly every district is visited three or four times by different members. Personally I have been to as many as fifteen districts in a year, and I know that the late Settlement Member went in one year to nearly every district in the Presidency.

952. The result is that you think the whole of the Presidency is thoroughly inspected in the course of the year by the Board?—Yes.

953. Then as to financial separation between the Government of India and the provincial Government. Your idea is that you would not try to separate the shared heads of revenue any further; but assuming that the Madras Government shared them up to 550 lakhs, or whatever it may be, you would simply give them a complete disposal and control of that 550 lakhs?—Subject to the budget.

954. You would not try to get a complete separation of the revenues?—I do not think so.

955. In your Presidency I understand you have got no Revenue Code at all? There is a manual, but there is no Act of the Legislature?—There is no single Act; there is a Madras Code.

956. Passed by the Legislature?—Partly by the Government of India. The whole Code contains all the Revenue Acts in force in the Presidency.

957. You have got no Land Revenue Code?—No, we have Board's Standing Orders, but no single Land Revenue Code.

958. Your revenue is managed under a Code of rules which can be altered at the pleasure of the Government?—To some extent. I do not go so far as to say that they can be altered at the pleasure of the Government.

959. In either forests or land revenue administration is there any control exercised by the Government of India at all?—I think we are practically free in that way, except as regards the control of the different Directors under the Government of India.

960. Are there any Directors?—I think in Forests there is a Director.

961. But for land revenue?—Not for land revenue; I am speaking generally of Collectors' work.

962. I am speaking of land revenue alone?—We are practically free.

963. Still the Government of India, vis-a-vis the Secretary of State, would hold themselves responsible for what goes on in the province?—I suppose so; I really cannot tell what the Secretary of State would do.

964. But they are responsible for the whole of the administration?—I believe so.

965. And I suppose in many cases the Madras Government is responsible to the Government of India for many things about which they know nothing whatever?—They are responsible for everything that happens.

966. The work is divided up, and a great deal of what they are responsible for they never see?—Certainly in a way. I mean they cannot tell what is going on at the bottom of the ladder. They never see a village account.

967. Take an enquiry into a crime in a district by the Superintendent of Police; they know nothing about it?—Not unless it is a special crime.

968. Would you say then that in protecting your own interests in the matter of collecting the revenue under a shared head you had adequate motive, and the Government of India had a sufficient guarantee that you would protect their interests too?—Yes, under shared heads.

969. The point I was trying to come to was that really there was no more reason that they should know about that matter than there was why they should know about your revenue administration, in which they have a technical responsibility for administrative control?—Exactly.

970. If the work was so divided, they could get on very well?—Quite so.

971. Would you say that that was equally true of expenditure? Will it be necessary for the Government of India to make all expenditure provincial, and slightly to alter the proportion of receipts?—I do not think it would be possible to make all the expenditure provincial.

972. Why not?—Take the Customs.

973. That is an imperial department. I am talking of the shared heads?—I think it would be possible certainly.

974. For instance, you share forest expenditure and revenue half and half?—I think forest revenue is a fourth now.

975. Whatever it is, it is a certain proportion. Suppose it is half and half, and suppose that the Government of India's share of the expenditure represents one-eighth of the gross receipts; is there any necessity, on the ground of economy and guarantee of the Government of India getting their revenue, to divide it into eighths and call three-eighths imperial and five-eighths provincial?—I think not; I think they ought to be content with the guarantee which a responsible Government gives.

976. They would be, I suppose, nominally safer if they did that?—I do not think so. I think the men could be relied upon to do their work and do their duty.

977. You were inclined to think that the Government of India should do the whole of the borrowing?—I think so.

978. Does that apply to what we may call small rupee loans for particular works?—Do you mean local works?

979. Suppose you want to spend money on some locally needed work that you cannot meet out of your balances, say 30 or 40 lakhs: would not the local loan tap capital that would never go to a Government of India loan?—I cannot say.

980. Then as to pensions: you thought that the provincial Government might devolve powers to sanction pensions up to Rs. 100 (that is the Madras Government's recommendation), providing that the claim to pension was clear and in conformity with rule; but suppose it is clear and in conformity with rule, what is the object of the hundred rupee test?—The hundred rupee pensions generally are pensions of men whose pay is not immediately under Government; it might be much larger without doing any harm, but at the same time, as a rule, the hundred rupee test will cover most of the appointments that are under District Officers, under the Board of Revenue, and so on.

981. The tahsildars?—Many tahsildars are paid Rs. 175 and Rs. 150.

982. Does the Board of Revenue appoint the tahsildars?—Not exactly; they are appointed by the Board, through the Collector; they are recommended by the Collector.

983. But, assuming that you pre-suppose conformity to rules, no question as to the amount of pension arises?—It does not matter how you take it; the higher you go, the number of cases decreases; and if you put it up to Rs. 300, it would not very much decrease the amount of correspondence which would be saved.

984. It would pro tanto decrease work?—It would increase the number, but the number of pensions between Rs. 100 and Rs. 200 is very much smaller than between Rs. 20 and Rs. 100.

985. We went into a number of questions about these lists under the headings "Delegation of Powers to Local Governments" and "Delegation of Powers to Heads of Departments." Do you think it would be a safe principle to say that if a power was delegated by the Central Government to the provincial Government, or by the provincial Government to the Board of Revenue or some other authority, the authority which receives the delegation might be trusted and left free to exercise the power in the way that seemed best to it?—To a certain extent; I would not go down very low.

986. You would go to the Head of the district?—In many cases—to a certain extent.

987. If he is fit to have the power, I suggest that the easiest principle is that he should be allowed to say how he will use it; do you agree with that?—Yes, you must draw the line somewhere.

988. If you give a man power, he is either fit for it or he is not fit for it?—Yes, you should not give it to him, unless he is fit for it.

989. And if he is fit, it is no use prescribing all sorts of limitations as to how he should use the power?—I quite agree.

990. Some of these delegations that are mentioned are delegations under Acts, for any alteration of which legislation would be necessary?—Yes.

991. Have you ever looked at Bombay Act V. of 1868?—Yes.

992. Do you think that that would be the best way of tackling a subject of that sort, or should it be by a specific amendment?—I would not try a specific amendment; I think there would be too many. I think an Act of that kind would be likely to be very useful.

The Hon
Mr. H.
Bradley.

23 Nov., 1907

*The Hon.
Mr. H.
Bradley.*

23 Nov., 1907.

993. Specific amendments would mean constant legislation concurrently with evolution?—Yes.

994. Do you see any objection to a general Act?—No.

995. Have you got any illustration in the Madras Presidency about general powers of that sort?—I do not think there is any Act exactly analogous to it.

996. For instance, we have got another provision of law in the Bombay Presidency, Section 11 of our Land Revenue Code, by which a Collector, subject to appeal and revision, can devolve the whole of his powers under the Code to an Assistant Collector and practically make him a Collector for his sub-division. Have you anything of that sort?—Yes, we have an Act of much the same sort; it gives a Sub-Collector in his own division all the powers of a Collector subject to certain slight conditions.

997. Can you give me the number of that Act?—Regulation VII. of 1828.

998. Would it be difficult to give us figures for three years, say 1887, 1897 and 1907, which would illustrate the growth of the Secretariat?—I do not know about the earlier years; we could give you figures to illustrate it.

999. Now you said that there were certain rules limiting appeals in Madras?—There are the Government of India Memorial Rules, and similar rules referring to memorials to the Government of Madras.

1000. Do they limit you administratively?—They enable you not to send on a memorial from certain persons who have already had their cases disposed of on appeal by certain intermediate authorities. Of course the appeal still lies to the Government of India, if they choose to call for the memorial.

1001. Would it be possible, or advantageous, to require in the case of any appeal a certificate that there were fair grounds of appeal?—That would be possible of course; it might be advantageous in some cases, but I do not think it would be advantageous altogether.

1002. Take the case of an appeal above a Collector?—I think it might be sound to introduce something of the sort, but I do not think I should allow a tahsildar, for instance, to certify that there should not be an appeal against his decision.

1003. The granting of that certificate you would limit practically to a Collector?—Yes, perhaps a Sub-Collector might be allowed to do it.

1004. Then as to these Inspectors-General: which of the departments do you deal with?—The Financial, Public, Political, Ecclesiastical, Marine—those are the principal ones.

1005. What Inspectors-General do you come in contact with?—The Sanitary Commissioner with the Government of India, the Surgeon-General with the Government of India, the Director of Archaeology, the Controller of Printing and Stationery—there may be one or two more.

1006. As to the control of printing, there is a document which has been sent to us; is there any objection to that going upon the record of the Commission?—I think not.

1007. May we understand that the Madras Government consider that the suggestions which the Superintendent of the press makes regarding the Controller are more or less well founded?—Yes.

1008. And may we take it that it is more or less approved by the Government?—Yes, that is what it is intended to be.

1009. And may we do the same as to the note about the Director of Archaeology?—Yes. So far we have had very little from the Director of Archaeology. Recently, he wrote to the Assistant (who is Epigraphist here) asking him to ask the Government of Madras to take on a full-time photographer for his work. The matter is not disposed of yet, but I do not think the Government of Madras is entirely convinced of the necessity of a full-time photographer. It does not come as a suggestion to the Government of Madras that they should employ such a man, but it is an instruction to the Epigraphist who is under the Government of Madras that he should address the Government of Madras and suggest an appointment which will be paid for as provincial. I am merely putting this forward as an example; we have not yet ascertained whether it is necessary that this appointment should be made, but it is an example of what occurs.

1010. Does the circle of your Superintendent of Archaeology here go beyond the Presidency?—I believe not; I know we had to give him special directions to go up the other day to Mysore to meet the Director, as that is out of his range.

1011. Looking at the class of work done by the Superintendent, do you think it is work that should be under the direction of the provincial Government or the Central Government?—I think it might be very desirable that the provincial Government should have something to do with it, because it affects temples and things of that sort; and if a man who was not conversant with what was going on in the district were to give instructions for something to be done to a temple, it might raise dissatisfaction amongst the people who worship at the temple.

1012. Then may I take it you think printing presses ought to be provincial?—I certainly think the local press ought to be provincial.

1013. You would not go to it as you would go into a shop and say: "I want this done for me," and leave the business with the Controller?—I think it would cause an immense amount of trouble and correspondence.

1014. Now the Government of India say that they want this help occasionally on questions that come before them. What do you consider are the proper functions of an Inspector-General in the Government of India who has to deal with work that is primarily administered by provincial Governments?—As far as provincial Governments are concerned, merely to advise.

1015. To advise whom?—The provincial Government.

1016. Directly?—Through the Government of India; I do not consider that he ought to advise the local Heads of Departments.

1017. Take it that he comes down here on tour and goes about the province and sees things of which he knows the technical side probably quite well, although he may not know all the local factors; do you think it better that he should take that information away and give it to the Government of India, or might he not give it direct to the provincial Government?—I think he might give it to the provincial Government.

1018. Does he do so at present?—I have not had anything personally to do with any of these Inspectors-General.

1019. When they leave the Presidency you do not receive any notes from them saying "I shall have to bring all this before the Government of India"?—So far, I have not seen any.

1020. They go away, and the first you hear of it probably is some request from the Government of India for an improvement?—Some request from the Government of India. We do not even hear what it is founded upon very often; it may be founded upon this visit, or it may be founded upon something else.

1021. And it might be a matter that you would have been only too glad to know about?—Certainly.

1022. I suppose you would say with regard to the Inspector-General or expert officer or whatever you may like to call him—the Sanitary Commissioner and so forth—that research and enquiry is a fair subject for him to deal with. Take the Director-General of Agriculture; I suppose experiment and research would be a perfectly legitimate activity there?—Yes, I should not allow him to interfere in a similar institution if there was one in the Presidency, except in the form of giving advice; he should not give orders.

1023. I suppose it would be a very good thing if he circulated notes and leaflets in the province; that would be useful?—Certainly.

1024. So that so far he would be beneficial?—Certainly.

1025. Then he would advise the Government of India in cases that came before them?—Yes.

1026. That would be another perfectly legitimate function?—Yes.

1027. And lastly, he might consult and advise the provincial Governments?—Certainly.

1028. To do that, he must tour freely and consult people in the various districts?—Yes.

1029. Do you think it is necessary to enable him to do that, that he should correspond?—Yes in matters within his powers and all that kind of thing, but he should not give orders behind the back of the Government.

1030. Several of these expert advisers of the Government of India are also allowed to correspond as to statistics and departmental rules, and it is not a very clearly defined sphere?—Quite so.

1031. We have had instances given where the sphere is not clearly defined. Do you think that any of that correspondence is necessary at all?—I cannot say whether it is necessary; I do not know enough about the statistics that are called for.

1032. You would limit it severely?—I would limit it as far as possible. I know that some of these officers have called for statistics that are very difficult to prepare, and have given much trouble.

1033. Do you think that the correspondence grows?—Certainly, and very frequently it passes to an order.

1034. Take the reverse side of the shield; does it tend to make the provincial officer look past his own Government?—Yes.

1035. Can you give us any instance of that?—Yes. At the King Institute here an officer was placed on special duty (Captain Patton) under the Sanitary Commissioner with the Government of India, under Captain Christophers, who is under the Madras Government. The Madras Government wanted Captain Patton to assist the Sanitary Commissioner, and Captain Christophers considered that it was his duty to apply to the Sanitary Commissioner with the Government of India before he could allow Captain Patton to assist the Sanitary Commissioner here. The Sanitary Commissioner's work was delayed two or three days by what Captain Christophers thought was the necessity for this reference.

1036. Then I take it that the two risks of these expert advisers of the Government of India, unless they are properly limited, are partly the tendency to encroach on the provincial Government, and partly the tendency to weaken the control of the provincial Government over their officers?—Yes, and of course there is increased correspondence.

1037. If they do not report to the Government of India, how are the Government of India to know what goes on?—They get administration reports every year, and they have printed copies of all important orders of the Government of Madras.

1038. Would you consider that the information which one of these officers carries away to the Government of India is likely to be rather more really living information about what goes on in the province than the information received from the provincial Government?—I cannot express an opinion; I do not know the officers; I think it depends upon the men.

1039. Suppose you have reported, as a Government, after enquiry here, and the Government of India call upon the Inspector-General to advise them; suppose for that purpose he happens to come down and forms his own opinion, which is opposed diametrically as to facts to that of the provincial Government?—I think his report would be very mischievous. I do not think that an Inspector-General who is ignorant of the Presidency, could by his enquiries during the short time of his stay in the Presidency possibly get at facts better than the report of the provincial Government based upon information that has been gathered for years.

1040. You would not call it really living information?—I think not.

1041. Of course the Government of Madras gets it from the men who have served for years in the Presidency?—Men who are living in the Presidency, and who have been able to observe the facts for a long time.

1042. Do you think it possible that any one officer could go to all the provinces and extract material which would be in any way equal to that supplied by the experience of men who have been 20 and 25 years in a particular province?—Decidedly not.

1043. Do you think the 25 years' man is a safer guide?—Yes, I consider that the man who has been 25 or 30 years in the Presidency is a much safer guide than a man who is sent to the Presidency for a smaller number of days.

1044. Do you not think there is a tendency for the Government of India to be misled in that way?—I think there is.

1045. Then you practically come to direct administration by the Government of India on the advice of the Inspector-General; that is a risk?—Yes, that is a risk of course, unless the Inspector-General comes from the particular province that he is advising about.

1046. Even so, they are acting upon his advice, and not on the advice of the provincial Government?—Just so.

1047. And to give that advice has been the function of the provincial Government, ever since government by a system of Local Governments has been introduced?—Yes.

1048. I suppose we may take this from the Government of Madras too, that in one instance they were told that this central officer was the agent to carry out the orders of the Government of India?—Yes.

1049. That was entirely a new departure?—Yes.

1050. That is ousting the Local Government so far as it goes?—Yes.

1051. I may take it that that is a statement by the Government of Madras?—Yes.

1052. Do you think that if the Inspectors-General were really kept to simple advice and research and experiment and the circulation of information, they might be extremely useful?—Yes.

1053. It is only where they go outside that sphere that danger at once crops up of disturbing the functional relations of the Government of India and the provincial Government, and of the provincial Government and its subordinates?—Yes.

1054. It is apt to upset the co-ordination that should exist?—Yes.

1055. (Mr. Meyer.) I think you rather gave us, though no doubt unintentionally, the impression that the work of the Sub-Divisional Officer was confined to revenue collection and magisterial work; is that so?—I think I also mentioned rent recovery suits.

1056. Do not his functions go beyond that? Take the jamabandi. I should say that is revenue.

1057. Would you describe the jamabandi system to us?—The jamabandi is this: Every year the Divisional Officer, or the officer appointed to do the jamabandi, makes a progress through the taluk that he is holding the jamabandi of, and, at camps fixed beforehand, he receives the village officers and their accounts for a certain portion of the taluk. Those are all thoroughly overhauled and examined, and there are brought before him statements showing the proposed remissions and the proposed transfers of holdings and many other details on which he passes orders with regard to those villages for which he has given notice to the raiyats that they may appear before him and receive orders in these sorts of cases. Every case of remission of revenue under wet irrigation works comes before him at the time, and he passes orders upon them; many points are reserved for jamabandi, in order that they may be disposed of with more or less publicity when the villagers are about, and this process goes on until the whole of a district has been examined in this way by the Sub-Divisional Officer. The Collector takes every taluk in the district in turn within each five years, and his overhauling is more complete because his establishment is larger than that of the Sub-Divisional Officer.

1058. Then in addition to the work that comes up once for all at jamabandi, the Sub-Divisional Officer has a great deal of work in the course of the year in dealing with a succession of pattas of transfers?—Yes.

1059. Then, he had to deal with darkhasts?—Yes. An application may be made for a piece of raiyatwari land which is unoccupied at the time; a man who wishes to have possession of it for cultivation puts in an application for it, notice of which is given in the village, and if no objection is taken it is granted to that man, subject to the payment of revenue, for as long as he chooses to hold it. Darkhasts are disposed of from time to time, and many are disposed of at jamabandi.

1060. The Sub-Divisional Officer also deals with the occupation of lands without cultivation?—Those are mainly dealt with at jamabandi; these are all revenue matters.

1061. The Sub-Divisional Officer has a great deal to do with other matters beyond the collection of revenue?—Exactly.

1062. Has he not a good deal of work in connection with village establishments?—Yes.

1063. Village establishments in Madras are hereditary generally?—Some are hereditary.

1064. Would you kindly explain, in the case of hereditary village officers, how the succession is managed?—It generally goes to the man's nearest heir, who is sufficiently well acquainted to perform the duties of the office. If there is a dispute, it comes before the Divisional Officer under an Act of about 1831, and inquiry is made into it.

1065. The Chairman, in questioning you yesterday about appeals, spoke about the double line of appeals, one, departmental appeals, and the other, appeals as to suits. Is it not the case that as the old regulation of 1831 was at one time interpreted by the Madras Government that sort of thing did go on in Madras?—I have never had a case; it has never been in force in any district in which I have served as a Divisional Officer.

1066. In what districts have you served?—South Canara.

1067. Are village officers hereditary?—They are, in a way, hereditary in South Canara, but in my time there was no settlement. I have never tried a suit myself under that Act.

1068. Is it not the fact that this large number of appeals in the case of hereditary village officers has been reduced very considerably of late years?—An attempt was made to reduce them.

1069. You have not dealt with them as a Member of the Board?—I have not dealt with them as a Member of the Board for a good many years.

1070. Can you tell us whether they go up to Government at all?—I think you had better ask the Revenue Secretary as to that; I have not got to deal with them.

1071. Then in the case of famine, the Sub-Divisional Officer would take a large part?—Certainly.

1072. And besides this work that all belongs to revenue in the broad sense of the term, he also presides over a taluk Board?—Certainly one; he may even have more than one.

1073. Are there any sub-divisions in which there is more than one taluk Board?—I have known some; but as a rule there is only one for each division.

1074. The Divisional Officer is the responsible authority over them?—Yes.

1075. What is his position in respect of the municipalities in his division?—Sometimes he is Chairman, sometimes a member, sometimes not even a member.

1076. Is he always an ex-officio member?—I think not; I think you will find the Divisional Officer is sometimes not a member of outlying municipalities which are away from divisional headquarters.

1077. He is not entitled to attend?—Any one is entitled to attend.

1078. But you do not think he is an ex-officio member?—I think not always.

1079. Suppose there is control to be exercised over the municipality by the Government; does he exercise it in the first place? For instance, does the municipal budget pass through him in the first instance?—Yes, as a rule.

1080. And suppose there is some grievance about neglecting sanitation?—That might be done by the Collector too; the Collector may take action himself if he observes it himself.

1081. Generally the Sub-Divisional Officer is largely responsible for the efficiency of municipal administration within his sub-division?—Yes and for the taluk Board.

1082. He is also, I think, ex-officio a member of the District Board?—Yes.

1083. Now, taking the work of the Collector, speaking generally—I think there has been one small exception—a Collector in Madras has no direct charge of the sub-division of a district?—I believe not.

1084. There is one exception, I think, in the Nilgiri district?—I think there is also another instance in Travancore. As a general rule, he has no direct administration.

1085. Taking it altogether, the work of a District Officer—as the work is generally understood in Northern India—is done primarily by a Sub-Divisional Officer; you call him the Divisional Officer here?—I am not quite sure of the bearing of your question.

1086. Each Divisional Officer as you call them has his own part of the district?—Yes.

1087. He has his own headquarters?—Yes.

1088. I think I am right in saying that he cannot leave his division without the Collector's permission?—Yes; he comes in to District Board meetings and so forth.

1089. On duty, but otherwise he cannot?—No, of course not.

1090. In all matters affecting the Collector's relations with the people in revenue matters, is the first application not to the Divisional Officer?—When the Collector is in a village he receives many direct petitions himself when he is travelling, but ordinarily the person nearest to the raiyat is the Sub-Divisional Officer.

1091. The Collector has no direct charge, and as a general rule there is an appeal to the Collector from the acts of the Sub-Divisional Officer?—Yes.

1092. Then as you were saying just now, the Collector takes a certain part of the jamabandi each year; by that means he is brought into direct contact with the villagers?—Yes. Not less than once in five years.

1093. And he also tours about the district?—Yes.

1094. Might you not say in a way that, although you have got no Commissioners in Madras, the Collector has, to a certain extent, developed into the place of a Commissioner?—I have no experience of Commissioners, but I know that a Collector who is a strong man has great control over his district—probably far closer than could be possible with a Commissioner.

1095. You have travelled in provinces where there are Commissioners?—Yes, but I saw none of their work.

1096. You have not studied their administration?—No, not on the spot.

1097. Are you prepared to say whether the Collector of Madras, owing to the absence of Commissioners, is a bigger man than the Collector of other provinces?—I should say decidedly bigger than those I have seen in other provinces, but to a great extent that is because his charge is a much larger one.

1098. And also owing to the sub-divisional system. In Northern India you are aware that there are few Sub-Divisional Assistants, and the Collector is in direct charge?—Yes, but the districts are very small, and he is able to be in direct charge for that reason.

1099. You said yesterday that the Collector has almost complete power in his district. Is that so? What about the Public Works Department?—The Public Works Department is practically independent of the Collector in regard to works of public utility, irrigation and so on; in irrigation the orders as regards the raiyats are passed chiefly by the Divisional Officers and the Collector.

1100. Has the Collector any control over the Public Works Engineer?—No real control.

1101. Does he see the Public Works budget relating to his district?—I think he does—he ought to. He can see it.

1102. Does he as a rule?—I always saw it as a rule; I always knew what works were sanctioned in my district.

1103. In your experience as Collector, supposing you wanted a particular tank repaired, did you find that there was any difficulty raised by the Public Works Department?—I did.

1104. That they refused to do it?—I do not say that they refused to do it, but they went to the highest authority, and I was ridden off very often.

1105. Am I correct in saying that in regard to minor tanks they are under the Collector altogether?—Some are. It is difficult to define the words "minor tanks," but certain channels and certain tanks are under the Collector.

1106. And the important irrigation channels and so on are under the Public Works Department?—Just so.

1107. Your experience is that the Collector has not quite sufficient power there?—Yes.

1108. Suppose for instance you desired that certain tracts should receive water, and the District Engineer said he had not enough water to let down; he would have the best of it?—He would be able to ride me off; he could easily do it by delay; he would say: "All right, I will make a reference to the Superintending Engineer," and it would be too late to do it by the time the reference got through.

1109. Is it desirable that the Collector should have control over the Public Works?—Yes.

1110. How would you arrange that?—The thing has not come within practical politics so far.

1111. Then the district forest officer; how does he stand with the Collector?—So far as I am concerned, I have always had everything I wanted done by the district forest officer.

1112. The Collector is the Head in matters which affect the forests?—Yes.

1113. And when it comes to technical forestry, the forest officer is under the Conservator?—Yes.

1114. Have you found friction with the district forest officer under that double relation?—I have never had friction of any kind. I was in a particularly favourable position, because I was district forest officer myself for some years in addition to being Divisional Officer in the early part of my service.

1115. You think that that is generally a satisfactory arrangement?—As far as I have seen it, the arrangement is satisfactory.

1116. Would you advocate having a similar arrangement for the Public Works, making the Public Works Engineer Assistant to the Collector?—I think it might be useful; but it is a matter that requires very much consideration.

1117. Naturally, but, speaking generally, you would advocate it?—Speaking generally, I think it would be an improvement on the present system.

1118. Do you think the Collector has sufficient control of the salt and excise?—I think the Collector, if he chooses, can have sufficient control.

1119. Have you read the report of the Excise Committee?—I have not read it since I last came to India; I saw it at home.

1120. It was a strong Committee, consisting of representatives of each of the provinces, presided over by Sir James Thomson, a Madras officer. Do you remember that the Committee reported that in Madras the Collectors had too little control over the working of the Excise Department?—I do not remember the exact details, but I think there was an idea of that kind. I do not think the accusation was made generally against all Collectors. It is a considerable time since I read the report.

1121. You have been for some time Commissioner for Salt and Excise, and you have gone round the districts. What is your view? If the Collector has not sufficient power, was it the fault of the system or the fault of the Collector?—I think it was the fault of the Collector.

1122. Take preventive work. You have a special preventive establishment consisting of inspectors and other people, headed by Assistant Commissioners and so on; would they be subject to the interference of the Collector with their work?—I think they would; it entirely depends upon the individual.

1123. You would make the relation of the local Excise Officer to the Collector the same as the relation of the District Superintendent of Police to him?—I do not think there would be any objection.

1124. At the present moment in many cases the Collector has a better control over an excise man than he has over the police?—In some places; it entirely depends, I think, on the Collector.

1125. You spoke of the Collector yesterday as being the Head of the police?—Technically he is the Head of the police: he is supposed to be responsible for the peace of the district, and the District Superintendent is supposed to consult him in all important matters, and to send his diaries to him and keep him in touch with what is going on in the district.

1126. Does he interfere with the actual discipline of the police at all?—No.

1127. Does he interfere in case-work? The ordinary case goes by territorial jurisdiction?—Yes, it goes to the magistrate having the jurisdiction.

1128. The District Magistrate has the power of taking a case from one magistrate and giving it to another?—Yes.

1129. Does he exercise that power often?—No.

1130. When he does, on what ground does he exercise the power?—I think there may be many grounds; he does it because he thinks it is advisable that the case should be tried by another magistrate than the one who happens to be the territorial magistrate, or, sometimes, when the territorial magistrate has not sufficient power to deal with the case.

1131. Would a case be removed from one magistrate to another because the Superintendent of Police thought that he would be more likely to get a conviction from one magistrate than from another?—I should be very much surprised if any District Magistrate did that sort of thing here.

1132. You spoke of tahsildars being relieved from magisterial work. Is that the case in all taluks?—No. It depends whether there is a stationary magistrate for the taluk or not; in the majority of cases he is relieved, but there are cases where he still has to do the work.

1133. You spoke of deputy tahsildars. Are there not two classes of deputy tahsildars?—Yes, there is the stationary class, and the deputy tahsildar who has a deputy tahsildar's charge as revenue officer.

1134. Is there not a class of deputy tahsildars directly under the Divisional Officer?—You are speaking of zamindari tracts; yes.

1135. Then there is a class subordinate to the tahsildar?—Yes.

1136. You mentioned in regard to village officers that they have petty magisterial powers?—I do not think I mentioned it, but it is a fact.

1137. You said that they had criminal powers; have they not also civil powers?—Yes.

1138. Can you give us any idea of the extent of these powers?—One power is to imprison a man for six hours in the village stocks and to confine him in the choultry. They have power to try cases of assault and petty thefts to the value of one rupee, also to try petty civil cases.

1139. Does it often happen that a petty case of that sort, which might be disposed of by a village magistrate or a village judge, is taken by the complainant or by the defendant to a regular officer of Government?—Do you mean after or before the plaint.

1140. Before?—I think it does happen.

1141. The village headman is called a munsiff for civil work, and a village magistrate for criminal work?—Yes.

1142. Is the village munsiff really trusted by the people?—It depends upon the man; some are, and some are not.

1143. Would you be in favour of giving them larger powers, and so to relieve the other Courts?—I do not think so.

1144. Why not?—Not as a single individual; I would be prepared to give larger powers to village Benches.

1145. You mean a sort of panchayat?—We have village Benches in a few cases now; they have been introduced in certain places.

1146. Your answer, I gather, is that you would like to see village Benches, both civil and criminal, for the disposal of civil and criminal cases?—I do not say I should like to see them; but if there is to be an increase of powers, I should prefer a village Bench to giving the power to the munsiff.

1147. But you would not give it to either as a matter of choice?—I should not. I think it is better that cases should be tried in a proper Court in the proper manner.

1148. But it would be an advantage for the people to be able to get their cases disposed of in their own village and under the pressure of public opinion such as may exist there?—Within limits, yes.

1149. You do not think that that outweighs the superiority of the deputy tahsildar over the district munsiff. You think it is better for a man to have to go 20 miles off, rather than to get his case disposed of in his own place?—In some cases; it entirely depends upon the nature of the case.

1150. You mentioned yesterday that the Board of Revenue had no financial powers?—I really do not think I said so; I think there has been a mistake made.

1151. What you meant was, I understand, that it had no powers to deal with the provincial budget?—Yes; in that sense it has no financial power; it passes estimates and things of that sort that come up to certain sums.

1152. It uses the executive machinery, but not with regard to financial questions, except those relating to establishments and so on?—Quite so.

1153. It has no connection either with local and municipal work?—None.

1154. Sir Steyning Edgerley asked you about the Madras Codes. There are several Acts bearing upon the collection of revenue in Madras?—Yes.

1155. Will you mention some of them?—The Rent Recovery Act; the Revenue Recovery Act; the Abkari Act; and the Forest Act.

1156. In addition to these there are what are known as the Board's Standing Orders?—Yes.

1157. Those are what you might call a Departmental Code regulating the duties of officials?—Yes.

1158. In some provinces everything is put into the form of a law and rules under the law; would you consider that an advantage?—I think we get on very well as we are.

1159. It gives you a greater elasticity?—I think so.

1160. You are able to alter your procedure without having to invoke the legislative machinery?—As far as I can judge it gives us greater elasticity.

1161. As far as I gather, you want the provincial Government to have full power to spend within its own budget?—Yes; not absolutely full power—power to spend within its own budget its provincial funds.

1162. Its budget is made up of provincial and local funds?—Provincial and local and imperial.

1163. But taking that portion which is assigned by the provincial financial settlement to the Local Government, you desire that the Local Government should have an absolutely free hand in spending it?—After the budget is passed.

1164. Has the Government of India a free hand in dealing with imperial revenue?—The Government of India of course has not a free hand in certain matters.

1165. Are you not aware that the Secretary of State exercises considerable control over the Government of India?—Certainly.

1166. Do you desire to give the Madras Government higher power than the Government of India itself possesses?—The Government of India would control the budget.

1167. But you objected yesterday to the Government of India controlling the budget?—I think there has been a mistake about that.

1168. You say now that you do not desire an absolutely free hand in the disposal of your revenues; is that it?—Quite so.

1169. You recognise that the Secretary of State imposes certain restrictions on grounds of public policy over the Government of India, and the Government of India must impose certain restrictions over the provincial Government?—Yes.

1170. You would not for instance allow a provincial Government to double the pay of the members of the Civil Service in its province, because they had the money to do so?—No.

1171. You agree that there must be a general control by the Government of India?—Yes.

1172. Also you are aware that the Secretary of State and the Government of India are responsible to Parliament?—Yes.

1173. Then you desire further freedom for the provincial Government, as I understand, not on any broad question of independence, but purely in regard to certain matters in which you think that your liberties are unduly curtailed?—Yes.

1174. You complained yesterday of the cutting of the provincial budget by the Government of India. Is it not the fact that as a rule the Government of India reduces the figures simply with reference to probabilities of expenditure and income in the year?—It may be the case, but I have so little experience of budgets here that I do not know the principles on which cuttings and so on are made.

1175. You said that in certain cases the Government of India explained why they cut and sometimes they did not?—That is so.

1176. Is it not the case usually that the Local Government, with the budget figures as finally passed by the Government of India, receives a covering letter saying generally that the alterations have been made with reference to what the Government of India considers actual probabilities of expenditure and income within the year, but that that will not debar the Local Government from incurring any expenditure which has been struck out if they have the funds?—My experience is confined to one year's budget, which I did not draw up myself. I did receive a letter of that sort.

1177. Then you admit that the control of the Government of India is largely from the point of view of correct estimating?—I do not know what the reasons of the Government of India are for cutting.

1178. Under present conditions the provincial Government shares certain important items of revenue with the Government of India?—That is the case.

1179. Also as regards expenditure, certain items are partly imperial and partly provincial?—Yes.

1180. Is it not necessary therefore that the whole figures, imperial and provincial, should be exhibited in a consolidated form for India as a whole?—Yes.

1181. That being so, who is responsible for the correctness of the budget?—The Government of India.

1182. And if owing to bad estimating the receipts largely exceeded what was budgeted for, or the expenditure fell short of what was budgeted for, would the criticism not fall upon the Government of India?—Yes.

1183. Then is the Government of India not entitled in the interests of what they consider accurate estimating to cut down your figures when they think they are not likely to be realised?—They are certainly entitled.

1184. And does it do any real harm, provided that if you have the money afterwards you are allowed to incur the expenditure?—If the budget were left as it stood on the expenditure side for the departments, it would do no real harm; but when you are told that you are cut by two lakhs of rupees in the Forest Department, and you have cut all your estimates down in the districts in order to agree with the figures which are given by the Government of India, it is a difficult position.

1185. But what else could you do? We will say that you have estimated your expenditure in some department at 37 lakhs; the Government of India having regard to the fact that last year you estimated for 35 lakhs and only spent 30 lakhs, cut you down from 37 lakhs to 32 lakhs; then you have necessarily got to cut somewhere, have you not?—No doubt.

1186. That is what you are complaining of—the inconvenience of having to distribute those five lakhs cut somewhere or other?—The result is that the department that expected to get 37 lakhs, and budgeted up to 37 lakhs, has to limit its proposals to 32 lakhs.

1187. But you are also told in the covering letter that if the department later on finds that it can spend 37 lakhs and you can find the money, the Government of India will raise no objection?—In practice you are obliged to cut your budget down to the figure of the Government of India, which in that case would be 32 lakhs instead of 37 lakhs.

1188. My point is that the Government of India in the interests of accurate estimating must occasionally alter the provincial figures?—I think I have agreed to that.

1189. And therefore, when that has been done, obviously the province must tell its departments to make the further alterations required?—Yes.

1190. Then you said that you had to go up to the Government of India later on in the year whenever you had to make any reappropriation from one head to another?—I do not think I said any reappropriation.

1191. Is that correct?—No, it is not the case with regard to any reappropriation.

1192. What reappropriations?—I must examine the Codes and consider it.

1193. Is it not the fact that you can reappropriate as much as you like within your income and expenditure, provided you do not exceed the aggregate budget provision of the year; that is, supposing your budget works out to four crores expenditure, you can transfer 20 lakhs from one item to another provided that you do not increase the aggregate beyond four crores?—But when we come to local expenditure we have great difficulties.

1194. But with regard to the provincial budget, is that not correct?—Yes.

1195. Therefore you do not have to go to the Government of India on every occasion of reappropriation, but only when you desire to increase the sum total of your expenditure?—Yes.

1196. Is not that necessary under the present system? Is the Government of India not responsible for all the treasury balances of the country?—Yes.

1197. And your provincial balances are what are called book credits?—We call them balances.

1198. The Government of India, anyhow, is responsible for all the ways and means, the movement of cash and the provision of money outside the budget amounts, and so forth?—Yes.

1199. Does the Government of India not utilise its cash balances to a certain extent upon capital expenditure, such as loans and so forth?—It grants loans.

1200. Then would it not obviously inconvenience the Government of India if a provincial Government were suddenly to draw a large amount from its balances without informing the Government of India?—Certainly; it depends upon the amount.

1201. Therefore you agree that, even if you had 60 lakhs to your credit to balance, you could not draw it all out at one time without notice?—No.

1202. Practically, therefore, the only question is whether you should not have some little latitude. I think in one of your suggestions you said you might be allowed to exceed your provincial budget by one lakh or something of that sort?—Large sums, I admit, would affect the Government of India.

1203. You spoke about the local budgets. Is the rule there not the same—that you can make reappropriations so long as the total local budget is not exceeded?—No; we have difficulties there. The other day we wanted a certain sum to make a road in a district; we could not reappropriate for that under a comparatively recent order, unless we could withdraw money from one or more Local Boards and point out the particular Local Board from which the money could be withdrawn and placed at the disposal of the Local Board which desired it to spend this year; it could only be done in the next budget.

1204. My recollection is that in the Government of India the rule is the same as in the provincial. The Local Government formerly used to appropriate between the local and the provincial; the Government of India said: "These are entirely different heads of account; one is your money, the other is not, and you ought not to have mixed them up"?—Anyhow, the rule I think you are alluding to causes great trouble.

1205. However, such inconvenience as has been caused by that rule will now be got rid of under the Secretary of State's orders excluding local funds from the Imperial Government's budget?—I understand from what I have heard of the order that that will be so.

1206. You have admitted that these orders, though you have not seen them, will, if they are as I have put them, decrease references to the Government of India?—Probably.

1207. Will they not also decrease the work of your Secretariat?—From what I have heard of the order, I believe it will.

1208. Is there much correspondence with the Government of India on these local fund re-allotments?—There has not been much.

1209. But I understood you to say that there was where the shoe pinched—that you did not so much mind having to go up for transfers of provincial funds or reappropriations for provincial funds, but it was the local funds that gave all the trouble?—I do not think I spoke of trouble; I said we could not do it without going to the Government of India.

1210. Taking it practically, do you often have to go up to the Government of India or not?—We do not often go to the Government of India.

1211. Then it does not pinch you much?—We do not go, because we do not expect to get the funds; we cannot always be asking for funds.

1212. You may take it from me, as Financial Secretary, that if you had the balances as a rule there would be no difficulty?—I am very glad to hear it.

1213. Now to take this very important question of reappropriation; are you not very strict with your own District Boards; do you not prevent a District Board making reappropriations within its own budget without the sanction of Government?—I really do not deal with this, until it comes within the Financial Department; it is done in the Local and Municipal Department.

1214. But you were a Collector, and have had to deal with the District Board finance for some years?—I have not dealt with District Board finance for ten years.

1215. You are not prepared to say what the position is with regard to District Boards?—Not the position now.

1216. With regard to borrowing powers, you are not in favour of giving the provincial Governments borrowing powers?—No.

1217. Under the present system would there be anything on which they could borrow particularly?—Things will have to be changed, decidedly.

1218. A District Board and a municipality can borrow because they have got definitely ear-marked sources of revenue: a provincial Government has sources of revenue which are assigned to it by the Government of India and which it shares; therefore it stands rather on a different footing, does it not?—Yes.

1219. Your only security would be the half share of the land revenue, the excise, and so on?—Yes.

1220. That would not be so satisfactory a security as a full source of revenue?—I could not say until we have tried to raise money.

1221. The Chairman was asking you yesterday whether you would prefer getting the whole of the land revenue and giving up the rest, and you said, very properly, that you could not say till you had worked it out, because you did not know whether it was advantageous financially or not. But supposing that giving you the whole of the land revenue and giving you nothing else would give you much the same as the present settlement, would you be in favour of it?—I really cannot answer off-hand.

1222. Suppose, for instance, the Government of India had the whole of the excise, would there not be some disadvantages in that; would it not shut off the interest of the provincial Government in the working of that department?—As you say, the Government of Madras might not take so much interest in excise questions if the revenue was not shared.

1223. Therefore the system of sharing has this advantage, that it gives the provincial Government an interest in the various branches of administration and a share in expanding revenues?—Yes.

1224. Is it not the fact that excise is a matter in which there is a good deal of Parliamentary criticism and public criticism, generally from persons belonging to the temperance party?—Yes.

1225. And the Government of India and the Secretary of State have to meet that criticism?—Yes, and I think the Government of Madras has to do so also.

1226. The Government of Madras have to meet it no doubt to a certain extent, but the people at home look to the Government of India more than to the Government of any particular province?—Probably, those that do not know.

1227. I do not say in Madras (because that has always been held up as a model to the rest of the provinces in excise matters), but in some of the other provinces where the excise system was, in the view of the Government of India, not in accordance with the canon of getting the maximum of revenue out of the minimum of consumption, it might be necessary for the Government of India to occasionally interfere?—Yes.

1228. It would interfere much more easily if it possessed a financial share than if it had not?—Yes.

1229. Therefore giving the provincial Governments the entire receipts from some branches of revenue and none in others would have this result, that it would slacken their efforts in the case of the departments where they got no financial benefit, and it would make such control as the Government of India has to exercise more ungracious, seeing that the Government of India would be in some cases interfering in matters from which they derived no revenue?—I hope provincial Governments understand their duties better than that.

1230. You think that if the provincial Government got all the revenue, it would be equally amenable?—I do not see that there would be any less control if the provincial Government had all the revenue.

1231. We will say that a provincial Government has the excise revenue, and is developing it so that a certain number of people think it is working in the interests of the liquor trade, and the Government of India thinks there is some foundation for that and intervenes; the provincial Government says: "It is our revenue; you have nothing to do with it." Is that not a source of friction? Whereas now the Government of India says: "If we call upon you to sacrifice revenue, we at any rate sacrifice our half with you." Does it not make it easier to deal with a problem of that kind, if the Government of India is, as it were, a money partner with the provincial Government?—I think the provincial Government ought to be able to be trusted to do its duty.

1232. You think the general policy ought to be full trust in the provincial Government?—I think so.

1233. You have a Board of Revenue here?—Yes.

1234. Does the provincial Government always trust the Board of Revenue?—Not always.

1235. Have there not been many cases in which the provincial Government have overruled the Board of Revenue?—Yes.

1236. And the Board of Revenue in its turn overrules Collectors?—Yes.

1237. Then why should the provincial Government alone be exempt from the power of being overruled? Is the provincial Government necessarily infallible when it is disagreeing with its own Board of Revenue, we will say?—Not necessarily.

1238. Then I gather that your idea is that if the Government of India interfere with the provincial Government, it is necessarily always the case that the Government of India is wrong and the provincial Government right?—I do not think I have given any justification for such an idea.

1239. You deprecate interference with the provincial Government beyond what is the absolute necessity?—Beyond what is necessary.

1240. I gather from what you were saying that it is because you think that the provincial Government is more likely to be right?—I think the provincial Government has local knowledge, and the Government of India as a rule has not.

1241. Take the case of the Revenue Board and the Collector; has not the Collector local knowledge?—Certainly, so has the Board.

1242. Has the Board as a rule as good a knowledge as that of the Collector?—I think the Board as a rule has local knowledge; it is very seldom that some member of the Board has not served in the particular district.

1243. In the Government of India until lately the Home Member was a Madras officer; had he not local knowledge of Madras matters?—Within certain limits; he had not had immediate touch with any district in Madras for a great many years.

1244. Is it not possible that the Members of Council in Madras have not had immediate touch with any district for a number of years?—Certainly.

1245. Then you do not mind reversals of opinion and not trusting to a man on the spot, so long as it is done in the family, if I may say so—in the province itself—but you object to the provincial Government being overruled from outside, is that it?—I do not think I have said anything to justify that assertion.

1246. Well, you think it is right and proper that the provincial Government should overrule the Revenue Board where necessary?—Yes.

1247. And that the Board should overrule a Collector?—Yes.

1248. And that a Collector should overrule a tahsildar?—Yes.

1249. But you do not think it right that the Government of India should overrule the Madras Government?—I do not think it right that the Government of India should overrule the Madras Government in local questions.

1250. What do you mean by local questions?—Questions which affect this Presidency itself, as distinct from other parts of India.

1251. Is it always possible to put a province within a ring fence, and say that this question affects one province only, and not others?—I have not suggested that.

1252. Is it not possible that what is done in Madras may react on some adjoining province?—Certainly it is possible.

1253. And is it not desirable that there should be some general co-ordination of the administration, or would you allow each provincial Government to go entirely on its own lines?—I would allow the provincial Government to go as far as possible on its own lines.

1254. As far as possible?—Yes.

1255. But every now and then it has to be pulled up?—Yes.

1256. Now take a personal matter. Would you allow a provincial Government full power of punishing its own officers, or would you allow an officer an appeal to the Government of India?—I should allow an appeal to the Government of India, if the Government of Madras punished an officer.

1257. The Government of India not having the local knowledge?—There is no question of local knowledge in regard to the punishment of an officer.

1258. There is knowledge of the man?—There is knowledge of the man, yes.

1259. Suppose the Madras Government reduced a Collector; would you allow him an appeal to the Government of India?—Yes.

1260. The Madras Government knowing the Collector and the Government of India not knowing him?—Yes.

1261. On what ground—why should you allow an appeal there?—Because I consider that it is just as well to allow an appeal from the Court of first instance.

1262. Your point is that the Madras Government would be the Court of first instance?—Yes.

1263. And that it occasionally might make a mistake?—Certainly.

1264. If it makes a mistake in personal questions might it not also make a mistake in administrative questions?—Certainly.

1265. Therefore might not the Government of India occasionally be justified in overruling it?—I have agreed with that.

1266. You refer to the Government of India Resolution constituting the Controller of Printing and Stationery. Are you aware that as regards printing, the most important presses that the Controller has to deal with are those directly under the Government of India?—I know that he has to deal with them; I do not know the relative importance of them.

1267. And he therefore stands in a different position with regard to those presses than he does in regard to the provincial presses?—Yes, I believe he does.

1268. Your complaint is about paragraph 4 in which it is said: "The Controller will refer all matters requiring orders to the Finance and Commerce Department and will be the general adviser of the Government of India on all matters connected with printing and stationery and their agent for giving effect to their orders." Later on it says: "The Controller will inspect, supervise, and control all printing presses under Local Governments and Administrations, especially in Northern India, advising them in matters connected with printing and stationery. The Controller will not have executive control over provincial presses, but Local Governments should arrange to help him in his inspections, and should pay due attention to his reports." Reading those two passages together, is it not fair to say that when the Government of India said "their agent for giving their orders" they meant in respect of imperial presses?—Certainly, if you read the two passages together.

1269. Before the Controller of Printing and Stationery existed you had the entire control of the Madras press except on any questions which under the Civil Service Regulations would have to go to the Government of India?—Yes.

1270. There was nobody in the Madras Government who had any practical experience of printing?—I believe the Superintendent of the press had practical experience. If you mean in the Madras Government itself, I think not.

1271. Does the Chief Secretary or the Under Secretary know anything about printing?—No, there is no personal experience.

1272. Did you find it embarrassing to have to deal with a person about whose technical work you knew nothing?—I have not found it so.

1273. You found no necessity to have an officer of higher status come down from outside and able to advise you?—Certainly it would be of advantage.

1274. Therefore the Controller of Printing and Stationery need not be objectionable to you?—He need not be.

1275. He might be of great service to you?—He might be.

1276. Do you think the working of your Madras press was altogether satisfactory?—I really do not know.

1277. Was the late Superintendent not rather dilatory in his work?—I really do not know.

1278. What you object to is the fact that the Controller has issued orders?—I object to the Controller issuing orders.

1279. But does he issue orders?—Well, he has issued things which have resulted in increase of establishment and so on.

1280. But as I understand he had no power to make you do the work; he could only advise?—I think if he advised and the Government of Madras refused to do it, it would expose itself to being overruled by the Government of India.

*The Hon.
Mr. H.
Bradley.*
23 Nov., 1907.

1281. You did refuse to do it, and have the Government of India overruled you?—I am not aware that anything has happened yet in which the Government of India has had an opportunity of overruling us.

1282. In the Madras Press Superintendent's note he says "The adoption of the task system on the basis of other presses, one of the suggestions of the Examiner, caused a long and expensive strike." I suppose he is referring to the strike of 1904?—Yes.

1283. Was that not rather due to the bad management of the local press Superintendent?—I do not know what it was due to.

1284. You have referred to the case of the Sanitary Commissioner and Captain Christophers and Captain Patton. Will you kindly tell us who Captain Patton is?—He is a member of the Indian Medical Service.

1285. How did he come to be in Madras?—He was posted in Madras to study some particular questions under Captain Christophers at the King Institute.

1286. Posted by whom?—By the Sanitary Commissioner of the Government of India, I believe.

1287. Then he is not a Madras officer?—No, he is an imperial officer.

1288. He was sent to prosecute work for the Government of India in connection with some diseases at the King Institute?—Yes.

1289. The Government of Madras desired him to accompany the local Sanitary Commissioner to Ennore; Captain Christophers thought that this man, being an imperial officer, ought to get the orders of his superior officer. What is it you impugn in that? Was his superior officer in the Madras Government?—No.

1290. Then had you a right to order him to accompany the local Sanitary Commissioner?—Yes. He was employed in this Presidency under one of our men; he was asked to accompany the Sanitary Commissioner on a short visit to a place almost within a drive of Madras.

1291. He was working in your laboratory?—He was working in our laboratory under Captain Christophers.

1292. Did the Government of India put his services at your disposal under Captain Christophers?—No, but he was working under Captain Christophers in the study of these questions.

1293. Is it not the fact that the Madras Government appointed this officer to act for Captain Christophers without reference to the Government of India?—They did.

1294. Is that altogether correct?—Well, it increased his pay.

1295. But as a matter of etiquette was it a proper thing to appoint an imperial officer to a provincial post without reference to the Government of India?—There is not the slightest doubt that it was not the usual thing.

1296. You admit that you appointed an officer belonging to the Imperial Sanitary Commissioner to take up that work without reference to the Sanitary Commissioner. Now what complaint have you against the Sanitary Commissioner in regard to this matter at all?—We have not made it a ground of complaint against the Government of India.

1297. Assuming that there was an error of judgment, it was due to Captain Christophers?—Certainly.

1298. Then how can you blame the Sanitary Commissioner?—The position is this. The fact of the existence of the Sanitary Commissioner led our officer to order a man working under him in his own place not to obey an order of the Government of Madras. The position was a most unfortunate one, but our complaint is that the system led an officer under the Government of Madras to forbid an officer working under him to carry out an order of the Government of Madras without reference to the Government of India.

1299. If there had been no Imperial Sanitary Commissioner, but Captain Patton had still been an officer of the Government of India, might that situation not have arisen equally?—I do not think so.

1300. Is that the only grievance you have against the Sanitary Commissioner, that his existence led to this little friction?—The Sanitary Commissioner of the Government of India has called for statistics which are not available and which involve a great deal of work; I think you had better ask the Sanitary Commissioner about the matter. Without reference to this Government he has interfered considerably with the work of the office.

1301. If the local Sanitary Commissioner has reason to believe that statistics called for would be vexatious could he not represent that view?—But surely no one ought to be in the position of being able to call for vexatious statistics.

1302. Is it not the fact that in all Government matters statistics may be called for which somebody may think to be so troublesome as to be vexatious?—Quite so.

1303. Then as to the Inspector-General of Excise, you have no experience of him?—I have not.

1304. Is it not quite likely that the Inspector-General of Excise would have a lot to learn in Madras?—Possibly.

1305. Suppose he did learn in Madras, would what he learnt not prove of use to Bengal or Bombay or some other province?—Yes.

1306. Are not these Inspectors-General useful from that point of view, that they convey to one province the knowledge that they have picked up in another?—I really do not know—I know nothing about what they convey.

1307. You said that you had read the report of the Excise Committee. That was a strong representative Committee presided over by a Madras officer?—Yes.

1308. Did they not state unanimously that they found that in excise matters the different provincial authorities were working in ignorance of each other's methods, and that that was an extremely inconvenient situation?—Yes.

1309. Would such a situation have grown up if you had had an Inspector-General in years gone by?—I do not know.

1310. Have you got any real grievance against the Inspectors-General apart from these quasi-personal matters? Can you point to another matter in which the Inspectors-General have really been a nuisance to you?—There was a case regarding the Surgeon-General with the Madras Government. It is against the rules and against the departmental rules and orders that he should correspond on professional matters directly with the Government of India; we found the Surgeon-General was corresponding about the transfer of an officer to do work at Netley.

1311. That occurred in the year 1900?—Yes.

1312. I think when you brought the matter to the attention of the Government of India they went into the facts and admitted that there was a mistake, and they apologised?—It is not the only occasion on which the Government of India have said that there have been mistakes made in that way.

1313. When such an appointment is created a new Inspector-General comes in. Is it not natural that with the best intentions there should be a little over-lapping which would cease when the man's functions became better known?—I think it is possible that it would cease, and I think it is possible that it might make them exacerbated.

1314. Have you any complaints to make of the Director of Criminal Intelligence?—I have not seen his work.

1315. It was suggested that the place of Inspectors-General might be filled by periodical conferences of provincial officers; do you believe in that plan?—I think that occasional conferences might be valuable.

1316. Who would preside at such conferences?—I cannot say.

1317. It is rather an important matter?—Quite so, but it is not for me to say.

1318. Does not everything in a conference of this sort depend upon the Chairman as to whether it leads to good results or not?—I do not know; there might be a strong lot of members and a very weak Chairman, and the result might be most satisfactory.

1319. If you have a number of equal officials from the various provinces, who is to take precedence?—I cannot imagine the case of a number of actually equal officials from various provinces.

1320. You would put the man who was senior in rank in the chair?—You might.

1321. From various causes do not officers rapidly change from one part of the country to another?—Yes, within certain limits. Now and again you get a man who has been a Collector or a Judge for 10 or 12 years.

1322. Not in the same district?—Sometimes even in the same district.

1323. Might an officer not go to a conference and get useful knowledge there, and then in two or three months time be sent elsewhere, and therefore, so far as he was concerned, the conferences might have no useful effect?—I think if the officer was worth his pay he would probably place on record before he left anything valuable that he had obtained from the conferences he had attended.

1324. Is it not rather natural for every officer to be rather prepossessed in favour of the method of his own Presidency?—I do not know.

1325. Is there not a certain amount of what you might call provincial patriotism?—There is a certain amount of provincial feeling no doubt.

1327. The Local Government would not hear the other side of the case?—I cannot tell you; it depends on the procedure of the conference.

1328. On the other hand, would not the Inspector-General be able to tell you the other side of the case?—I understood you to say that the Inspector-General would not hold the conference.

1329. I do not see why he should not hold conferences too. However, my point is that he could go to the Local Government and say "Things are being done in a different way in (say) Bengal, and it would be worth your while to see if the Bengal procedure would not suit you." The local man would say "Oh no, our plan is best," and then there would be the argument on one side and the other?—I do not think so. In my own experience I think the local man would be ready to do anything good that suited his own province.

1330. Do you find that Heads of Departments in India are peculiarly receptive of new ideas?—I have found Heads of Departments receptive of new ideas.

1331. You were speaking yesterday of transfers of Civilians especially, and you said that the number of transfers had been considerably reduced by the grading system amongst Collectors and Head Assistants. Formerly the Head Assistant when he was promoted had to change his division, probably his district also?—Yes.

1332. Now he stays where he is and draws extra pay according to seniority?—Yes.

1333. Did the Madras Government adopt that suggestion of their own accord?—I think not.

1334. Was it not forced upon them by the Government of India?—I cannot tell you as to its being forced upon them; I have not read the exact papers.

1335. Could you give us the returns showing the transfer of Civilians from Collectors downwards?—I think it would be difficult to get a return.

1336. It would cause a lot of labour?—I think so.

1337. May we take it from you that this system has reduced the number of transfers?—Certainly.

1338. And you think it is a good system?—I think it is.

1339. Nevertheless, your Government, if left to itself, would not have adopted it?—I cannot tell you; Governments change.

1340. The Government of that day would not have adopted it?—I cannot tell you who the Government of that day was.

1341. Is it not the fact that reforms in police and education and agriculture generally have owed their initiative to the Government of India?—I really cannot say.

1342. Putting it on a priori grounds, is not a Central Government which can overlook the whole of India more likely to be able to initiate general reforms than a Government which can only deal with its own province?—Yes.

1343. Now we have had a list of financial powers which the provincial Government proposes should be delegated to them. Which of these do you lay stress upon—which would you really like to get?—We should like to get them all.

1344. Do you regard them as all of equal importance?—No.

1345. Some are of more importance than others?—Yes.

1346. Could you tell us some of the most important?—I cannot tell you which would save most work without having it looked up.

1347. Do you regard them all as important?—I regard them as important as a whole—taken together.

1348. But suppose you were coming into a meeting which had power to pass final orders, which would you be prepared to fight over and which would you be prepared to compromise over?—I should have to think it over in order to make my selection.

1349. There are some of these things that may be open to prima facie objection, which may be cleared up in the course of discussion and in the course of evidence, but I want naturally to speak to somebody who has thought about the matter and who can give me an authoritative answer; you say you are not in a position to speak in that way?—I have not thought which are the most important of these matters.

1350. Are you prepared to give me an answer on any one of these matters?—To the best of my ability.

1351. As to the proposal that the Local Government should have power to remit disallowances made by the Audit Officer within six months of the date of payment; what is the position of the Accountant-General in regard to the Local Government?—Do you mean in regard to this matter?

1352. In regard to all matters of audit what is the position of the Accountant-General?—He is the Head Auditor.

1353. He is not an officer of the provincial Government?—No.

1354. He is an officer of the Government of India?—Yes.

1355. Is it not his duty to see that the rules are not infringed?—Yes.

1356. And if he differs from the provincial Government, the provincial Government takes the matter up to the Government of India?—Yes.

The Hon.
Mr. H.

The Hon.
Mr. H.
Bradley.

23 Nov., 1907.

1357. I do not know whether you are aware that in the same way if the Government of India pass any expenditure which the Accountant-General or the Comptroller of Indian Treasuries objects to, the Government of India must go to the Secretary of State?—I was not aware of that.

1358. Now the existing rule is, to save a long correspondence about long time-past matters, that if the Accountant-General raises an objection over an officer's pay which may have been going on over a long series of years, it is held that he ought to have acted more promptly. You say "The rule requiring the sanction of the Government of India in the Financial Department, and, where necessary, of the Secretary of State, to any remission of any disallowances made within six months from the date of payment should be abolished." Would that not strike root and branch at audit control?—I do not think it would strike at the root of audit control.

1359. Supposing there is an officer on a pay of Rs. 500 and you increase it to Rs. 600, and the Accountant-General says "You cannot do that without the sanction of the Government of India;" in the meantime, the officer has drawn his Rs. 600, and as soon as the Accountant-General disallows it you disallow the objection under this section?—I think we should not do that. Here we have to go to the Government of India for sanction.

1360. In many cases you do not accept the disallowance and you go to the Government of India; would you not find it much simpler, if you had the power, without going to the Government of India at all, to simply refund the amount of which he had docked the officer?—I do not think we should do it so as to interfere with the authority of the Government of India seriously.

1361. You think then that to give you carte blanche about remitting disallowances made by the Accountant-General would not weaken audit control?—I do not think that the Government of Madras would pass orders interfering with the finance of the Government of India or that it would unjustly allow these disallowances.

1362. I do not think that it is quite an answer to my question?—I am afraid I cannot give a better one. I do not think there is any danger in granting this delegation.

1363. You think there is no danger?—I do not think so.

1364. Then you do not attach any importance to the requirement that a provincial Government shall have to refer to the Government of India whenever an Audit Officer challenges its action as ultra vires. Do you regard that as a valuable safeguard or not?—The Accountant-General can always refer to the Government of India.

1365. Do you regard that as a valuable safeguard or not—that when an officer challenges the action of a provincial Government they cannot do anything further until the matter is referred to the Government of India?—I do consider it a safeguard.

1366. Will you explain further the proposal that the Local Government should have power, without reference to the Government of India, to grant a pension to an officer according to the rules in force when he entered the Service?—At present a considerable number of cases come up in which an officer entered the service of Government before the present pension rules were in force. Under the pension rules which were in force when he entered the Service he would obtain a larger pension; under the rules now in force every one of these cases has to be referred to the Government of India for disposal. It has now become a complete matter of routine; the officer always gets the pension that he would have got if the rules had not been altered since he joined the Service.

1367. Let me read to you Article 4 of the Civil Service Regulations: "An officer's claim to pay and allowances is regulated by the rules in force at the time in respect of which the pay and allowances are earned; to leave, by the rules in force at the time the leave is applied for and granted; and to pension, by the rules in force at the time when the officer resigns or is discharged from the service of Government." Therefore, his claim to pension rests on the rules in force at the time he retired, and he cannot, as a matter of right, have a better pension?—He cannot. All those matters are referred to the Government of India, and it is not the practice of the Government of India to refuse such pensions.

1368. Are you aware that as a rule reference has to be made to the Secretary of State?—No, I am not aware of that.

1369. Do you consider it quite safe to give the the provincial Government unchallenged power in that matter?—I consider it quite safe, inasmuch as it has now become a matter of routine and the Government of India never interfere.

1370. What class of cases are you referring to when you say that they are all treated as matters of routine? Do you mean to refer to clerks chiefly or were you referring to Gazetted Officers?—I have not known any case of a Gazetted Officer.

1371. Would you be prepared to give Public Works officers such scale of pension as they might have been entitled to under the rules in force at the time they entered the Service in lieu of the present scale?—If the Government of India were in the habit of granting that pension, it would save a great deal of correspondence if the power were given to the provincial Government.

1372. That is so far as regards the general delegation of a particular class of cases, but would you give full and complete power to the Local Government in all cases without any communication with the Government of India?—No, but I want to save routine correspondence.

1373. Then when the Government of India accept the view with regard to one class of officers you desire that it should be applied to any cases that arise hereafter?—Yes.

1374. That is rather a different matter from what I was putting to you. How many cases of that kind have occurred?—I should have to have the figures looked up, but they are not infrequent.

1375. You have been Chief Secretary for about a year; you sign all these letters that go to the Government of India?—Not all of them.

1376. But you deal with the cases?—I deal with the cases.

1377. Have you not a general recollection of the number of cases that have occurred?—There have been a good many, 10 or 15, or 20; they come up pretty frequently.

1378. Now I will take you to Article 180 of the Civil Service Regulations, extension of joining time. You would propose to give the Local Government full power in respect of joining time?—Yes.

1379. Is it that you have to make many references, or that the references which you make are nearly always sanctioned, or why do you ask for this power?—To save trouble.

1380. Are the references of the same character that you have described before—purely routine?—I should say they are not routine, but the Government of Madras may be trusted not to misuse that power.

1381. You may take it as a matter of general principle or a matter of practical policy. By practical policy I mean a thing that would save a lot of reference. Is it practical policy that you are dealing with?—It would not save many references.

1382. Is not joining time a rather ticklish business; do not officers sometimes extend their joining time to give themselves a bit of a holiday?—I do not think officers do that, and I do not think the Government ever extend it for that purpose.

1383. Are not the rules as to joining time fairly liberal?—Yes; fairly liberal; you get six days preparation time, and so many days for every 250

*The Hon.
Mr. H.
Bradley.*

23 Nov., 1907.

miles by rail, or 200 miles by steamer, or 10 or 15 miles by road or canal, and you get each Sunday on which you do not travel.

1384. It can only happen very rarely that the joining time is exceeded?—It is very rarely that the 30 days' joining time is exceeded.

1385. But when it does you would give the power to the Local Government?—Yes, it is a very petty power.

1386. Then as regards Article No. 368: "Service does not qualify unless the officer holds a substantive office on a permanent establishment; but, upon such conditions as it may think fit to impose, the Government of India may allow temporary service to count for pension if the pension does not exceed Rs. 10 a month." What you want is that the Government of Madras shall have power if the pension does not exceed Rs. 50?—Yes.

1387. You do not ask that the Government of Madras should have greater powers than those possessed by the Government of India?—No; we ask that the section shall be widened and more authority given all round.

1388. Therefore it would be necessary for the Secretary of State to delegate his authority?—No, I do not think that is so.

1389. Are you not aware that in regard to any concession not sanctioned by the pension rules in black and white the sanction of the Secretary of State is necessary?—But that could all be done in one; I do not think the Secretary of State would object; what we are asking for is the widening of all powers.

1390. You desire the Secretary of State to give larger power to the Government of India and that the Government of India should delegate larger powers to the provincial Government?—That is so.

1391. Then will you turn to Article 924 of the Civil Service Regulations. Under 924 (b), the Government of India have been authorized "to grant pensions up to a limit of Rs. 10 a month, or gratuities not exceeding the equivalent value of that amount, without reference to the Secretary of State in any case, even where no pension or gratuity is admissible under rule, provided that the general spirit of the regulations is observed." Would you be in favour of giving that power, or any larger power if the Secretary of State could be induced to give any, to Local Governments in respect of officers serving under them?—Yes.

1392. Now as regards the proposals for the "Delegation of powers to Heads of Departments"; do you regard all these as equally important, or are there any that you regard as specially important?—I think my answer must be that I have not considered which are more necessary than others; I think they are all desirable.

1393. There are certain proposals in respect of the purchase of articles of European manufacture. Are you aware that a Stores Committee appointed by the Government of India has been sitting on that matter, and that the Secretary of State has been addressed on the subject?—No, I am not aware of it.

1394. Will you look at the suggestion that Heads of Departments should be empowered to sanction recurring contingent expenditure subject to a monthly limit of Rs. 25 for any item. Would you impose any limit of time?—Monthly.

1395. But would you allow a man to go on month by month sanctioning up to Rs. 25, or would you impose any limit of time within which he must get sanction?—I should empower him to sanction generally.

1396. But is there not a danger that there would be a tendency on the part of some officer to try to put menial servants and other persons under the head of "contingencies"?—I do not think there is a tendency of that sort.

1397. You are very strict in Madras, as in most provinces, as to sanctioning powers of officers in the matter of establishments?—Yes.

1398. Subject to exceptions in the case of temporary establishments even the Board of Revenue cannot sanction any additional establishments?—I think that is so.

1399. Is there not a risk, if you impose no time limit about contingent recurring charges, that things will be sanctioned by different officers?—No, you can watch the Collector; the Heads of Departments can be watched carefully.

1400. Then you would allow it to be challenged by the audit office?—Certainly.

1401. You are acquainted with the Madras Manual?—Yes, the Manual is a collection of rules by the local Accountant-General which we are supposed to follow.

1402. Then take the proposal relative to Article 232, "Commutation of absence without leave into leave without allowances." What you say is that the Local Government should be empowered to authorise specific Heads of Departments to commute leave without absence into leave without allowances. Would you make that subject to any exception?—I do not think any exceptions would be necessary. The authorisation should be to specified Heads of Departments; it would not be granted to Heads of Departments generally. There are different persons who count as Heads of Departments who are not nearly so senior as others who are Heads of other Departments. The Local Government would specify the Heads of Departments to whom the power should be given.

1403. It would be in the discretion of the Local Government to decide to whom the power should be given?—Yes.

1404. Then as regards Article 339. You say "the Board of Revenue, the High Court, the Inspector-General of Police and the Director of Public Instruction should be allowed to grant extraordinary leave without allowances for a period not exceeding two months, even though the applicant for leave is eligible for other kinds of leave." Will you explain that?—A considerable number of references are made to Government on this point.

1405. The general rule is that an officer may not get leave without allowances till he has exhausted every other kind of leave?—But sometimes it affects a man very seriously having to take furlough; he may not be able to get furlough again for four or five years under the strict rules; I am referring to Uncovenanted Officers. Take my own case; if I am compelled to take furlough for more than three months I can get no furlough for another three years. With the Uncovenanted man, that rule really does not apply; it is a shorter period for me. It might have a serious effect upon a man's career to compel him to take the only leave to which he is entitled. He might not be able to get any more long leave for many years.

1406. Will you read the Note 1 to which you refer?—"In cases in which the duration of the extraordinary leave to be granted does not exceed two months the Local Government may dispense with the condition in this Article that the leave can be granted only when no other kind of leave is by rule admissible."

1407. The ordinary rule is that if you have other leave you must not take this, but there is a dispensing power vested in the Local Government. Is it not possible that there may be abuses of that if delegated?—I hope not.

1408. Is it not rather a delicate thing sometimes, as the officer may be a personal friend of the Head of Department?—I do not think the Heads of Departments are liable to allow themselves to be moved in matters of that sort by personal friendship.

1409. You think it is quite safe?—I think it is safe.

1410. You spoke about the power of granting pensions under Rs. 100; would it not be a sounder thing to lay down the general rule that, provided the Accountant-General certified there was no objection, pensions might be given by the officer who would fill up the appointment in case of a vacancy?—I think that is very much the same thing as this proposal, but this proposal has been

The Hon.
Mr. H.
Bradley.

23 Nov., 1907.

limited because it is considered advisable not to give wider powers.

1411. Do you see any objection to it?—Speaking personally, I do not see any objection to it, but the Government of Madras have put forward this proposal.

1412. Would it be possible by any system of budget allotments to enable the Board of Revenue, and if necessary the Collectors, to sanction minor increases of establishment?—I think it might be possible.

1413. Might the Board of Revenue not have power to sanction Rs. 15 clerks say, or people of that sort?—It would do no harm; it is only a question of budgeting.

1414. I mean within the budget allotment?—Within the budget allotment there would be no difficulty.

1415. Would you be in favour of it?—I think it would be a good thing; it would save many references.

1416. Would you give the same power to Collectors?—Not the same power as I should give to the Board.

1417. But certain minor powers in respect of permanent establishments?—Yes.

1418. Among the matters that are full Board matters does not the Court of Wards come in?—Yes, I mentioned that yesterday.

1419. Court of Wards matters are full Board matters?—Some of them, not all; most of them are disposed of by one member.

1420. You think that that is advisable?—I think, as things are, that is advisable.

1421. Could not Collectors have larger powers in Court of Wards cases?—Not without legislation.

1422. But suppose it is convenient to legislate, would you give them larger powers?—No, I do not think I would give larger powers to all Collectors. I might be prepared to give them to a Collector in respect of a particular estate that came under his charge, and to some Collectors in respect of all estates.

1423. Are there not a large number of petty sanctions which come up to the Collectors which the Secretary of the Board deals with and never passes on?—I cannot tell you about that.

1424. Are there not a large number of these petty sanctions?—I cannot say whether there are a large number.

1425. Surely as Collector you had them before you?—I had, but I do not know what the number was.

1426. Were they relatively petty cases?—Some of them must have been petty cases. You must remember that I have not been Collector with a Court of Wards estate under my charge for about 13 or 14 years.

1427. Anyhow, you are not prepared to give larger powers to Collectors generally in respect of the Court of Wards?—I should not give them larger powers generally.

1428. You spoke of dry remissions yesterday and you said you were not prepared to give the Collector any powers in respect of dry remissions?—I said that the revenue system is such that dry remissions are not granted in ordinary circumstances.

1429. But they are granted occasionally?—They are granted occasionally.

1430. By the Board of Revenue?—Or by the Government, but it is only in exceptional cases of large areas suffering from famine or from loss of crops.

1431. But the Collector has no independent powers in such cases?—No.

1432. At the same time, the remissions granted are granted on the report and recommendation of the Collector?—Yes.

1433. That being so, would you think it dangerous to give the Collector some powers in respect of this?—The difficulty is the budgeting; the difficulty is the large area that affects the budget.

1434. I am speaking of minor powers?—But it is impossible to give minor powers for remissions without altering the whole settlement system.

1435. Therefore you first of all say "de minimis non curat lex," and then when it comes to big things "it upsets the budget," is that it?—No. The position is this. Our assessments on dry lands are based on an arrangement which gives a very large percentage of reduction for losses of crops; it is intended that all ordinary failures of crop in a given year shall be covered by that large percentage of reduction. The consequence is that dry remissions are not included.

1436. But might it not happen that through some special accident, a land-slip or something or other, the dry crops got destroyed in certain villages; in such a case would you not consider it a case for remission?—If the lands are not injured—if they are suitable for cultivation next year—I do not think it is necessary to allow Collectors to grant remissions, because that is covered by the reductions that are made generally.

1437. Although every raiyat in the village had lost his whole crop?—Yes.

1438. Do you think your settlement rules are too rigid?—No; I do not think they are too rigid under the present system.

1439. Then they do not want alteration?—I would not demand alteration.

1440. You at present have some limitation of the right of personal appeal in that nothing goes to the Local Government in the case of men below Rs. 50 unless it is a first appeal?—Yes.

1441. You would be ready, I understood from your previous answers, to raise that to Rs. 100 at any rate?—Yes.

1442. You say that every man ought to have one appeal?—Yes.

1443. Therefore, if you, as a member of the Board, dismiss a man, he should be able to go to Government?—Yes.

1444. But if some subordinate of yours has dismissed a man at Rs. 80 and you confirm the sentence, then he should not go to the Government?—No.

1445. Could not District Magistrates be given power to invest subordinate magistrates with second and third class powers?—They could.

1446. Would you be in favour of that?—Yes.

1447. You do judicial work as Chief Secretary?—Yes.

1448. You have a number of applications for second and third class powers?—Yes; we should require legislation to alter that; that is under the Criminal Procedure Code; it would be a good thing to be able to do.

1449. Would you be in favour of going further and allowing them to give first class powers?—No.

1450. Now take the revenue side. You post an officer not merely to a district as a Sub-Divisional Officer, but to a particular division in the district?—Yes.

1451. The Collector could not remove a man from one division to another?—The Collector ordinarily could not.

1452. Would you be in favour of posting the officer to a district and giving the Collector his complement of Divisional Officers, and letting him move them about at his discretion?—No, because it would mean the transfer of Covenanted Officers without the orders of Government. I think the Government should decide what Covenanted Officers should be in charge of what divisions.

1453. Does not the Collector know best the capabilities of his officers? You can trust a man to be a Collector; cannot you trust him to apportion his district?—There are certain rules that the Government carry out with regard to the posting

The Hon.
Mr. H.
Bradley.

23 Nov., 1907.

of officers, and I do not think there should be any alteration.

1454. You mean that there are certain divisions which are usually held by Covenanted Civilians and certain divisions that are held by Deputy Collectors?—In some cases, but I also think that generally the former should be held by the Covenanted Service, and that Deputy Collectors should not be able to be posted to them.

1455. Might there not be exceptional cases in which they might be appointed for short periods?—Certainly, there are exceptions to every rule.

1456. Subject to certain provisions as to what sub-divisions were to be held by what class of officers, would you be prepared to give any discretion to the Collector in posting officers?—I do not think it would save any trouble, and I think it would be better that the Government should retain their present power.

1457. Now with regard to the tahsildars. There are generally from 8 to 12 taluks in a district?—In some districts yes; roughly 5 to 12 we will say.

1458. Those are divided into grades of pay?—Yes.

1459. Five grades running from Rs. 150 to Rs. 250?—Yes.

1460. The pay belongs to the taluk?—Yes.

1461. Therefore to promote a tahsildar is to remove him from one taluk to another?—Yes.

1462. Are you in favour of that system?—Speaking individually, I am not, but speaking for Government I must ask to be allowed to reserve my opinion; at present I am not speaking for the Government.

1463. Speaking as an individual?—Speaking as an individual, I am in favour of a change analogous to the change which was made in the case of Sub-Divisional Officers. Of course, among these officers, moves are not anything like so common as they used to be.

1464. You imply possible objections; can you indicate any objections that there might be?—I do not think there are any objections that could not be controverted. Speaking for myself I am in favour of what you suggest.

1465. And I think I am correct in saying that the proposal was once made to the provincial Government and was rejected?—I think it has been made many times and it has been rejected at times; as to these things one does not know in detail what occurred before one came into the Secretariat. It is a reform that I think myself would be advantageous.

1466. As has sometimes been suggested, would you put the tahsildars upon a provincial list and have them appointed by the Board of Revenue?—No.

1467. You think that that would weaken the power of the Collector?—Yes; at present the Collector chooses and nominates a man, and goes to the Board direct.

1468. Does the Collector now send each case to the Board or does he send a number of persons, who are primâ facie fit, to the Board?—I cannot tell you what he does now; formerly he used to send up several.

1469. The Board had no actual power of appointment; they could veto the Collector's appointment if they thought the man unfit?—Yes.

1470. And in that case the Collector had to appoint some one else?—Yes.

1471. It was not a case of the Board appointing some one else?—No.

1472. And you would deprecate that?—Yes.

1473. You spoke yesterday about all Codes being prescribed by the Government of India?—I do not think I said that.

1474. You did speak about Codes?—Yes, there are many Codes. I must have been entirely misunderstood if I am supposed to have said that.

1475. So far as Codes tend towards rigidity and uniformity, the departmental Codes are just as much responsible as the Imperial Codes?—I do not think you can complain of the departmental Code being too rigid. The object of a Code is to see that the officers of the department carry out their duties in the same way.

1476. Is it not the tendency of some Indian subordinates to look at the letter rather than the spirit in interpreting the rules; are they not interpreted too literally?—I do not think a subordinate would find his path very clear if he did.

1477. You spoke yesterday of a District Officer having to rely on about 20 Codes?—Yes, there is the Civil Account Code and the Civil Service Regulations; there is a Local Fund Code and a Municipal Code.

1478. There are any number, but how many volumes have you really to take out into camp with you for constant reference?—I have not counted; I used to have a considerable number of books; I occasionally wanted the Government of India Acts and things of that kind.

1479. Would you take the Civil Service Regulations out to camp with you?—I think so.

1480. And the Civil Account Code?—Not the Civil Account Code. Certainly, as the Salt Member of the Board I should take the Civil Service Regulations.

1481. The Collector has not so much to do with the Civil Service Regulations?—I think I used to take them when I was a Collector.

1482. He has to take the Board's Standing Orders and the Civil Procedure Code?—Yes, and I should say probably the Abkari Manual, and he would probably take the Stamp Manual.

1483. He has to take several books?—He has to take several books, and every one has an index, and if the Collector knows his work he can very easily find anything in them.

1484. There is one question here as to whether the provincial Government, or the Government of India too for that matter, was too much led by considerations of revenue. Putting the Government on one side, have you known that in the case of subordinate officers?—I think that is so.

1485. In the Excise Department especially?—Yes.

1486. Do you find officers who have the idea that they have to run the excise for the sake of revenue?—Subordinate officers, yes.

1487. And in the case of the land revenue?—No, I think the tendency on the tahsildar's part is only to collect his revenue up to time; I do not think it is so much to increase it as to get it paid in time.

1488. He has not the idea that it would be against him to recommend a large amount of remission?—I do not think so.

1489. Have you had any experience of famine work?—Very little; I had three months in 1892.

1490. Do you think the provincial Governments should not have greater latitude over their Famine Code?—I do not think so.

1491. You spoke yesterday of transfers of officers; you said that in your opinion it was not good for an officer to spend too many years in the same district. How many Telugu districts have you got?—About ten.

1492. Could you not keep officers more in the districts speaking the same language?—We do our best.

1493. You do now?—Yes.

1494. I put it to you that in former times, officers were habitually transferred from a Telugu district to a Tamil district and vice versa?—There were constant changes; that had to be done in order to give promotion; I believe that that accounted for many of the transfers.

1495. Take the Collector or the Judge: is he not often transferred?—I think he is not often transferred to a district in which a language he knows is not spoken.

*The Hon.
Mr. H.
Bradley.*

23 Nov., 1907.

1496. But is not a distinction to be drawn between a man who has been speaking the language for years and a man who has passed an examination in the language years ago?—The language is always considered whenever it is possible.

1497. Sufficiently?—I think so; I think it is considered as far as it can be.

1498. Are your acting appointments of Collectors and Judges generally given by seniority?—They are given to some extent by seniority. I remember in one case where the Collector fell sick, the man in the nearest district, although he was not ripe for an acting Collector, was put in for a couple of months.

1499. What do you mean by ripe for a Collector?—He was not the next for promotion; he was put in because he happened to be handy.

1500. At what time does a man act as Collector now-a-days?—Men who came out in 1892 or 1893 are the juniors acting as Collectors.

1501. They have served 14 or 15 years?—Yes.

1502. You have got a Collector of a district who goes home on privilege leave for three months; the senior Sub-Divisional Officer is, say, a man of seven or eight years' service; would you put him in?—I should, if possible, put him in; if he is a man the Government consider fit, he ought to be put in.

1503. That is to say, in the case of a privilege leave vacancy you would put in the man who was on the spot?—Yes.

1504. Suppose the leave extended to six months?—If he were in, and the leave was extended for three months after he had been there three months, he would not be moved.

1505. But if the leave were six months in the first place?—Then the senior man would ordinarily get his promotion.

1506. You would not put the junior in in preference to a senior man a few districts away?—No, not for a six months' vacancy.

1507. Supposing you did do that, would not things right themselves in the long run; would not a man who lost his promotion by that system in one year get it by the same system in another year?—I do not know; it would fall heavily on some men; it would be a matter of luck.

1508. Do you think it is in the interests of the public service to transfer rapidly from one district to another?—You say rapidly; I do not quite understand what you mean.

1509. If a man goes away for six months; which is the best in the interests of the public service, putting all personal considerations out of account—suppose you have a good man on the spot, is it best to put him in district charge or to bring in a man from another district?—It is entirely a personal question as to the abilities of the two men—whether they both know the language and so on.

1510. Suppose the man on the spot is a good man but junior?—If the other man is an equally good man and senior, I think it is for the benefit of the public service, as well as for the man himself, to put him in, because I think it is a mistake to make a man discontented. If a man who really ought to be promoted by seniority sees his juniors in three or four districts drawing more pay than himself, it is naturally a cause of discontent.

1511. You think it would cause Civilian discontent?—I think so.

1512. Suppose it were to become the general rule of the Service and it did not affect permanent promotion, would it cause an equal amount of discontent?—If it became the general rule and everybody understood that it would be done in every case, that would be another matter, but I think it would not work well.

1513. You spoke of the appointment of Collectors and the question of selection and so on. I do not want you to mention any names, but, looking back in the last few years, have there not been some Collectors—and Judges too for that matter—who ought not to have been Collectors and Judges?—I am inclined to think that there have been individual cases.

1514. Would you be in favour of keeping out a man who was unfit?—Certainly; I would try him first.

1515. He would be tried by the operation of your acting rules?—Yes.

1516. By the time he had come to permanent appointment he would have acted several times, and you would have an idea as to whether he was fit or not?—Yes.

1517. If you thought he was unfit what would you do with him?—I think, as an individual, I should ask the Secretary of State or the Government of India to do what they could to retire him on a proportionate allowance.

1518. You would not allow him to remain as a Divisional Officer?—I do not think he would be fit to be a Divisional Officer, and for that reason I should move for his retirement.

1519. How would you see whether an officer was fit or not; it is rather a serious responsibility?—Certainly: I do not think any one man should take the responsibility.

1520. Would you have a Committee of Selection?—No, I think it should be done by the members of the Board being asked to go down and inspect his district, and see how his work had been done.

1521. All the four members?—No, two or three, or one or two, according to circumstances.

1522. And then it would go to the provincial Government?—Yes; of course in the case of a Judge it would be the High Court.

1523. Then, the Board of Revenue, you say, is constituted purely by selection?—Yes.

1524. Does seniority play a great part there, too?—Naturally; unless a man is senior, he is not likely to be eligible for the Board.

1525. Suppose you have a vacancy on the Board of Revenue, and there are three senior Collectors: one is a fairly good Collector and you cannot say he is unfit to be a member of the Board of Revenue; the second is slightly better; and the third is much better. Would the third usually be put on the Board in front of the other two?—It is all a question of degree—a question of how much better one man was than the others. Ordinarily speaking, if three men of the same standing were merely separated by seniority, one below the other, the ordinary man who happened to be second, who was good enough for the Board, but was not the best of the three, would be put in by order of seniority; seniority would give him a better chance, assuming that, out of the three, two were fit to be members of the Board.

1526. That is even if they were close together in point of seniority?—Yes, that is what would be done.

1527. But if there were some years between them—if what you may call the merely good man was three years senior to the next man—the merely good man would go in as a matter of course, would he?—I think so.

1528. You mentioned yesterday that there were no directions for young Civilians as to the etiquette to be observed in the course of their conduct with educated natives?—I am not aware of any directions published.

1529. Do you know the Civil Service Manual?—I do.

1530. Are there not extracts from instructions by Sir Thomas Munro as to how to deal with tahsildars and so on; would that not be some guide to etiquette?—To a certain extent.

1531. Outside that, you are not aware of any manuals?—No.

1532. Would you give Collectors any larger powers in regard to the grant of agricultural loans?—I think the powers they have are large enough.

1533. We have had some evidence about Advisory or Administrative Councils; would you be in favour of giving an Advisory Council to a Collector?—I do not think so.

1534. You do not think it is required?—I do not think so. I think that a Collector who wished for advice from men in his district would obtain it independently of a Council.

1535. But if he is a new man would he know quite where to go for advice?—Perhaps he would not know where to go to, but I think by asking his Divisional Officers and the people about him he would soon find out.

1536. It is rather difficult for a new man to distinguish between people who can give good advice and people who are really wind-bags or people who advertise and push themselves or look after their own interests only?—That is the reason why I think it would be difficult to appoint an Advisory Council.

1537. The Advisory Council would be selected by some Collector who knew the district?—You could not be sure of that.

1538. If you are not in favour of an Advisory Council, still less I suppose would you be in favour of a Council which would have quasi-administrative powers?—I do not think it would be a useful institution yet.

1539. Are you in favour of giving larger powers to villages generally?—Of course not to every village; to some villages.

1540. In what directions would you give them larger powers?—In the disposal of petty criminal and civil cases; in matters of sanitation they already have power in the larger unions; as to other matters I am not quite sure what it means.

1541. Is there a union in every village?—I am speaking of village unions; the larger villages always have sanitary arrangements under the Local Funds Acts.

1542. Would you give any power to a panchayat to get a grant and run a school, for instance?—In certain cases it could be done.

1543. Take the case of remissions of revenue; would you make a lump grant of revenue to the village and let the panchayat distribute it?—I do not think that would be desirable.

1544. You think there might be corrupt influences?—Possibly so.

1545. At present you have to rely considerably on the recommendation of the village officials?—Yes, the inspectors and the tahsildar and so on.

1546. If there has been a large loss of crops, of course the village officer can go round and make a rough inspection, but could he make a field-to-field inspection?—He could do that.

1547. Then as regards a field-to-field inspection, is not an applicant at the mercy of the village officer?—If the remission recommended is too small the raiyat has the right to petition the Divisional Officer.

1548. But if the raiyat has got too big a remission he does not petition?—Naturally not.

1549. Do you not think that the panchayat would be deterred by the public opinion of the village from doing injustice?—I do not think there is enough public opinion in most villages to deter them.

1550. With reference to one matter that came up in the examination of Surgeon-General Browne; there was a scheme which went up to the Government of India with regard to the raising of the pay of Hospital Assistants. Can you tell me why that should go up to the Government of India necessarily?—I suppose it was under the Rs. 25,000 rule or something of that sort; I do not know why it went up.

1551. It would have gone up under some financial rule in the Civil Service Regulations?—I suppose so.

1552. If the cost of that measure was over Rs. 25,000, till the other day it would have had to go not merely to the Government of India but to the Secretary of State?—I believe so.

1553. You are also in charge of the Marine Department?—Yes.

1554. You have made some suggestions here about the Port Trusts; you want the sanction of the provincial Government to be sufficient in the matters you refer to without the necessity of going to the Imperial Government?—Yes.

1555. Is there not a great deal of coasting trade that goes on between one province and another?—Yes.

1556. Might there not be discontent if, for instance, the British India Company was to be charged as traders at this port double the amounts charged by Burma or Bengal?—Precisely, but it is sufficient surely to lay down what the maximum port dues may be, and say that they must not be exceeded. Every proposal that is made goes to the Government of India and comes back here after sanction.

1557. You do not want the provincial Government to fix the maximum?—No, we simply want the port dues to be levied at a particular place.

1558. But within the maximum the law prescribes, the provincial Government should have freedom?—I do not see why the provincial Government should not have a free hand; it would not give an advantage to one port as against another.

1559. But does it not cause discontent that a coasting line like the British India finds one rate of port dues in force at one port and another rate in force at another port?—I do not think they would find that to be the case; we group our port dues.

1560. You would let each provincial Government run on their own rates within the maximum laid down in the Act?—No, I do not think I said that. I say impose the leviable port dues at a particular port under section 33.

1561. You agree that the general rate of port dues should be subject to the sanction of the Government of India?—I have no objection to it.

1562. Then as to pilotage fees, do you find that the trade complains as to these?—No, we have not had any complaints. We have altered the pilotage fees for the benefit of the trade in various places.

1563. You do not propose to recommend any addition to the powers now exercised by your own Madras Port Trust?—No.

1564. I find that in Madras, apart from passing the Port Trust budget, the provincial Government have to sanction the construction of all works the cost of which exceeds Rs. 25,000; in Bombay it runs up to 2 lakhs. In Madras I think you have a very experienced engineer as Chairman of the Harbour Trust Board; do you think it is necessary to have this low limit?—I would rather not answer this question, if you do not mind. I think it is necessary to have a limit; I do not wish to give my reasons for saying so.

1565. The sanction of the provincial Government is necessary in case of leases by the Port Trust of immovable property for over ten years?—I believe that is the case; that is a matter of land revenue which will probably be better gone into with the officer in charge of that department.

1566. As far as you are concerned, you do not think the Port Trust needs to have any more powers?—Not at present.

1567. Sir Steyning Edgerley asked you some questions about delegations that you have proposed; as you were saying just now, a number of your suggestions if accepted would involve a change in the law?—That is so.

1568. You are in favour of a general Delegation Act?—I am not in favour of an absolutely general Delegation Act, but the delegation should be limited to different Acts by order.

1569. There are two forms which a General Act might assume; you might put into schedules section 3 of this Act or section 10 of another Act, and say that in all the sections of Acts contained in the schedule the words "subject to the previous sanction of the Governor-General in Council" are repealed; or you might, as I think Sir Steyning Edgerley suggested, say that in any section in which the previous sanction of the Governor-General in Council is required, the Governor-General in Council shall have power to delegate his power to some subordinate authority?—Yes, I should accept the first alternative; I should think that would be the preferable.

The Hon.

1570. The schedule system?—Yes; in order to formulate my reasons specifically, I should have to see the draft Act; but I think as a general rule that appears to be the better arrangement.

1571. The one deals with specific things that you want to relax, and the other gives power to operate in the future; you would rather have the matters specifically set out in the Act?—That, I think, would probably be the better course.

1572. (Mr. Hichens.) With regard to appointments, I understand that the Indian Civil Servant when he comes out to Madras is first of all posted to some district where he learns the language and learns the district work?—Yes.

1573. How long will he be there?—Roughly, until he has passed his second standard.

1574. Will that be two or three years?—Yes; that depends upon the man; he cannot pass under a year and he is not likely to pass under a year and a half.

1575. Then he is eligible to be a Divisional Officer?—Yes.

1576. Do officers go into the Secretariat for a term of years?—Not for a fixed term of years; a man may come into the Secretariat and stay four or five years, and at the end of that time there may be some district promotion open to him, and he goes out.

1577. But if a man gets into the Secretariat, he does not stick there usually for the rest of his time?—No.

1578. Then is it policy for the Government of Madras to get as much diversity of experience amongst the Covenanted Civil Service as possible?—I think an ordinary District Officer gets a very diverse experience.

1579. But they do not view with approval appointing a man to a department and then keeping him there for the rest of his time?—No, it is not done.

1580. But is it purposely not done?—The conditions of service to some extent prevent it, because he gradually comes to get promotion, and his pay will be smaller in his department than if he went back to the ordinary line.

1581. He might go back again, as, let us say, a Sub-Divisional Officer?—Yes.

1582. Then he might go off to some other department?—As a rule, he will then stay and be promoted to a Collector; he may become a District Judge.

1583. The Collector in the district has relations with practically all the departments of the Government?—Practically.

1584. Does that involve a very large amount of secretarial work?—A large amount of correspondence, yes.

1585. Does that take up a large proportion of his time?—It does.

1586. Do you think that could be or should be reduced?—I think it would be very pleasant for the Collector if it could be.

1587. Can you suggest any way in which it could be reduced?—I think if we could gradually reduce the control in some of the ways that have been suggested both by the Government and by members of the Commission, a certain amount of correspondence would disappear.

1588. There is no other way that you can suggest?—Of course, there is a possibility of increasing the number of officers.

1589. Would you recommend that?—In some places it has been done; there is an Additional Joint Magistrate in some districts—certainly in one district at the present moment—to reduce the amount of routine work that falls upon the Collector.

1590. Is it your view that in Madras that principle should be carried further?—I think it should be carried further in one or two places; in fact, it is proposed under a scheme that is known as Mr. Meyer's scheme that it should be done.

1591. (Mr. Dutt.) Have you told us how the departments are distributed between the Governor and the two Members of the Council?—I do not think I have in detail.

1592. Does not the Governor take the Political, the Military, the Public Works, and a few other Departments?—Yes.

1593. Then what does the Senior Member take?—It is not laid down that any department shall be taken by a particular Member. The Senior Member takes now Revenue and Finance; those are the two principal ones; he has Pensions, too. The work is divided from time to time; if a new Member came in it is quite possible that the present arrangement would be altered. The allocation of the departments to the different Members is altered as fresh men come in. For instance, if a new man who came in happened to be a particularly good Revenue Officer, he would probably take over the Revenue; and perhaps, a judicial man, the Judicial from one of the other Members.

1594. And generally all questions referring to his department are disposed of by the Member in charge of that department?—They go to him, and, generally, they are disposed of by him.

1595. Are the more important questions referred to the Council?—Yes; a Member very often refers matters to other Members and they do not go before the Council, but the more important ones go before the Council.

1596. There is no fixed rule as to what is to go before the Council?—No.

1597. It depends on the discretion of the Members?—It depends on the discretion of the Members and of the Secretaries. A Secretary can lay things before the Council. For instance, if a whole Government Order has been superseded by an order of a single officer, it has to go to two Members. There are rules of that sort laid down in print. In a particular question if the Secretary thinks necessary he refers it to the Member and says, "I think it ought to go to Council," and the Member says yes or no to it.

1598. Then most of these questions are disposed of by one Member of Council, and "the order of the Government" merely means the order of one Member of Council?—Yes, the other Members see them, or rather they know what orders have been passed; they do not see them till afterwards.

1599. Is there any rule as to what matters should go up from the Board of Revenue to the Member of the Council in charge of the Revenue Department?—All things that come from the Board of Revenue go first to the Member in charge of the Revenue Department as a matter of course.

1600. But the Board have definite powers for the disposal of certain matters themselves?—Yes.

1601. And those that they cannot dispose of themselves they refer to the Member of the Council?—Yes.

1602. Are these powers laid down in any rule or code?—Not in any particular rule or Code; they come into the various laws and Standing Orders, but there is no single Code covering all the subjects.

1603. There are four members of the Board?—Yes.

1604. One of them is in charge of Forests?—Yes, he deals with Forests and Land Revenue.

1605. Then another is in charge of Surveys?—There is one member in charge of Survey and

The Hon.

Bradley.

Settlement and Agriculture; Famine goes to him when famine occurs, and all the miscellaneous departments.

1606. Has the member in charge of forests anything to do with pasture lands and common grazing fields?—Yes.

1607. Is it a fact that in olden days every village had its common pasture lands?—I am very doubtful about it; I should think not. I should think in many parts of the country there were no pasture lands, but of course it is impossible to say. There are many places where there is still village pasture land.

1608. Have many of these pasture lands been now included within forest areas?—I cannot tell you.

1609. You would not say that that is not the case, speaking from your general knowledge?—I do not think that many village communal lands have been included in the reserve forests.

1610. Has any difficulty been felt by the villagers in pasturing their cattle because of the absence of communal village lands?—I can hardly say that.

1611. Who is the member of the Board in charge of Irrigation?—Irrigation goes to the member of the Board who has to deal with land revenue.

1612. Major irrigation works are in charge of the Public Works Department?—Yes.

1613. And what you call minor irrigation works are in charge of the Collector's Department?—Yes.

1614. Do you think that the Public Works Department have sufficient control over the major irrigation works for the varying requirements of the people?—I think it could be improved.

1615. Are there small irrigation works which you call in Madras kudimaramat?—You can hardly call them kudimaramat—they are minor irrigation works—river channels, or where a temporary dam is made half across a river and the river is diverted into the channels.

1616. Who is generally in charge of these works?—The tahsildars or the revenue officers.

1617. These would be works that go through several villages?—Sometimes.

1618. Would you give the village unions any share in the charge of those works?—No, I would not.

1619. Not even when they are entirely situated in one area?—Then I might; I think a satisfactory way to the villagers would be for a cess to be levied on every landholder in the village, and to have the work done under the tahsildar.

1620. You would not object to that being done by village unions?—I would object to its being made as a rigid necessity and having no other way of providing for it; but I think at places and at times it might be done by the village authority in small matters, and in many of them it is already done.

1621. Is there not a system of seasonal remissions in Madras?—You mean crop remissions?

1622. Yes, remissions in the case of calamities?—I do not think you can call them seasonal remissions here. You mean widespread calamities, cases of famine causing distress.

1623. In those cases has the Board power to make remissions?—I cannot answer that off-hand; I have never had to deal with that myself; I have never been in charge of land revenue in a season that has been bad.

1624. Would you have any objection to the Board exercising that power as they do in Bengal and some other provinces?—I do not think there is any objection to the Board doing it, providing that they keep Government informed of it; that is practically what the present system is.

1625. I understood you to say yesterday that under the tahsildar there are some minor charges, until you come down to the village union itself. Would you let me know what they are?—There is the deputy tahsildar and the revenue inspector.

1626. The deputy tahsildar usually has charge of a portion of a taluk?—Yes.

1627. What is the charge of a revenue inspector?—Also a portion of a taluk—a number of villages together; there are more inspectors than deputy tahsildars.

1628. Are the revenue inspectors under the deputy tahsildars?—Some.

1629. And some under the tahsildars?—Yes.

1630. Do the tahsildars always exercise judicial powers?—No. They all have magisterial powers—practically all—but they only exercise them in cases specially requiring them. The deputy tahsildar as a rule has magisterial powers.

1631. What is the pay of the deputy tahsildar?—Rupees 100 and 120.

1632. The revenue inspectors have no magisterial powers?—No.

1633. Does the deputy tahsildar generally try criminal cases?—Yes.

1634. Do you find it necessary that they should try criminal cases according to the present arrangement?—Most certainly.

1635. I am asking you this question because there is a difference between this province and Bengal. In Bengal we have generally no magistrates below the Sub-Divisional Officer, but you find it necessary here?—It is necessary at present.

1636. Do you think that that interferes with the revenue duties of the deputy tahsildar?—I do not.

1637. Do you think it helps his revenue duties?—I do.

1638. You think that the exercise of his criminal powers helps him in the discharge of his revenue duties?—Yes.

1639. In what way does it help him?—He does his revenue work more efficiently; it gives him a wider knowledge of the country and the people.

1640. He would not have that wider knowledge unless he tried such cases?—He might, but when a man goes and tries a case in a village he finds out a great deal about the people of the village that he might not hear at all as a mere revenue officer.

1641. Does it help him at all because he enjoys some prestige by the exercise of criminal powers?—I dare say it does.

1642. By whom is the village munsif appointed?—He is appointed by the Divisional Officer, that is the Sub, Head Assistant, or Deputy, Collector, under rules prescribed by Government.

1643. You said you would rather have cases tried by Benches than by single village magistrates?—Yes, if Benches could be constituted.

1644. In that case would you recommend that the cases should go to the members of a village union where there was one established?—I have not thought about it at all, but I imagine some members of the village union might very properly be upon the Bench.

1645. That experiment has been tried in other provinces?—We have not got it here; we do not make a Bench out of the members of the village union.

1646. You think it is quite possible?—Oh, yes; and some of the members of the village union might be members of the village Bench.

1647. You said that you would generally allow only one appeal?—Yes.

1648. That is to say in the case of an order passed by the deputy tahsildar you would allow an appeal to the tahsildar and no other?—In most cases the appeal would lie to the Divisional Officer.

1649. You would not allow it to go any further?—I should not as a rule allow it to go any further.

1650. Take the case of a higher official. In the case of a man in the Civil Service who was degraded by Government order, would you allow an appeal only to the Government of India and no higher?—I do not think it would be necessary to go higher.

1651. Do you think that this restriction of appeal would be at all popular in the country?—I do not think it would be unpopular if understood; I think they would be quite ready to accept it.

*The Hon.
Mr. H.
Bradley.*

23 Nov., 1907.

1652. Do you think it would help to improve the administration?—I think so.

1653. You think there is a necessity for restricting appeals?—I think there is a great deal too much appeal now.

1654. What evil would you say is caused by it?—The evil that the same facts have to be tried over and over again by two or three different tribunals.

1655. That means only a little additional work?—I think it means a great deal.

1656. That is the only argument against second and third appeals that occurs to you?—Yes. If you can trust your officers to hear an appeal I think you do not want to go any further.

1657. Do you think there would be the same feeling of security among the people if you restrict the right of appeal?—Yes, I think so.

1658. You do not think it would be an unpopular measure if you restrict the number of appeals?—I do not.

1659. I understand you to say that generally you would like some additional devolution of powers to Local Boards in some way?—I think it is possible.

1660. And it might be beneficial?—Yes.

1661. With regard to the creation of Advisory Boards, you are against that?—As suggested here, yes.

1662. Do you not think that in certain matters these Advisory Boards would be of help to the Collector?—I have not seen them working.

1663. Of course, we have not got them here yet?—As far as I can see, I am against them.

1664. Could you not have some proper officers appointed from every district for consultation?—The whole point is that word "proper."

1665. I mean men selected by the Government and elected by the people for the purpose of consultation in such matters as those with which the people themselves are likely to be acquainted. Do you not think the Collector would get some help and information from them which would be useful to him?—I think the Collector could obtain help and information which would be useful to him without having an Advisory Board appointed.

1666. But if an Advisory Board was constituted would it not be likely that he would more frequently consult them than he does now?—I cannot offer any opinion on that; I have not seen the system at work; it is all hypothetical.

1667. In plague relief measures would not the Collector receive great help from a few members selected by the people in carrying out his measures, and also in testing the real feelings of the people?—I think he would, but I do not think that the few men who would be able to do that would necessarily be those who would be on the Board selected before the plague occurred; I think it would be much better to allow the Collector to select his men at the time; he would be much more likely to get the real feelings of the people than by consulting a Board that had been selected or appointed before the occasion arose.

1668. Then you would recommend that whenever plague breaks out the Collector should consult the people of the district?—I would let him consult if he thought he could do so with advantage.

1669. You would lay down no rule on the subject?—No.

1670. Some Collectors might consult and some not?—Just so.

1671. You would leave it entirely in their own hands?—Yes.

1672. Do you not think that the creation of Advisory Boards would make the administration more popular? If the people felt that there was some confidence reposed in them and that they were sometimes consulted, would not the administration of the Collector be more popular?—I cannot offer an opinion.

1673. Would you advise the creation of some Boards experimentally in some districts?—No. I do not think I should.

1674. Then if it is not done experimentally and you cannot offer an opinion until you see it at work, how will you ever be able to offer an opinion?—I should ask the Collectors to try the experiment themselves, without fixing any particular persons to be consulted on any particular occasions.

1675. Would you leave the District Officers to form or not to form these Boards according to their discretion?—I should think a District Officer would be very foolish to form a Board that would bind him about anything; I should say to the District Officer, "You know the men in your district; if anything arises in any particular place you will consult such persons as you think advisable at that place and at that time." I think that a Board to whom the Collector would be bound to go would be a most dangerous thing.

1676. You have put forward a recommendation for the enlargement of the powers of the Board of Revenue and of District Officers, and I understood you to say that for the purpose of such enlargement many provisions of the Civil Service Regulations might be extended?—Yes.

1677. Amongst the authorities to which greater freedom should be given do you not think that you should include village communities?—Can you give me an instance of a power that you would like to see extended to them?

1678. I would leave that to you, because you are better acquainted with Madras. I simply ask, as you are in favour of extending powers to the subordinates of the Local Government, are there not any directions in which you would similarly give enlarged powers to village bodies?—The village union is a matter which comes under the Local and Municipal Acts, and it is provided for by the Local Funds Act.

1679. (Sir Frederic Lely.) Is there not a class of cases which come to the Government and are disposed of by the Under Secretary?—Yes.

1680. Would there be any objection to an order transferring all those cases in a body to the Collectors or to the Heads of Departments?—I think there might be objection.

1681. A selection would have to be made?—A selection would certainly have to be made.

1682. But it is not clear why if a case can be decided by an Under Secretary, a man of 4 or 5 years' experience, it should not be decided by a man of 25 years' experience?—It first of all has to be decided whether it is in accordance with precedent by the Member who is in charge of the particular portfolio.

1683. A man who has access to the records?—Yes; things which are in accordance with precedent are passed in that way by the Assistant Secretaries; such things as passing magisterial powers for instance.

1684. Then as to examinations in languages. Do you consider that the language test is a satisfactory one?—I do not think the present High Proficiency and Honours tests are satisfactory.

1685. But the ordinary test?—The ordinary test—the standard test—is a satisfactory one, but the High Proficiency and Honours tests are not.

1686. Those are not compulsory?—No.

1687. There is no suspicion that the examiners are over lenient?—I have not heard that suspicion mooted.

1688. I understand that you do not claim that the provincial Government should be the only body in India not under control; you make no such claim as that?—No.

1689. As a matter of fact, the Madras Government, I suppose, allows its Board of Revenue a very wide field in which it does not interfere?—Yes.

1690. Is it not part of the theory of decentralization that you should allow more latitude to these subordinate bodies?—The theory of decentralization, I suppose, is to that effect.

1691. That the Madras Government should allow more latitude to its subordinates and in its turn receive more latitude from the Government of India within certain restrictions?—Yes.

1692. You are not prepared to lay down those restrictions exactly?—No.

1693. But you think it would be possible to lay them down?—It would be a difficult business to lay them down in detail. I think the thing will have to crystallise itself. After some rules have been drawn up, it will be found that they will have to be altered and so on; I do not think you could do it all at once.

1694. Then as to the question of the interference of the Government of India when the provincial budget is sent up for their sanction. I understand you do not object to changes in particular items. For instance, suppose a budget is sent up showing a gross expenditure of 4 crores, you do not object to paper changes in the budget providing the gross expenditure as sent up is not interfered with?—They do interfere considerably.

1695. They interfere with the 4 crores; they reduce it to 3½ crores?—I do not say that the Government of India reduce it to 3½ crores, but I do think that alterations in individual grants might interfere with the work of the province.

1696. But if the gross expenditure sanctioned remains at 4 crores, and if the provincial Government has power to transfer from one head to another, there would be no difficulty and you would not object to that at all?—No.

1697. What you do object to is making changes in the gross expenditure?—No—making changes in the details when we cannot reappropriate at all.

1698. If you have the right to reappropriate you have no objection at all?—No.

1699. As to Inspectors-General, you would agree that a fifth wheel in the coach is presumably an encumbrance?—Yes, on general principles.

1700. It is not worth while to impose uniformity for its own sake?—I do not think that uniformity ought to be aimed at in such a large country as this; strict uniformity is impossible.

1701. A particular change may be theoretically for the best, but in practice it would not be for the best, is that what you would say?—It may be theoretically, and in practice, the best for one province, but not in practice the best for another province.

1702. Do you remember some years ago Mr. Buckland being sent down by the Government of Bengal to enquire into excise matters?—I remember his being in Madras; I do not know what he was here about.

1703. He was an officer well versed in provincial arrangements in Bengal and he went down and studied every other province; would you think that a good arrangement to make?—Yes; I do not think it would be necessary for him to go to every province.

1704. Would you prefer that system to having a permanent Inspector-General?—I should prefer it.

1705. You object to a provincial Government being authorized to raise loans?—I do not think I objected; I said I did not think it was necessary.

1706. Take the case of a rupee loan—it is only proposed, I believe, in the case of rupee loans. Suppose the case of an irrigation work in a certain district; do you not think that if the provincial Government had power to raise a local rupee loan it would stimulate local sentiment as well as bring out hoards in the district itself which probably would never be touched for an imperial loan?—I have not heard of such a thing happening, and I do not think so.

1707. As to excise, you mentioned that a Collector if he is a good man exercises a good deal of authority in excise matters. Is there any excise authority between the Collector and the Board of Revenue?—No, there is no one superior to the Collector. There is an authority between the inspector who runs the details of excise work in the district and the Board of Revenue, but he is not under the Collector.

1708. Then if the Collector interferes in excise matters, is he not likely rather to clash with that person?—I do not think so.

1709. Do you not think it would be a good thing to put him under the Collector?—I do not think it is necessary to put him under the Collector.

1710. Is it not true that in Madras as a rule Collectors are very greatly overwhelmed with work?—They are heavily worked.

1711. The administrative divisions that now exist are the same as have existed for many years past?—In my knowledge there have been a great many alterations; since I came to the country there have been many alterations.

1712. In the direction of providing Collectors with greater help?—Yes.

1713. Is there not now a great deal of work thrown on the Collector immediately without any assistance?—Of course he has a great deal of work.

1714. As to the Court of Wards work the Sub-Collector has nothing to do with that?—It depends on the Collector; the Collector can employ him on anything that he wishes.

1715. In all estates under the Court of Wards they require a certain number of agents or officers? There is an agent, I suppose, appointed to manage every considerable estate?—Yes.

1716. Is he not a very low paid man?—On a considerable estate he will not be a low paid man; some of them are on pretty high pay.

1717. But usually he is low paid—he is a man without any qualifications?—It depends upon the size of the estate.

1718. I am thinking of the average estate. What I am trying to get at is this; does not the working of the Court of Wards throw on the Collector a great deal of detail work which he ought to be able to leave to the Sub-Divisional Officer?—It does throw a lot of work upon him.

1719. Then as to irrigation tanks. Is the Collector not responsible for the maintenance of most irrigation tanks?—The Public Works Department is responsible for the maintenance of some—I cannot say most, because there are petty tanks in every village, but the main irrigation works are under the Public Works Department.

1720. You mean the larger ones?—Large and small. The greater number and the greater revenue and everything of irrigation works is under the Public Works Department.

1721. But does not the Collector take charge of a great many of these small tanks and has he not a subordinate engineering staff under him?—In some districts.

1722. That is unsuitable work for the Collector surely?—It is a matter of opinion.

1723. It involves the Collector in examining and signing estimates for every little petty work?—The Collector does not always do it himself.

1724. But he is responsible for it?—Yes.

1725. And he has to sign the estimates?—I do not think the Collector personally signs them.

1726. Anyhow he is responsible for the work?—Yes.

1727. Is it not true that all the roads are practically in charge of the Collector?—The roads are in charge of the Boards, who usually employ a Local Fund Engineer.

1728. Is he an efficient man?—I do not know many who have been inefficient.

1729. Is he a man who could be trusted to make estimates and measure up the work and so on?—As a rule.

1730. Are they a reliable trustworthy set of men?—Some of them are thoroughly reliable.

1731. Is not the general effect of this direct responsibility over roads to throw on the Collector a very large addition to his work?—It is a considerable portion of the Collector's work.

1732. You have been in charge of several districts and you know the village unions no doubt?—Yes.

1733. You have been asked how it would be possible to extend their power. Have they at present any power to execute Local Fund works?—I do not think so.

1734. Suppose Rs. 500 is sanctioned for a well, the work is not given to the villagers to do?—No.

1735. An outsider is employed to do it?—A contractor, not necessarily a villager.

1736. What would you say to an arrangement like this, that if the Local Board allotted, say, Rs. 500 for making a new well, the Rs. 500 should be handed over to the village panchayat to spend the whole entirely under their control?—I think it would require supervision; I do not think it could be done safely.

1737. It could not be done on the understanding that if they mis-spent the money they would never get any more?—I am inclined to think that many village communities would never get any more.

1738. Do you not think that after a few experiments they would be able to undertake such matters? They build their own field wells?—Those are very often inspected and watched; all those that are built with loans.

1739. There are many that are built without loans?—Yes.

1740. Do you not think the experiment might be tried?—I think it might certainly be tried in certain villages. I have very little doubt that something of the kind has been tried in various places in larger villages and in unions.

1741. Do you think it would be advisable in the forest areas to hand over to villages a certain tract of land to be run as a village forest; has that ever been done to your knowledge?—Not in a forest area; I have known an arrangement under which certain produce of the grazing lands of a village was allowed to be collected by the villagers and sold to form a common fund for some village purpose.

1742. That was under close control?—It was intended to be under close control; it began in my time in one large district; I believe it was found unsatisfactory.

1743. Would you advocate an experiment of that kind?—I think the experiment might be tried. It was tried in the case I am thinking of; I do not know what the result was, but I know that it is not going on now, and I take it it was not satisfactory.

1744. (Chairman.) Have you asked the Government of India for sanction for an increase, however small, in the numbers of your police?—Just at present we are in a state of flux in connection with the Police Commission; we are going on increasing on the lines the Police Commission laid down, without consulting the Government of India, under the general sanction given by the Government of India in consequence of the Police Commission. We have not worked up to the limit.

1745. A good many cases were cited to you in which action by the Central Government was necessary on account of the intervention of the Secretary of State. I suppose your point of view would be that the powers which you ask for might be granted to you even though under special rules they might necessitate the control of the Government of India and of the Secretary of State?—I think they might safely be granted.

1746. And your view is that both these restrictions should be removed—both in respect of pensions and in respect of the increase of establishments?—Yes.

1747. How is the Secretariat of the Government of India recruited so far as you are concerned?—They occasionally write down here and ask for a particular man; sometimes they write and ask for a man.

1748. How do they get knowledge of the particular man?—That I cannot tell you. They took away my Secretary once when I was a member of the Board.

1749. Sometimes they consult you and sometimes they do not?—They sometimes ask for men. When they took my Secretary they did not consult me; they wrote to me and said, will you send up Mr. So-and-So.

1750. And of course you had no power to refuse practically?—No, and of course one would not stand in the way of a man's promotion.

1751. When the Government of India are asked for the preparation of a statement of opinion upon questions which affect Local Governments, whatever advice they may receive from their Secretariat at headquarters, do they consult the Local Governments before giving their opinion?—I think as a rule they consult the Local Governments—they do generally I think.

1752. I thought you gave us a case of a Committee which had just been sitting in which you said that no reference had been made to the Government of Madras?—That was the Stores Committee; I had no personal knowledge of it.

1753. As a matter of fact, does not the Government of India communicate with you saying "Such and such questions have been asked of us and we shall be glad to have your views upon this question"?—Yes, I think so in most cases.

1754. Practically the Local Governments do get sufficiently consulted before the Government of India reply to the Secretary of State?—I think so. Very often we are not told why we are asked, but these questions are generally referred to the Local Governments, I believe.

1755. Then when the Government of India appoint Committees to enquire into certain subjects—reformatories and things of that kind—they do as a matter of fact refer to Local Governments for information?—The Committees do.

1756. Not the Government of India?—They send and inform us that a certain Committee is going to sit and will visit the Presidency at such and such a time, and ask us to help them.

1757. Practically, in consequence of their referring different subjects—one sanitation, another education, and so on—has the whole of the municipal budget to be scattered about the various departments of the Secretariat?—No; the budget passes through the Sanitary Commissioner and he makes his recommendations; then the Local and Municipal Department deal with them within the limits of the funds of the municipality.

1758. But there are questions of education which are in the municipal budget?—Education is in the same department.

1759. Water would be the same?—The water-supply would fall under sanitation.

1760. It is practically confined to one department?—Except with regard to financial business. If the budget affects any department other than the Municipal Department, it is sent to that department so that notes may be made on it.

1761. Do you know of any Government of any country which attempts to regulate all the port dues of its various ports?—I have no knowledge of such a thing.

1762. Would it not be more probable that the necessity of attracting trade would always make the port authorities keep their dues as low as possible owing to the competition of one port with another?—You are speaking of such a port as this or Bombay, but many of these ports here are places where the whole value of the trade is less than a couple of thousand rupees. The local authorities have nothing to do with the port dues there; they are practically uniform throughout; in almost all cases they are covered by entry at a bigger port. The truth really is that they are covered by the port dues paid at the larger port.

1763. And the dues at the larger port are regulated by economic requirements?—Yes.

1764. (Mr. Meyer.) You have the Madras Act of 1873 which relates to your Civil Courts?—Yes.

1765. Does not that Act oblige you to go up to the Government of India whenever you want an additional district munsif even temporarily?—There is an Act which obliges that.

1766. Although under the general financial rules you might appoint a permanent additional munsif up to Rs. 250 a month you have to go up to the Government of India under this Act?—That Act is included in one of the lists as one that we should like to do away with in so far as it embodies that provision.

1767. Similarly as regards the Provincial Small Causes Court Act of 1887, it requires that the sanction of the Governor-General in Council shall be obtained to the general establishment in connection with local Small Causes Court?—Yes, I could multiply them ad libitum.

1768. Have you included in your list the Registration Act, section 14?—I do not know whether it is in the lists that you have got so far.

(The witness withdrew.)

THIRD DAY.

MADRAS, Monday, November 25th, 1907.

PRESENT :

C. E. H. HOBHOUSE, Esq., M.P., Under Secretary of State for India, Chairman.

Sir FREDERIC LELY, K.C.I.E., C.S.I.

Sir STEYNING EDGERLEY, K.C.V.O., C.I.E., I.C.S.

R. C. DUTT, Esq., C.I.E.

W. S. MEYER, Esq., C.I.E., I.C.S.

W. L. HICHENS, Esq.

Lieut.-Colonel H. THOMSON was called and examined.

1769. (Chairman.) You are Sanitary Commissioner of Madras?—Yes.

1770. Will you state briefly the organization of your department?—The organization of the Sanitary Commissioner's office is as follows :—

The Sanitary Commissioner : one Deputy Sanitary Commissioner and Inspector of Vaccination.

The Executive staff under my control consists of 82 Deputy Inspectors of Vaccination—77 in the districts in charge of as many ranges, and 5 employed as Assistant Superintendents in the King Institute of Preventive Medicine, Guindy.

The Sanitary staff throughout the Presidency, not directly under my control, consists of 22 District Medical and Sanitary Officers under the orders of the Surgeon-General : seven Sanitary Assistants recruited from the Assistant Surgeon grade under the orders of the Presidents, District Boards, as assistants to the District Medical and Sanitary Officers of seven districts : 178 qualified sanitary inspectors employed by municipalities : 34 qualified sanitary inspectors employed by eleven District Boards.

The duties of the Sanitary Commissioner are :—

(a) To advise Government and local bodies on matters relating to sanitation, vaccination and vital statistics.

(b) To advise the Sanitary Board on questions relating to sanitation, that is, schemes for water-supply and drainage and other sanitary works, such as, the laying out of village-sites, construction of hospitals, markets, slaughter-houses, etc.

(c) The inspection of municipalities, reports on which are submitted to Government through the Chairman of the municipal Council, and the Collector of the district concerned.

1771. Your duties are to advise the Government on matters relating to sanitary matters generally?—Yes.

1772. To advise the Sanitary Board generally?—Yes.

1773. And you inspect municipalities from time to time to see whether their sanitary condition is satisfactory?—Yes.

1774. Does the same duty of inspecting the districts under the control of the District Boards rest upon you?—No, I can inspect them, but it is usually the Deputy who inspects them.

1775. You order one of your Deputies to inspect them?—I have only one Deputy ; I order him to inspect them—not the larger ones, but the smaller ones.

1776. You are responsible for him?—I have to supervise his work.

1777. By whom were you appointed?—I was appointed by the Government of Madras.

1778. Not by the Central Government?—No.

1779. With regard to the Deputy Sanitary Commissioner what are his relations to you?—He is subordinate in every way to me.

1780. And his duties are practically to do what he is told by you?—He is Inspector of Vaccination and Deputy Sanitary Commissioner ; his duties are chiefly connected with vaccination.

1781. Are you through him in touch with the Collectors of districts?—I am in direct touch with all Collectors.

1782. Not through him, but personally?—Personally.

1783. Then with regard to the municipalities and District Boards do you, or does he, attend their meetings?—No, we do not attend the meetings of District Boards.

1784. To whom in the provincial Government do you report your proceedings ; I suppose you have a yearly report?—Yes ; I am under the Local and Municipal Department.

1785. And you correspond with the Secretary?—With the Secretary direct.

1786. Has the correspondence with the provincial Government increased very much since you have held the office, or the reverse?—I think it is much the same.

1787. Their control over you is neither less nor more than it was when you took office?—No.

1788. How long have you held your present position?—I was appointed in April 1906. I was three or four months before that acting for Colonel King.

1789. There has been no noticeable increase in correspondence?—No.

Lt.-Col.
H. Thomson.
25 Nov., 1907.

*Lt.-Col.
H. Thomson.*

25 Nov., 1907.

1790. No tightening up of the control over you?—No.

1791. Have you considered at all whether there are, or are not, any powers which might be usefully delegated to you by the provincial Government which would enable you more satisfactorily to carry out your duties of supervising the sanitation of the Presidency?—No, I do not think so, except in the matter of staff; I have only one Deputy; I think there ought to be more Deputies under me.

1792. You think that another Deputy would be useful?—One or two.

1793. But, so far as regards the mere delegation of authority or influence or power, you have nothing to say?—No.

1794. You have a free hand?—I have a free hand except over these sanitary inspectors in municipalities and districts; they are not under me; they are under the control of the local bodies; I have nothing to say to their appointment, their punishment, or anything else. If they are punished, the punishment is reported to me by the local body. I have the power of suspending their certificates. I have to keep a register of these sanitary inspectors, and when a man is appointed the local bodies refer to my office as to whether there is anything against him. Any sanitary inspector whose pay is Rs. 50 and over can appeal to Government through the Sanitary Commissioner.

1795. If you find that you have to punish?—I do not punish them except by suspension of their certificates after enquiry.

1796. Is there any appeal against that power of suspension?—Yes; to Government.

1797. What pay do these sanitary inspectors get, whom you can thus suspend without further appeal?—I can suspend no one without the right of appeal to Government.

1798. Do you attend the meetings of the Sanitary Board and give them advice?—I do not attend their meetings; I give them advice.

1799. They write to you?—All proposals from District Boards and municipalities come first to me, and I forward them direct to the Secretary of the Sanitary Board, or through the Sanitary Engineer to the Board.

1800. We had it in evidence the other day that the Sanitary Board have no power of decision. Have you as Sanitary Commissioner for Madras found that the necessity of sending your communications through the Board delayed you in your work?—They have power of decision up to a certain amount. On the recommendation of the District Medical and Sanitary Officer the municipalities and District Boards can carry out a work if under Rs. 1,000; if it is over Rs. 1,000 it must come to the Sanitary Commissioner, and up to Rs. 10,000 it can be decided by the Sanitary Board; they can pass anything under that amount.

1801. After that they go up to Government?—They must go to Government.

1802. Have you any power of decision?—I have no power of decision; I advise.

1803. Do you think it would delay proceedings, or would it help the municipalities or District Boards, if you had the power of decision?—I do not think it would help; I do not think many things are delayed.

1804. On the whole, so far as Madras is concerned, the Sanitary Commissioner has all reasonable freedom and power?—I think so.

1805. Would such experience as you have got in seeing these smaller schemes coming from smaller municipalities or District Boards lead you to think that, if they had greater freedom in sanitary matters, business would be done better and more quickly?—I do not think so.

1806. Do you think that the present limit of Rs. 1,000 is sufficiently high?—That is quite sufficient, and very often it is misspent as it is.

1807. You do not think that if greater power was given, although mistakes might be made, that would gradually lead to a sense of greater responsibility?—It might do that, but there are so few to advise them; the staff that they have at their disposal to advise them in matters of sanitation is so limited—I mean the trained staff.

1808. But supposing the staff was the same and so forth, do you think that the exercise of rather larger powers would gradually lead to an improvement in their way of looking at things?—I do not think so; I do not think there is a tendency towards improvement all through, as a rule.

1809. With regard to your relations with the Sanitary Commissioner to the Government of India. Do you correspond with him directly?—I cannot correspond with him directly; I must inform Government of any communications.

1810. Do you send a copy to the Secretary of the Local and Municipal Department?—Yes.

1811. Have you found during your substantially two years' tenure of office that there has been a tendency on the part of the Sanitary Commissioner to the Government of India to interfere more directly with your administration?—No.

1812. Do you find him a valuable officer so far as you are concerned; does he give you good advice and make valuable suggestions?—I have had no dealings with him.

1813. He does not come in contact with you one way or the other?—No.

1814. Do you think that the creation of a Sanitary Commissioner to the Government of India has in any way affected the Presidency of Madras either for good or for evil?—I cannot say that it has affected it very much. I remember one very good report that he wrote; his annual returns are very full and interesting, and they are a help to any one reading them.

1815. The experience which he puts together in his reports has suggested ideas which might not have occurred to a provincial Sanitary Commissioner?—Yes, touring about as he does, he of course collects a great deal of experience. He came down through Madras last year and saw me here, but he has no official relations with me.

1816. Did he let you know he was coming?—Yes.

1817. And you toured together?—No, I did not tour; he visited the Government here, and at the same time he saw me.

1818. Then did he tour through the province?—No, he went back to Calcutta I believe.

1819. Do you think that the same result, or the passing of ideas from province to province, might be arrived at by, say, an annual conference of the Sanitary Commissioners in the different provinces meeting at some common centre?—I think it would be a great assistance.

1820. Do you think that that should take place as a substitute for, or in addition to, the appointment of a Sanitary Commissioner to the Government of India?—If there is a Sanitary Commissioner to the Government of India he can go through the provinces and he sees things for himself, whereas if we met we could only talk about things; he could put altogether what his views are and what he has seen; he could advise, and his advice would be valuable I consider.

1821. You would like to see an annual conference of the Sanitary Commissioners of the different provinces?—Yes.

1822. With the Chair taken by the Sanitary Commissioner to the Government of India?—Yes.

1823. (Mr. Hitchens.) Does the Sanitary Commissioner to the Government of India ask for many returns from you?—No, I do not think I have sent him many returns.

1824. With regard to your relations to the District Boards and the municipalities, I understand you to say that the sanitary inspectors of the municipalities and District Boards are not under your direct control?—No.

1825. The only way in which you have relations with them is that they have the power of appeal to you?—They have no power of appeal to me. When I go and inspect municipalities I draw attention to any defects I see. I cannot put sanitary inspectors who have been punished back to their places. They can forward their explanation of a punishment; I have to make a record of the punishment, and if I consider that the punishment was wrongly dealt, I need not make any record against them or suspend their certificates.

1826. If a sanitary inspector is to be taken for any district must he be taken from your register?—Yes, he must be qualified; there is a list of them that we keep in our office.

1827. And if one of them is struck off that register through a misdeed then he cannot be employed by a District Board or municipality?—No; on the appointment of a sanitary inspector, the Local Body refers the matter to my office to see if there is anything against the man; they will not appoint him unless that reference is made to me.

1828. How does a man qualify to get on that register?—He must pass through the Medical College and be qualified in hygiene and physiology with a smattering of bacteriology.

1829. Is it necessary that that register should be kept?—I think so.

1830. In order to secure efficiency in the work of the district?—Yes, that is the only control I have over them.

1831. Have you any relations with the Civil Surgeons?—You mean the District Medical and Sanitary Officers?

1832. Yes.—They are Sanitary Officers; they are not under me, but they make tours throughout the district and report to me on the different villages they visit.

1833. Do they take orders from you?—No.

1834. But if you want any inspection made by them?—I can write to them demi-officially, but I cannot order them.

1835. You have to do it through the Surgeon-General?—Yes.

1836. Is that a convenient arrangement?—Well, I have been a District Medical and Sanitary Officer myself, and I know that the duties of a Medical and Sanitary Officer are such that he has little time to give to sanitary work. He has the whole of the hospitals to look after, and usually a jail also to superintend.

1837. In fact, you can get very little out of him?—Very little; I get a report, and from the reports sent to me I extract what I think is of importance and send it to the body it is concerned with, and ask them what they intend to do upon his report.

1838. In fact, you have to rely almost entirely on yourself and your Deputy?—Yes; lately there has been a different class of officer given to the District Medical and Sanitary Officer to assist him, called a Sanitary Assistant. He is taken from the grade of Assistant Surgeons, and he is directly under the control of the President of the District Board; he is selected and appointed by the Surgeon-General. His duty is to tour in the district and report on the condition of vaccination, birth and death registration, and the improvement of rural sanitation. He reports to the President on the visits that he makes. A copy of the report with the remarks of the President is forwarded to me; upon anything that I find worthy of note I communicate again with the President and ask him what he intends to do, and upon his reply I inform the Sanitary Assistant and the District Medical and Sanitary Officer. This is quite a new thing. It is more to keep in touch with the reorganization of the Vaccination Department that is now under trial. There are seven of these officers appointed to seven different districts—only seven—it is under trial at present; but he is an Assistant to the District Medical and Sanitary Officer because his duty is to be always on the move in his district; he is never supposed to remain at headquarters.

1839. Do you find in practice with regard to schemes of sanitation that the initiative is taken by you, or is it taken by the District Board, or is it taken by the Collector of the district? Let me put it in this way: is it generally the case that a Collector writes up to you in the name of his district and says "We think that a certain scheme ought to be taken in hand here, and we shall be glad to have your opinion about it."—No, very seldom.

1840. What usually happens is that you tour round, and you point out to the Collector or to the District Board, as the case may be, a certain defect in their system and you recommend that it should be put right?—Yes, and make suggestions very often to the District Medical and Sanitary Officer; that is in the districts out in the mufassal, away from the big towns—in small villages.

1841. In the municipalities you yourself suggest things?—Yes.

1842. What is the procedure; to whom do you make suggestions?—In my inspection report and in a special letter to Government on any large scheme. Usually it is all contained in my inspection report, which is sent through the Chairman of the municipality and by him forwarded to the Collector, who forwards it to the Government with the remarks of each as it goes along.

1843. Then is it referred to the Sanitary Board?—If there is anything to be done upon it, it is then referred to the Sanitary Board.

1844. (Mr. Dutt.) You spoke of a very valuable report published by the Sanitary Commissioner to the Government of India?—It is an annual report.

1845. How many have been published up to date?—I think the first one was in 1904 or 1905; there have been two or three.

1846. The Sanitary Commissioner to the Government of India is a sort of adviser to the Government of India in sanitary matters?—Yes.

1847. Does the Government of India ever issue instructions or advice to provincial Governments based on these annual reports?—Not as yet, I think.

1848. You have told us that every district has got a District Medical and Sanitary Officer?—Yes, there are 22 of them.

1849. They are Civil Surgeons?—Yes.

1850. Besides their medical duties?—They are supposed to inspect all municipalities, unions, and principal villages; they cannot do them all, but as they inspect them they have to send a report to me on sanitary matters.

1851. They visit a good many of them every year?—Yes.

1852. Do you find that they generally inspect all the municipalities in a district every year?—The municipalities, as a rule, yes.

1853. Of course the number of villages would be too large to be visited every year?—Oh, yes.

1854. You have spoken of seven Sanitary Assistants to the District Medical and Sanitary Officers, appointed as a sort of trial by the District Boards?—They are appointed by Government.

1855. They work under the District Boards?—Under the President of the District Board.

1856. Are they not under the orders of the District Boards?—They are under the orders of the President, and that will be under the orders of the District Board, I suppose.

1857. Is their pay paid by the District Boards or by the Government when they are working as Assistants to the District Medical and Sanitary Officers?—I think they are paid by the District Board, or they would not be under the orders of the President of the District Board.

1858. They have as yet only appointed seven as a sort of trial?—That is so.

1859. Is their duty mainly confined to sanitation or to vaccination or to both?—To sanitation and vaccination and inspection.

1860. Are they supposed to inspect different municipalities and village unions?—No, they are not supposed to visit municipalities; they are under the District Board; the municipalities are not under the District Boards.

1861. They are supposed to inspect village unions?—Yes.

1862. And they have to supervise vaccination work and also vital statistics work?—Yes, they have to scrutinise the registers and verify the work.

Lt.-Col.
H. Thomson.

25 Nov., 1907.

1863. From the list you have kindly given us, I find there are 178 sanitary inspectors under the different municipalities?—Yes.

1864. How many municipalities employ these 178 officers?—There are 60 municipalities.

1865. So that there are two or three on the average under each municipality?—Yes; in the case of Madura I think there are ten; in the others I think one or two or three.

1866. Their pay ranges up to Rs. 60?—The maximum is Rs. 70.

1867. What is the lowest?—Rupees 20.

1868. There are also 34 sanitary inspectors under the different District Boards?—Under eleven District Boards.

1869. The other District Boards have not got sanitary inspectors yet?—They have not applied for them.

1870. Can you describe to us briefly the nature of the work which the sanitary inspectors do under the District Boards?—They are usually attached to unions and taluk Boards; in the case of an epidemic or an outbreak of cholera they are employed for the sanitation of different villages. Union inspectors are stationary; taluk Board inspectors move about. If an outbreak occurs anywhere I usually refer the matter to the President of the District Board and suggest that he should employ sanitary inspectors. I write to him and ask him to inform me what steps are being taken to check it.

1871. Are they mostly attached to village unions?—No; to taluk Boards.

1872. The number of village unions in a district is very large?—No; they average about 20.

1873. Sanitary inspectors are not particularly engaged by unions?—Only eight unions employ sanitary inspectors.

1874. Each district sanitary inspector probably has a portion of the district assigned to him?—Just so.

1875. And he is supposed to inspect the unions in that portion?—He is under the orders of the President, and he can direct him wherever he pleases.

1876. But you do not know if the district is parcelled out among them?—No, they can do as they please; they are not under my orders.

1877. Besides reporting on the outbreak of epidemics, if they find a certain spot which is insanitary, is it their duty to report to the District Board?—Yes, they have to furnish diaries. The diaries go to the President of the taluk Board, who deals with them.

1878. Are they sufficiently in touch with the members of village unions and village panchayats? When they visit a village do they go to the panchayat?—That I cannot say.

1879. Are they sufficiently in touch with the members of Local Boards apart from the Presidents?—They work under the taluk Boards. I do not know if they are in touch with the members.

1880. But they take their orders from the President?—They are employed and paid by him; they are under his orders; he can dismiss or punish them in any way he pleases; they are servants of the local bodies, they are not provincial servants.

1881. Are the village unions sufficiently in touch with them so that they can frequently consult them and obtain their ideas?—No, I do not think that.

1882. They are simply under the orders of the District Boards?—That is so.

1883. (Sir Frederic Lely.) The Deputy Inspectors of Vaccination are under your orders?—They are all under me; they are provincial servants.

1884. And you have power to appoint them or punish them or remove them?—Yes.

1885. Their business is to supervise the vaccinators?—They are appointed each to a range.

1886. What pay does an ordinary vaccinator get?—His pay ranges from 40 to 70 rupees; there are three grades.

1887. I was speaking of the vaccinators?—The vaccinators are not under me.

1888. Are they not under the Deputy Inspectors of Vaccination?—Yes, but they are under the local bodies.

1889. Then the Deputy Inspectors, the supervising body, are under you, but the work of the body of vaccinators is not under your control at all?—No.

1890. I understand that the actual work of vaccination is not under your control at all?—Oh, yes, it is.

1891. Suppose a vaccinator misbehaves himself?—He would be under the orders of the President of the District Board.

1892. You have nothing to do with him?—I have nothing to do with him.

1893. Then as a matter of fact your connection with the district is very slight indeed; have you any other connection with the district besides the control of the Deputy Inspectors of Vaccination?—No.

1894. All the other sanitary employes are directly under the orders of the District Board?—Of the municipalities and District Boards.

1895. (Sir Steyning Edgerley.) Have the Sanitary Commissioners always been separate from the Surgeon-General?—Always.

1896. Quite apart from any personal questions, which system do you think is the better?—I think the present system. Sanitation is purely a special subject; it has nothing to do with medicine.

1897. Do you think it works easily?—Quite easily; there is no friction whatever so far as I know.

1898. And you think you get sufficient help?—As I said before, I have been a District Medical and Sanitary Officer, and I can well understand the position; it is only there that the help comes in.

1899. Is the King Institute under you?—Administratively only.

1900. That is for bacteriological research?—For bacteriological research and also diagnostic purposes, and also for the manufacture of vaccine paste. We supply the whole Presidency.

1901. So far as research goes the Superintendent can correspond direct with the Sanitary Commissioner to the Government of India, can he not?—Yes.

1902. Upon any particular subject?—Only in the matter of technical subjects of research.

1903. (Mr. Meyer.) There is no network of village unions throughout a district; every village does not necessarily form part of the union, but unions are merely specific large villages or groups of villages which are considered more advanced than the rest?—Yes, that is it.

1904. In a way they may perhaps be considered embryo municipalities?—Yes, they run from a population of from 1,000 to 10,000; in fact, some of them are bigger than municipalities; there are some unions with as many as 27,000.

1905. Now about these sanitary inspectors in the district; is "inspector" quite a good name; do they inspect?—Yes, in the town.

1906. But take a municipality that has three or four sanitary inspectors according to the character of the town; their work is confined to the town?—Entirely.

1907. They go round and see to the sanitation?—Yes.

1908. There is no question of their going round rural areas and inspecting there?—No, they cannot go outside.

1909. Then as regards the inspectors employed under the local authorities, of whom there are a limited number at present, are they employed in a particular union only or can they go outside and go to other villages?—Taluk Board inspectors are moveable; union inspectors ordinarily are not, but the President can move them when necessary.

1910. Then the difference is this: in the case of municipalities there is a fixed local establishment, whereas in the case of District Boards it is a peripatetic inspection?—Yes, it is moveable.

1911. Is there any obligation on the part of the municipality to take a trained man?—Yes.

1912. Formerly they could take anyone they liked ?
—Yes.

1913. How long has this new system been in vogue ?
—Since 1897.

1914. Speaking from your observation as a District Medical Officer and latterly as Sanitary Commissioner, has that led to an improvement in the sanitation of municipalities?—Certainly ; there is no doubt about that.

1915. Do you consider that there is danger on the part of men of perhaps little real knowledge, but full of zeal, trying to force what they think are correct sanitary ideas upon the people?—I think so.

1916. There is a danger which wants to be carefully guarded against?—It ought to be controlled.

1917. You think that the local Councils must be under some control?—I think so.

1918. My point is, do you think that the zeal of the expert requires to be tempered by some outside administrative experience?—These sanitary inspectors very seldom suggest anything ; they are over the scavengers and drain sweepers and so on ; that is all their duty—to see that these people do their work.

1919. Might they not issue orders which the people might resent?—They cannot ; it is the Chairman who does that ; I do not think they should be allowed to do that.

1920. They ought to be under control?—Certainly.

1921. You gave us to understand that the District Medical Officer had not much time for sanitary inspection?—Yes.

1922. He does however go out into the district, as Surgeon-General Browne told us, on an average for a quarter of the year and inspect outlying dispensaries and hospitals?—Yes, for about three months in the year.

1923. At the time of his inspection of hospitals cannot he also inspect the sanitation of the village in which the hospital is situated?—Yes, but he will not do it in three months if he does that.

1924. The District Medical Officer goes to inspect an outlying hospital or dispensary ; does he, or does he not, as a fact accompany the inspection of the hospital or dispensary by an inspection of the sanitary condition of the town or village?—He ought to, and he very often does.

1925. And in that way, if the time permits, he can do a certain amount of sanitary inspection?—Yes, but he has jail duties ; he cannot be away from his headquarters.

1926. I am speaking of the time he is away from headquarters, which, we were told, was about one-fourth of the year, during which the Assistant Surgeon at headquarters takes his place?—Yes, about three months in the year.

1927. Then about vaccination. I understood from one of your answers that you have really no control over the vaccination staff beyond the Deputy Inspectors?—No, I have nothing to do with the vaccination staff.

1928. But at the same time you have a Deputy Inspector of Vaccination?—Yes ; one Deputy Sanitary Commissioner.

1929. He goes round and inspects?—Yes.

1930. And if he finds that the vaccination work in any area is badly dealt with he would report it?—Yes.

1931. And you would mention it to Government ?
—I forward his report with remarks to Government.

1932. In that way there is a certain amount of supervision?—Yes.

1933. You, or your Deputy, would go round and make sanitary inspections periodically, chiefly in municipalities?—The inspection is chiefly confined to vaccination ranges in the districts ; my work extends over the whole Presidency.

1934. You go to a municipality and you find that the place is dirty and that in your opinion proper sanitary precautions are not observed ; what happens then?—I have to report upon all the places I inspect. I report to Government through the Chairman of the Municipal Council, and it is laid before the Council, who comment upon my notes, and that comment is forwarded through the Collector, who also makes comments, and they are transmitted to Government.

1935. The Government have your view on the one side and the view of the Chairman on the other, and possibly the view of the Collector on one side or the other also, and pass final orders?—That is so.

1936. In these sanitary reports do you confine yourself to matters of real importance or do you go into matters of detail?—Matters of detail.

1937. All those have to go up to Government also ?
—It all goes up.

1938. Do you think it would be possible, at any rate in matters of detail, in regard to municipalities, to let the Collector be the final judge?—I really could not say.

1939. Extracts from municipal budgets relating to sanitation are forwarded to you?—Yes.

1940. Then, if you consider the sanitation unsatisfactory, do you make representations to the Local Government?—I do ; in forwarding my remarks on the budget extracts I make representations.

1941. Take the municipal budget. Does "Sanitation" come under a separate head from "Medical"?—Yes.

1942. And in the case of the District Board budgets also?—Yes.

1943. Do you frequently have occasion to comment adversely on the provision for sanitation made by municipalities and Local Boards?—On the provision made by Local Boards chiefly.

1944. But that is a matter rather for the administration report than for the budget?—Yes.

1945. Your budget is the forecast of expenditure for the coming year?—Quite so.

1946. And what you are concerned with in the budget is whether the money which the District Board says it is likely to expend is adequate or not?—Yes.

1947. Have you frequently occasion to maintain that it is inadequate?—Frequently.

1948. Of course, you have regard to the finances of the District Board?—To the amount that can be spent.

1949. Speaking generally, on the occasions on which you have taken that position, what has been the final upshot—what has the Government decided as arbiter?—As a rule, the opinion of the Collector is upheld.

1950. The Collector being President of the District Board?—Yes.

1951. That is to say the Government supports the District Board?—Yes.

1952. In the case of municipalities you say you have not so much criticism to make?—No ; but sanitary provision is often inadequate.

1953. Now we will take the other point that you raised as to the question of the insufficient expenditure of budget allotments ; how does that come before you?—In making up my report I enquire of the different districts how much has been spent, and I am informed how much has been spent in sanitation and how much has lapsed.

1954. Each District Board and municipality, besides a budget statement, submits an administration report?—Yes.

1955. Do extracts from that administration report go through you in the same way as extracts from the budget?—No, a copy of the administration report is sent to me.

1956. A copy is sent to you before the Government review it?—No, when the Government have reviewed it.

1957. Do you consider that it would be advisable that you should have the opportunity before the Government review the administration report of pointing out that you thought, for instance, that the expenditure of funds had not been properly allotted?—Yes, I think it would be advisable.

1958. Now, as regards particular works ; in every work relating to sanitation costing over Rs. 1,000, has a municipality or District Board to refer to you?—Yes.

1959. Do you think that that is a too rigid limit?—No, I do not think so.

1960. You said that the District Board had no really good adviser?—That is so.

1961. Has it not the District Medical and Sanitary Officer?—Yes.

1962. Might he not be a Medical Officer of large experience?—A few of them are.

1963. The District Medical Officer may become, as in your case, Sanitary-Commissioner?—Yes.

1964. Would you say therefore that to-day he is unfit to advise, being only a Medical Officer, and to-morrow he is fit to advise, being a Sanitary Commissioner?—No; I happened to have the D.P.H.; not every one has that.

1965. Then I take it it depends upon the qualification of the particular Medical Officer; some Medical Officers are quite competent to advise?—Some are.

1966. Do these things come to you first?—Yes.

1967. Can you dispose of any on your own authority?—No.

1968. Could not a District Board President write to you and ask your advice as to some little drainage scheme that he was contemplating?—Up to Rs. 1,000 he could do so.

1969. But not outside that?—No.

1970. You cannot give him any preliminary advice?—I can give him preliminary advice if he asks for it.

1971. But you cannot sanction it?—No.

1972. You can correspond as a friendly adviser?—Yes.

1973. Does that correspondence take place officially or demi-officially?—Any correspondence is official; I correspond with him as Sanitary Commissioner.

1974. That is to say, although the matter is not required to go up to you for scrutiny officially, any District Board President or Municipal Chairman could invoke your friendly advice officially?—Not only as a matter of courtesy, but he is entitled to ask my advice.

1975. And he is entitled to get an answer so far as a matter is within your power to give an answer?—Exactly.

1976. You have got a scheme, say, for Rs. 2,000; it goes up to you and you approve it; it then goes to the Sanitary Board?—Yes.

1977. Where does the Sanitary Engineer come in?—In engineering matters.

1978. But are they not rather mixed up? Take a drainage scheme; you have got both functions?—Yes.

1979. Who would come in first?—The Sanitary Engineer brings up the scheme; I could suggest a thing, but he works out the details.

1980. You could go to a municipality and suggest that they wanted a certain drainage scheme?—Yes, and the matter would be sent then to the Sanitary Engineer. The idea would be sent to him, and he would have to work it out and forward estimates and plans and all the rest of it; he would have to inspect, or send some of his subordinates to inspect, the place and say what form of work should be carried out.

1981. When he has made his estimates what happens? Does it then come to you?—It then comes to me; then I deal with it and say whether it is what I want.

1982. Do you criticise the shape of the drains for instance?—Yes.

1983. Then suppose you and the Sanitary Engineer are not in agreement?—We are supposed to consult with each other.

1984. But it may occasionally happen that you take different views?—Then it is laid before the Sanitary Board.

1985. And then through the Sanitary Board it goes to Government?—Yes.

1986. Do you consider that the machinery of the Sanitary Board is necessary; might it not be possible for you and the Sanitary Engineer to give all the preliminary advice required?—We usually do so.

1987. But I understood you that it had to go to the Sanitary Board?—Yes, they have to pass it.

1988. My question is, is the Sanitary Board in your opinion necessary? Could you and the Sanitary Engineer not deal direct with the provincial Government and have no Sanitary Board at all?—No, I do not think so.

1989. You think the Sanitary Board is a useful check?—I think so.

1990. Does it frequently modify your proposals and those of the Sanitary Engineer?—No, very seldom.

1991. I understand that most of the drainage or water-supply schemes that come forward from municipalities are due to your inspections?—Yes.

1992. And generally I take it that the municipality says: "This is a very beautiful thing, but we have not got enough money to do it."—Yes.

1993. What happens then?—The estimate is drawn up, and the Government refer it to the municipality to see what they can do in the way of providing funds.

1994. Does not the Government frequently assist municipalities?—Very often.

1995. And if it assists, it of course claims more power of control than if the municipality were to do it entirely from its own resources; is not that so?—I do not think so.

1996. You think it would control it equally if the municipality were to finance the whole scheme?—Yes.

1997. Is plague under you as Sanitary Commissioner?—I am adviser to the Government.

1998. But is actual plague preventive work done by the District Boards and municipalities, or is there a special Government staff?—It is under the Collector.

1999. The Collector, as Executive Government Officer?—Yes.

2000. Therefore plague establishments are not directly municipal?—Yes.

2001. Do municipalities and Local Boards take any share in plague operations?—Yes, they have to provide a certain amount for the care of their own towns.

2002. To keep plague out of their town or to stamp it out when it gets in?—Both.

2003. When the municipality, say, has to pay for that, does the municipality have any control over the establishment, or is the establishment simply an outside force for which the municipality has to pay?—No, it is under the municipality.

2004. The Collector's establishment is for the rural areas?—Yes.

2005. (Chairman.) Your Sanitary Inspector has to keep a diary?—He keeps a diary.

2006. Whom does he send it to?—The Chairman of the Municipal Council.

2007. And whom does the Chairman send it to?—He keeps it himself.

2008. He does not send it on any farther?—No.

2009. The Chairman has not got to send it up to Government or to you?—No.

2010. I understand that you yourself spend a good deal of time in touring in the Presidency?—Yes.

2011. Two or three months in the year?—About seven or eight.

2012. That enables you to see the whole of the sanitary requirements of the Presidency, and it keeps you in touch with the assistants of every grade who are under you?—Yes.

2013. Therefore, you are thoroughly acquainted with the sanitary requirements of the province?—Yes.

2014. I think you said that, on the whole, you are in favour of the continuance of the Sanitary Board?—Yes.

2015. The Sanitary Board can dispose of schemes up to Rs. 10,000.—Yes.

2016. Of whom does the Sanitary Board consist?—The Surgeon-General, the Chief Engineer and the Secretary of the Local and Municipal Department.

2017. Are you acquainted with the proceedings of the Sanitary Board after that?—Yes.

2018. You are their expert adviser?—Yes.

2019. The Engineer-in-Chief subsequently sees, as head of the Public Works Department, what has been discussed at the Sanitary Board of which he is a member?—Yes.

2020. The Secretary to the Local and Municipal Department sees what has been discussed at the Sanitary Board subsequently as the Secretary of that Department?—I believe so.

2021. So that after the matter has been discussed by the Sanitary Board at which three members are present, it is subsequently discussed singly by two members of the same Board sitting in different capacities?—I do not know.

2022. But under the process with which you are familiar that is the case?—I cannot say.

2023. Let us take it that that is the case: do you not think that that might amount to a duplication of work which is unnecessary?—I think it comes to a matter of finance when it goes to Government.

2024. But it is not dealt with as a matter of finance either by the Public Works Department or the Local and Municipal Department?—The Sanitary Board have to consider whether the body that the work is for is able to finance it, and it may fall through on that ground.

2025. But would not the Chairman of the municipality or of the District Board be acquainted with the financial position of the municipality or the District Board?—Yes.

2026. Do you not think that considering all those circumstances it rather looks as if there was a duplication of work?—I think there is more safeguard.

2027. I understand that every District Board and municipality has to submit an annual sanitary report?—That is so.

2028. That you look upon as a safeguard?—Yes.

2029. Who writes the administration report?—The President of the District Board or the Chairman of the municipality, as the case may be.

2030. They send their reports to the Collector?—Yes.

2031. The Collector considers them and passes remarks?—Yes, and forwards them to Government.

2032. I am only dealing with the sanitary part of the administration report.—He has to consider the whole of it.

2033. It goes from the Collector to whom?—To Government.

2034. Not to you?—No; you are talking of the administration report, I presume?

2035. Yes.—That does not come to me.

2036. That part of it which is concerned with sanitation does not come to you at all?—No. I get a copy of it from Government; it comes back after Government have passed orders.

2037. Would it assist you to have it before it goes to Government?—I think I ought to get the part of it connected with sanitation.

2038. Would it cause any more trouble so far as you know?—I do not see how it could.

2039. (Mr. Meyer.) Are you aware of any scheme at present under consideration for having a provincial Sanitary Service?—Not Sanitary—you mean a Sanitary Engineering Service?

2040. The present staff, as you have explained, is purely a local staff?—Yes.

2041. Are you aware of any scheme in contemplation to put matters more on the analogy of the Medical Service; that is to say, to have provincial officers lent to the local municipalities?—No, I have not heard of that.

(The witness withdrew.)

Dr. A. G. BOURNE was called and examined.

2042. (Chairman.) Would you tell the Commission what posts you hold?—I am Director of Public Instruction and also Commissioner for Government Examinations, and I have special charge of the Reformatory School. I am the Inspector-General of Jails under the Reformatory Act, but there is only one such school. I am also a Member of the Legislative Council.

2043. Will you state briefly the organization of your department?—The department consists of the—Indian Educational Service.
Provincial Educational Service
Subordinate Service.

There are also certain special appointments such as the principalship and staff of the Law College and the staffs of the Medical College and schools. These main Services, in their turn, comprise the teaching agency, the inspecting agency, and certain other officers.

2044. The Indian Educational Service is recruited principally in England?—Yes, entirely.

2045. The Provincial Educational Service is recruited entirely in India?—Yes.

2046. How is the Subordinate Service recruited?—I have the power of appointment to all subordinate posts.

2047. Not to the Provincial posts?—These I recommend to the Madras Government.

2048. Selection is made with regard to the Provincial Service on your recommendation by examination?—There is no examination.

2049. So that practically you have the power of appointment both to the Provincial and to the Subordinate Services?—Yes, subject to Government's approval in the case of the Provincial Service. The appointment lies with Government.

2050. What is, roughly speaking, the number of the Indian Educational Service?—About 23.

2051. And the provincial?—About 40.

2052. What are your relations with the provincial Government; with whom do you correspond?—I correspond with the Secretary of the Local and Municipal Department and Secretary of the Educational Department—I correspond with him in both capacities.

2053. You correspond direct?—Yes.

2054. Have you any reason to note that there has been any restriction by the provincial Government on your independent powers or discretion?—No, not as a rule.

2055. Is there any tendency to what may be called red tape?—No; occasionally something is misunderstood in the Secretariat office, but I have only to take the matter to the Member and it has always been put straight at once.

2056. Is that because you happen to be a Member of the Legislative Council?—No, I think not; it is merely because I have expressed myself badly in the first place, or my office has, and it has been misunderstood in the course of correspondence.

2057. Has there been any undue correspondence between your office and the provincial Government?—No, I do not think so.

2058. No tendency to cripple you by undue interference?—No, there is very little.

2059. You are as free as you can reasonably expect to be?—Yes, I think so.

2060. Is there any specific power of a financial nature or administrative that you would like to see delegated to you which is now held by the provincial Government?—What I most want, if I had more power delegated to me, is to be able to re-delegate it to some of my subordinates. Generally speaking, I should give the inspectors of schools very great control in their own circles. Of course it is an extremely complicated department to deal with in a word or two. The majority of the requisite powers could be given by the Madras Government, but I have not previously made application in respect of them.

2061. Is each member of the Indian Educational Service in charge of a circle?—No; seven of those are inspectors of schools and three are inspectresses; nine are principals or professors of Arts Colleges, and the remainder occupy various positions, some in colleges and one or two in special appointments such as the Deputy Directorship of Public Instruction.

2062. To which of these 23 gentlemen would you like to give greater freedom—the seven inspectors?—The inspectors on the one hand for their circles, and the principals of the colleges on the other for their colleges.

2063. In what way does the provincial Government unduly hamper you in your dealings with the inspectors of circles?—I did not say that the provincial Government hampered me at all; what I said was that I should prefer to give the inspectors more power.

2064. I suppose you cannot give them more power because you have not got freedom yourself?—Because of the rules.

2065. What are the rules which adversely affect your proper control over your inspectors?—For instance, the recognition of diplomas and certificates other than those specified in the educational rules. At present those cases are referred to Government; in many cases I think they might be delegated to the inspector of the circle. If it comes to me I have no personal knowledge of the case, and Government has no personal knowledge; it is the man on the spot that has personal knowledge whether the man is fitted to teach.

2066. Is there any real difficulty which would require, perhaps from the financial side, reference to the Local Government because of the requirements of the Government of India?—Not in that matter; it is purely a local rule; it is one of our educational rules.

2067. And you think that that might well be relaxed?—Quite so; it is only proposed to delegate it to me; I propose to delegate it to the man on the spot.

2068. You desire to receive that power so that you may re-delegate it?—Yes.

2069. I have here a list of suggestions for the delegation of powers which has been filed on behalf of the Madras Government. It is proposed that the power, at present exercised by the Local Government, of prescribing lists of text-books for use in schools under public management should be delegated to you?—The general control should come to me.

2070. I suppose the Government of Madras in drawing up their list of text-books act upon your advice?—Yes, we have a special Text-book Committee which deals with the whole matter.

2071. Of which you are a member?—I am President ex officio.

2072. Who are the other members?—There are about 12 other members; they are appointed by the Government.

2073. Who at present nominally decides what shall be the list of text-books; is it the Secretary of the Local and Municipal Department?—It is Government.

2074. Some one above you in the hierarchy?—Yes, I have no knowledge how far it goes.

2075. Have you ever had any book refused which you desired either to exclude or include?—Never.

2076. Practically the Government of Madras always accepts the advice of the Director of Public Instruction in this matter?—I do not remember any instance where there has been any difference of opinion, so that this proposed delegation amounts to nothing; it is merely getting rid of one letter a year, that is all it amounts to.

2077. Then it is proposed that you be empowered to levy fees at reduced rates in schools under public management in backward localities; is that always settled on your recommendation at the present moment?—There has been no difficulty. Whenever I have made a recommendation it has been accepted, I think.

2078. Does that in any way clash with the jurisdiction of the Sub-Divisional Officer?—The Revenue Officer you mean—the Civilian Officer?

2079. Yes, the Executive Officer?—No, not as such. Of course it is conceivable that it might clash with the wishes of the Local Board, but I am afraid that they have very few wishes as to education.

2080. Who at the present moment settles this?—The inspecting officer on the spot writes to me—probably he writes to the taluk Board direct, and if it is a Board school they resolve to apply to Government; the application comes through me, and I recommend it, and it is done.

2081. If you refuse to recommend it, what then?—It is not done.

2082. Does it go beyond you on appeal?—Yes, the Board addresses Government, not me. The letter passes through me.

2083. You say, "Yes, I recommend this" or "No, I do not recommend it"?—Yes.

2084. Practically in every case what occurs is that what you recommend is accepted by the Government?—Yes, I think so, practically.

2085. Have you any recollection of your decision or your recommendation being overruled?—Not in this matter.

2086. So that practically you do now decide all these cases, but you have to get the nominal assent of somebody else?—That is so.

2087. It is suggested that the power, which the Government reserve to themselves, of prescribing the list of text-books for use in aided schools and colleges should be redelegated to you?—I do not think it has ever been necessary to bring this rule into force. It is a rule merely to guard against the introduction of any objectionable book—not merely a valueless book educationally, but objectionable from a political or a moral point of view. There have been cases, but I do not think there has been a case in my time.

2088. It is also proposed that you should be empowered to forbid the employment in aided schools and colleges of teachers whose certificates have been withdrawn?—That very rarely occurs.

2089. Is there anything in the Grant-in-Aid Code which would adversely affect the delegation of powers in respect of these two wishes of yours?—No, nothing. The Government would, I believe, have accepted my proposal to delegate, only I did not make it; these are things in which I thought it would have more weight if recommended by government. It stands in the Code here that Government reserve to themselves the right to forbid, and that perhaps has a little more weight with the public than if the discretion was with the Director of Public Instruction.

2090. If these suggestions of the provincial Government were adopted, would they save you correspondence?—A little; it does not amount to much at present.

2091. All these are really not matters of much importance?—No, they are all things which might be delegated to me, and some of them I might delegate further.

2092. Such as making arrangements for the primary scholarship examinations. It is clear that the local man must do that?—Yes.

2093. In all these cases at present you have to refer your views to the provincial Government—quite uselessly, because you are really the deciding authority at the present moment?—Yes, and the Government apparently take that view in making these proposals.

2094. Now beyond these suggested powers is there anything else which would help to free you from unnecessary and over-strict control?—I have not noted anything else which I should ask to be delegated to me.

2095. Is there any general principle in connection with education in which it is desirable to give greater freedom to the Director of Public Instruction?—I have noted one or two matters, which are small matters in a way. One is the Stores Department; we want for our colleges a number of stores from England and we always want rather special things.

It is not like so many drain pipes or iron rails; the things we want are all special articles. There is a tremendous delay in getting these; it is only possible to have an annual indent, and the professor wants something to work with, and very likely he has to wait months before he gets it; and then he possibly gets the wrong thing.

2096. Are these things eventually got from the Stores Department of the India Office?—Yes.

2097. As you know, that subject is now under discussion?—The latest suggestion that I have heard was that there should be a branch of the Stores Department in Madras. That would make matters worse from our point of view, because all our special articles could not be stocked, and many of those they did stock would probably go bad before they were wanted.

2098. Apart from the matters we have been talking about, can you tell us of any other ways in which your work as Director of Public Instruction is unduly clogged or hampered by the interference of the provincial Government?—I think the answer is no.

2099. Is there any other department which unduly interferes with you?—The whole budget system I think interferes very largely with our work. Generally, the rules are too rigid. With a Department like Education we cannot foresee what our needs are as you can in other departments. That is especially the case of course as regards what money we want for grants-in-aid. If I have asked for too much I am blamed and there is a lapse, and when I ask next year I am told that, having had a lapse, I cannot want so much that year, so that we are checked from growing. I am supposing, of course, that the money would be available for growth. Then to prevent these lapses many of my subordinates, I have no doubt, spend money just at the close of the financial year without duly considering whether it is the best method of spending it, merely because they will be blamed if the money lapses and is not used.

2100. What you would prefer is that the provincial Government should give you as Head of the Department power to carry the lapses over to the following estimates?—Certainly.

2101. Would that occasion a considerable reappropriation from sub-head to sub-head—not from major head to major head, but from sub-head to sub-head?—I have power to do that at present myself.

2102. It would only be a transfer from one or two major heads of expenditure?—Yes, or if the total estimate was incorrect. To take this specific instance; for two or three years we have had various big schemes pending, and administrative sanction did not arrive for them in time; we have had the money waiting, and kept it waiting (almost necessarily) too long, as it turned out, and there has been a lapse. The first year I saw my way to spending all the money available; I was told just before the budget had to issue to cut it down by 3 lakhs.

2103. Was that the amount by which your lapses had accumulated?—No, I do not think so; there had always been lapses.

2104. You do not know why the particular 3 lakhs was fixed?—No, I merely received instructions to cut it down. I understood it was not on the ground of general economy, because we had just had grants of 6 and 8 lakhs given to us.

2105. As far as you know the automatic re-grant of lapses would not interfere with the general financial conditions of the Presidency?—As far as I know, it would not.

2106. What you would wish to do would be to carry on your lapses not generally from budget to budget, but from sub-head A or sub-head B in one budget to the corresponding sub-head in the next budget?—Preferably, as a total.

2107. Do you see my point?—Yes—preferably, I say, in the total, for education.

2108. You mean to carry it on as a general lapse, not as specific lapses?—Yes.

2109. What local authorities manage each kind of school?—There are schools managed by Government. These are very few in number in this Presidency.

2110. Are there Universities managed by the Government under your department?—There is a University here; it is not nominally managed by the Government; the Government has power reserved to it in a great many matters to regulate the University. Then there are schools managed by the District Boards.

2111. Are they primary or secondary schools?—They are mostly elementary. I am always trying to reduce the number of secondary schools managed by the Boards, because I think they should devote themselves to elementary work and we could manage the secondary schools in a better way.

2112. Have you found that the management of secondary schools by District Boards has not been successful?—It is so nominal. Our officers do what they can, but they have to correspond with the Board. The Board itself does very little.

2113. Would it be desirable to give them greater control over a school?—Do you mean a District Board or a taluk Board?

2114. Either.—I do not see that it would. As a rule the only person on the Board who takes any interest in the school is the President—the Civilian, the Divisional Officer. In the course of his touring he interests himself in the school, but so far as I am aware the other members very seldom take any interest in the schools. Then as to the municipalities, they manage a considerable number of the secondary schools because the secondary schools naturally lie in the larger towns.

2115. And is that management real management?—A little more so possibly, but very little.

2116. There is some greater interest shown by members of the municipalities?—In some municipalities, certainly.

2117. Is that a growing interest?—Possibly; I think it is growing slowly.

2118. Would the extension of powers to them in matters of education stimulate their interest?—I can hardly see in what way.

2119. If you give greater power to persons to deal with something or other in which they are interested, do they not generally take a correspondingly greater amount of interest in it?—I am afraid we are always somewhat doubtful, if they take an interest, what particular line the interest will take; we are so constantly hearing of teachers being brought in because they are relatives of a municipal councillor; that is the common complaint.

2120. You think therefore, so far as you can observe, that the grant of larger powers in educational matters to Local Bodies, and to that extent decentralizing the control of these educational establishments, would not be attended with happy results?—I have no evidence that it would. The last class of schools is the aided schools, which are very numerous in this Presidency.

2121. Who control the aided schools?—A variety of managers.

2122. Appointed by whom?—They appoint themselves. The Missions are very numerous in this Presidency and they maintain a very large number of schools, and if the school is fit, we recognize them and aid them.

2123. And they take a great interest in their schools?—Yes. Then there are also certain cases of native managed schools started by native agencies which we also recognize and aid.

2124. Do you find that there is a great deal of correspondence between your department and the various heads of municipalities and District Boards who control these schools?—A good deal of correspondence passes through me. They do not correspond with me directly, but all their letters to Government pass through the Director.

2125. What would the head of a municipality write to Government about on educational matters?—They have to write with regard to everything; if they want to alter the pay of a teacher, or to have an additional teacher, or to have an additional class, or to purchase a book.

2126. All that is outside your province?—Yes, I have no control there.

- Dr. A. G. Bourne.*
25 Nov., 1907.
2127. You do not make an educational budget for your Presidency?—Not for municipal expenditure; my budget only deals with the provincial expenditure.
2128. Then they write through you to Government?—Yes.
2129. Does that cause any increase of work in your department?—It is a very large portion of my work.
2130. Do you make any comments upon it?—Yes, always.
2131. You say this is necessary or this is not necessary?—Yes.
2132. And nobody else could say that?—My inspector could have said it just as well—a good inspector who knows the school. When a letter comes to me very often I write back to the inspector and ask him for the local facts, unless I have been to the place recently myself.
2133. Then in the delegation of powers to your inspectors, might it not be possible to add the power of corresponding on this sort of matters direct with the Government?—Then you might call them Government schools; that is what I think would be the best thing for the school; then you eliminate altogether the local management; the inspector goes to the school and sees what he wants, and writes to Government about it, with the result that the municipality is nowhere in the scheme.
2134. But what I understand is that the municipality wants to increase the cost of the school in this or that direction by Rs. 100 or Rs. 200, say: the inspector says "This is necessary and I will forward it to the Director of Public Instruction with my recommendation", and the Director of Public Instruction then forwards it to the Secretary of the Local and Municipal Department. If so, are you only a post office in this matter? Might not the inspector upon the requirement of the municipality forward it direct?—I am a criticising post office; I almost always criticise these proposals.
2135. You criticise the remarks of your inspector?—Very often. You have inserted the inspector; I did not say the inspector came into the chain under the present system; the present system is for the municipality to write to Government through me.
2136. Then you send it back to your inspector?—I send it back to the inspector if I want information from him in order to criticise the municipality's proposal.
2137. How would you be able to criticise the proposals without sending it back?—I may have seen the school recently myself, or know its reputation otherwise.
2138. Is there any method which you can suggest to us of shortening the correspondence which follows on the requirements of the municipality being granted by the Government?—We are talking of secondary schools?
2139. Of any school which comes under the control of the municipality.—I cannot deal with the two things together very well. With regard to the secondary schools there is a good deal of correspondence for each school; with regard to the elementary schools there is a smaller amount of correspondence, dealing with an enormous number of schools, not dealing with individual schools. With regard to secondary schools, I think that if they were under our direct management the whole thing would be much simpler.
2140. Would that mean the elimination of the municipality?—Yes.
2141. Would that be a desirable thing?—Well, as I have said, their management is so nominal.
2142. Would it not be possible to give to the municipality the real management?—I do not think it would be for the benefit of the schools, at present at any rate.
2143. You do not think it would be better to let there be a certain falling off in education if it would lead to a real stimulating of the municipality in educational matters?—Of course if the object is to teach the municipality to be a municipality, that would be one way of doing it.
2144. You think there might be a conflict between the Government and the local municipality?—Very - likely; in fact, we are constantly watching these municipal schools; if not, they would deteriorate more rapidly than they do.

2145. In short you cannot suggest any method of lessening the correspondence which takes place between your department and the authorities subordinate to it?—Not under the present system.
2146. But without the present system?—I have said, we might take them over and manage them completely without this formality of nominal municipal management.
2147. That is the only way?—That is the only radical cure, or to give up control and let the municipality, as you suggested, take the management, and even let education suffer in the case of a bad municipality.
2148. You must either let the municipality take the school over altogether, or the Education Department take the school over altogether, before you can reduce the amount of going backwards and forwards between the provincial Government and the municipality?—You must get rid of dual management and simplify the matter one way or the other.
2149. What are your official relations with the Director-General of Education?—I have practically no official relations, excepting when he writes to me with regard to furnishing statistics or information; he does not now write to me with regard to any other matters.
2150. He only asks for information?—That is all.
2151. He does not interfere in any way with your powers or jurisdiction?—Not directly to me.
2152. Do you find that he has been of service to you?—It is so difficult for me to say what he does or what is his influence.
2153. You do not know the extent of his influence with the Government of India?—No.
2154. At all events since his appointment by the Government of India has there been any improvement in the suggestions which come to you?—I am afraid I cannot say, because we were appointed about the same time.
2156. Have you had any useful suggestions from him?—I have this impression, that it is so far good, having a Director-General, an educational expert, on the spot, that with the present financial arrangements between this Government and the Government of India we have more chance of getting an educational scheme approved or of funds being allotted for an educational scheme, than if there were no such expert. That is with the present financial system; but generally I think that the educational advice comes in at the wrong moment. The expert educational advice should be before the scheme goes to Government, which has a wider experience and regards the thing from the point of view of general administration—all the expert advice should come before that stage in my opinion.
2157. Will you give me a concrete example?—Suppose my department has a scheme: we have settled it as the best thing for this Presidency; we go to Government; they take a wider view than we do—I mean not merely an educational view, but they see the thing from a financial and political and general administrative point of view; they settle that it is a good scheme; it goes up to the Government of India under some rule, because it exceeds a certain amount; the thing is then re-opened—I imagine from an educational point of view. Of course, education is one of those matters in which no two people hold the same opinion, and probably it is no use searching after an ideal; it is much better to do the best we can, rather than be always seeking for the best; so that, as I say, the second expert advice comes in rather late.
2158. In your judgment then, when you have submitted your scheme to the Government of Madras and it has been approved, do you think it is at that point that the Director-General should come in?—There is no doubt with a special scheme it is as well to discuss it with a number of people, and if I discussed it with another Director or with another expert it would no doubt benefit the scheme, and it might modify my views.

2159. That would rather point to your desiring something like an annual conference of Directors?—Yes, possibly.

2160. That you think would probably save a lot of time and correspondence?—I think it would; annual conferences would possibly be too frequent.

2161. Biennial or something of that sort?—Yes.

2162. You think you would then be able to thresh out your proposals from the educational point of view?—Yes.

2163. With the Director-General there, or would there be no need for the Director-General?—That depends upon what his subsequent position is going to be.

2164. Upon what is to be his influence with the Government of India?—Yes.

2165. Have you any reason to suppose that at present he does not hold a sufficiently important position with the Government of India?—I cannot say.

2166. You have no reason to have any views one way or the other?—No.

2167. But what you would like would be a conference of Directors, you having the opportunity there of threshing out your ideas, and then the matter going up to the Government of India from the larger outlook?—Yes. That is not what I should like necessarily—that they should go to the Government of India; I say they might just as well stop at the Government of Madras.

2168. Then what about finance?—You were asking what I should like from the educational point of view. As to finance, we try to get what money we can.

2169. Suppose you got all you wanted from the educational point of view, who is going to finance your scheme—the provincial Government?—Yes. If a scheme costs under Rs. 25,000, it is sanctioned here; if it costs over that, it goes to the Government of India.

2170. Suppose it was more than Rs. 25,000 and it went to the Government of India, do you think then that the Director-General brings no useful influence to bear on that scheme?—We had a scheme the other day about the training of teachers, which would cost over Rs. 25,000. We had been discussing it for some time. It was a most urgent matter in my opinion. "It was merely intended to be" (I think these are the words the Government used) "a modest instalment of reform"; but so much objection was taken to its being submitted piecemeal, and so much time was taken up in the further discussion, that it was two years before we got it sanctioned, and then it was sanctioned just as it was sent up, with no alteration in it. I do not know that the Director-General came in there at all, but those are the facts.

2171. You think there was some delay on the part of the Government of India in regard to this particular scheme?—There was.

2172. Had the provincial Government had a freer hand in settling the finance of it, you might have got your scheme sooner?—If I had put the scheme at Rs. 2,000 less than I did, it would have been finally approved by them; now it has come into force, but after all that delay had occurred.

2173. Then with regard to these local budgets, they all come through you?—Yes.

2174. And they go on from you to where?—To Government.

2175. What Department of Government?—I send them all to the Secretary of the Local and Municipal Department.

2176. What happens to them after that you do not know?—No; they are dealt with by Government in the Secretariat.

2177. (Mr. Meyer.) You say that these references to the Government of India are necessary now from the financial point of view. Are you aware that the Government of India in their turn have to make references to the Secretary of State on similar grounds?—Yes.

2179. You might like to double the number of your inspectors of schools for instance?—Yes.

2180. You would give the Government of Madras a free hand over that?—Yes.

2181. Then what about the Secretary of State? Would you ask him to abandon his powers of control?—You mean as to doubling the number of inspectors?

2183. Therefore, even now, under the financial rules, the Secretary of State's sanction would be required; would you abrogate that?—Yes.

2184. You admit that the Government of India must have the same power as the provincial Government? You would not have the provincial Government with larger powers than the Government of India possesses I presume?—No, but in a matter of that sort the provincial Government has a reputation with the public, and the Government of India has a reputation, and the Secretary of State has a reputation, for doing their work properly. There is no reason to suppose that one body will do it better than another. The provincial Government is in touch with the local conditions, and knows how many inspectors of schools are wanted; and they should have the power of settling the number.

2185. May I take the converse case; of course it is purely hypothetical. Suppose the Local Government desired to abolish the Director of Public Instruction; would you say that they should be allowed to do so?—Yes; it is a matter of their controlling the province. I take my own educational point of view; if they say that a Director is unnecessary for Madras, I do not see how it affects the other parts of India.

2186. Suppose they chose to abolish the Madras University?—That is different; that is on a legal footing.

2187. Never mind; it is under a Madras Act; could they not repeal that Act?—I think it is an Indian Act.

2188. However, would you give the Government power to legislate and to abolish the Madras University if they wanted to do it; of course, it is an absolutely hypothetical question?—I do not know of any one who has the power to abolish the University.

2189. The Legislature has power; the University is created by the Legislature, and the Legislature can abolish it. I ask you would you allow the local Legislature to abolish the Madras University?—There are five or six Universities in the country, and perhaps it is better that they should be dealt with from a larger standpoint than that of the provincial Government.

2190. Are there not 8 or 9 Directors of Public Instruction in the country?—Yes.

2191. Then what is the difference? You say that one Government might abolish its Director of Public Instruction without reference to other Governments; but you say that one Government should not abolish its own University without reference to the other four or five?—Because if one Government chooses to have, or not to have, a particular officer in charge of education—a senior inspector—that affects its own province only; in the case of Universities, the country as a whole has to be provided with a certain number of centres of University education, and you cannot deal with one without affecting all the others.

Dr.
A. G. Bourne.

Dr.
A. G. Bourne.
25 Nov., 1907.

2192. You say that the Local Government should have an absolutely free hand in matters of educational policy; am I correct in taking that as your answer?—That is my general standpoint.

2193. Is not the logical implication that, if the Local Government thought it need not spend money upon education at all, it should be allowed not to spend any money at all?—I think that a Government should have that power; the Government of England has that power, and any other Government.

2194. The Government of the United Kingdom is a Supreme Government; is the Government of Madras a Supreme Government?—I suppose not.

2195. It is under the Government of India?—I suppose so.

2196. And the Government of India in turn is under the Home Government?—Yes.

2197. Do you desire therefore to give to this subordinate Government the same powers as the Government of the United Kingdom possesses?—I did not go to that extreme; you have put the very extreme view into my mouth.

2198. I want to know exactly how far you would go. Do you or not wish to give the Local Government absolute power in respect of educational matters?—I cannot use the word "absolute" myself, because you follow that up by asking me whether I would give them power to abolish the Director of Public Instruction, which is an extreme to which one would hardly have supposed that I intended to go.

2199. Then I may take it that you do not think that in a matter like education it is necessary that there should be some co-ordination between the different provinces and some control by a central authority?—I think some control is necessary, but I thought it was a question of how much. I complain of interference with details, such as the system under which we train our teachers.

2200. Now you have modified your position considerably; you admit that there necessarily must be some control, and it is merely a question of how much the control should be?—Yes. You put the word "absolutely" into my mouth—I never used it.

2201. I only want to get it clear: you repudiate "absolute," and you admit that there should be some control?—Less control than there is at present.

2202. Can you give us a general statement of the matters in which you think there should be control by the Central Government, and the matters in which you think the Local Government should have a free hand, where at present it has not such a free hand?—It is very difficult to go into details on the spur of the moment, but I can give you some examples. Certainly, with all our provincial appointments I think the Local Government might well settle how many officers there were to be in the Provincial Educational Service—how many assistant inspectors and so on. Further, if the Local Government considered that another professor was needed at the Presidency College I should have thought that it ought to have the power to appoint one or two or more. When I say power to appoint, of course the appointment is made by the Home Government; we can only ask for a man to be sent out.

2203. That is to say in the case of the Indian Educational Service two things happen; in the first place the Secretary of State has to approve the new post, and in the second place he has to select the officer. You desire to limit the functions of the Secretary of State to the selection of the officer. If the Government of Madras say they want two more professors in the Presidency College and that they ought to get so much and so much, the Secretary of State is simply to act as an agent of the provincial Government in obtaining the additional professors?—My view is that if the Local Government thinks fit to spend its money in that way instead of any other way they should be allowed to do so.

2204. You desire to abrogate the control of the Secretary of State in Council to that extent?—Yes, I think it comes to that, with regard to a matter of that sort.

2205. Are you aware that under the Government of India Act, 1858, the control of the revenues and expenditure of India is by statute vested in the Secretary of State in Council?—Yes.

2206. Would you be prepared to go to Parliament to alter that statute?—But what does "control" mean—what detail does "control" cover?

2207. Would you be prepared to urge that the control of the Secretary of State should be more general and far less detailed than it now is?—Yes.

2208. There has been a great deal of educational reform in India in the last half century, has there not?—Yes.

2209. Did those reforms initiate as a rule with the Local Governments or with the Government of India?—I cannot carry in mind the reforms of the last half century.

2210. Take the year 1901; did you attend the Educational Conference at Simla?—No.

2211. Anyhow, I may take it that there have been very considerable educational reforms in the last few years?—Yes.

2212. And that they have emanated from the Government of India?—I thought that the particular reforms to which you are referring were recommended by the local officials at the Simla Conference.

2213. That Conference was initiated by Lord Curzon?—Yes.

2214. Therefore, may we not say that, so far as the Conference did good work, it was due to the Viceroy?—Yes, I suppose you may say so.

2215. Was there not an important Resolution of 1904 issued by the Home Department of the Government of India about Indian educational policy?—Yes; that I understood to be the general review of the Public Instruction reports of the different provinces.

2216. Is the Government of India, overlooking as it does the general educational work of all the provinces, not in a better position to suggest advice than any one province could be, dealing merely with its own provincial affairs?—Well, yes, and no. The Government of India is an impersonal body: I should have thought, with the small number of men forming the Government of India, it very much depended on the individuality of the person who took charge of education. Where you are dealing more directly with the officers on the spot, they would be more in touch with changes of local conditions.

2217. The Local Government would be more in touch?—The Local Government and the local officers; they would get more quickly advised as to what was wanted.

2218. You mean that there would be a tendency on the part of the Government of India for doctrinaire theories to prevail, and undue centralization and the levelling up or down of particular provinces?—Yes. I should have thought the more the policy lies with the Government of India, the more it depends on the personality of the man in charge of that portfolio.

2219. And would you say that is not so in provinces; it does not vary here with the personality of the Member of the Council in charge of education?—It is so, but to a less extent probably, because he is nearer to all the influences—the public opinion, such as there is—that would be brought to bear upon any measure.

2220. Does not the existence of the Director-General who travels round the provinces and gets into contact with the local bodies and the local officers, correct any tendency of that sort which might exist at Simla or Calcutta; would he not come back and inform the Government of India as to what he had learnt locally?—That is pretty much what I said at the beginning; that we felt that as long as there was such a man there we were more likely to get a scheme sanctioned than if he were not there.

2221. Then you said that his advice came in too late—that it came in after the matter had gone up to the Government of India. Is there anything to prevent the Local Government consulting the Director-General before the scheme is sent up to the Government of India?—I can hardly say that; it is outside my province.

2222. You do not know?—I do not know that there is any rule; it is outside my province; I do not know what the Local Government may, or may not, do in the matter.

2223. I gather that if he is to be consulted you would rather that he should be consulted by the Local Government before they send up their scheme?—I would sooner consult him myself beforehand, as I said before, but not if he is then the officer who, if he differs with me, has the last word with the Government of India.

2224. Let us say you have some scheme of educational reform in hand, and you have reason to believe that it has been tried in northern India; would it be of advantage that you should write to the Director-General and say "Will you tell me what the result of this thing was in northern India"?—I think I should get more reliable information by writing to the Director in northern India.

2225. The Director of Public Instruction in the Punjab would not know whether the scheme you were referring to might suit Madras?—I am not sure about that.

2226. Now as to lapses. You spoke of your budget allotments being unduly restricted by reason of the rules as to lapses. Under what budget head does your educational expenditure appear; does it all come under the budget head "Education" or does some appear under "Public Works"?—Some appears under "Public Works" but I have nothing to do with the money under Public Works.

2227. The money that comes under "Public Works" is for the building and repair of schools?—Yes.

2228. You are speaking therefore simply of the money that comes under "Education"?—Yes, that is the only budget I prepare.

2229. That money may be roughly described as consisting of the salaries of the directing and inspecting staff, the actual cost of Government schools, and money that you pay out in grants-in-aid?—Yes.

2230. Are there not considerable lapses every year?—There have been lapses, but they are decreasing, I think, very much.

2231. Is it not almost inevitable that at the beginning of the year you should take perhaps too sanguine an estimate of what you would be able to spend during the year?—So it proves, because we have to wait so long for administrative sanction to schemes that are pending.

2232. Suppose your budget estimate was 20 lakhs and you spent 17; you would like to have 23 lakhs given you in the next budget?—What I meant was that the budget should not be looked upon as giving so much, but merely regarded as what I estimate the expenditure as likely to be. If the controlling authority says "You are not to spend so much," I have nothing to say; I am then limited; but they do not do that; it is regarded as so much money given, which I may spend if I can get only sanction to spend it.

2233. It is an estimate of probabilities?—That is what I say it ought to be; I think it is a little more than that in practice.

2234. It is the financial rule that any entry in the budget does not dispense with administrative sanction if administrative sanction is necessary; therefore the budget is an estimate of what you are likely to spend in a year?—Yes.

2235. If you say that you are likely to spend 20 lakhs and the provincial authorities, from experience, think that you are only likely to spend 17 lakhs, what is the harm in reducing the amount?—Towards the end of the year, if I find that I am right and they are wrong, I should have difficulty in getting the extra money.

2236. Have there been cases in which you have found that you were right and they were wrong?—Last year we exceeded our budget; this year we want two lakhs of rupees.

2237. Is there anything to prevent you, as you know the estimates are likely to be increased, asking them to give you an excess allotment?—There is nothing to prevent it, but it is very nervous work trying to do that so late in the year.

2238. Then you think it is safer to over-estimate than under-estimate, to put it briefly; you would rather have a large amount put in your budget with a possibility of a considerable lapse?—Personally I have tried to estimate as accurately as possible, and I have managed it much more accurately than it has been done in the past, I think, except for certain big schemes for which administrative sanction was withheld unexpectedly.

2239. These accidents will happen?—Yes.

2240. It was suggested in one of your answers to the Chairman that any amount that lapsed might be regrant in the following year; would that always be possible; might not the Government have a famine or some calamity upon it which would prevent the re-grant?—Yes.

2241. In that case you would be prepared to waive your grant?—If I am told that I am to cut down my expenditure I look round and see the items which I can cut down; that is different from budgeting.

2242. Your education allotment has been largely increased by the Government of India in late years?—Very largely.

2243. They have made additional grants for education?—Yes.

2244. Would they have been likely to have made such grants if education had not been under their control in any way?—I cannot say; it depends on how much they were interested in education.

2245. You think they might have done it all the same if they had had no voice in the management?—One would have thought so, if they were interested in the matter.

2246. Now with regard to Government colleges. You have a certain number of colleges which are not Government institutions in this Presidency?—Yes, a large number.

2247. How does the Government assist them?—By grants-in-aid.

2248. Has there been any complaint as to the illiberality of the grants-in-aid?—Yes—they are always asking for more.

2249. Was it not a recommendation of the 1882 Commission on Education that Government should gradually withdraw from higher education and leave that to private enterprise and aided bodies?—I do not know that it was exactly put in that way. You have got to define "higher education" in the first place.

2250. Take collegiate education?—I do not think there was much of that; I would rather not put an answer on record; one would have to refer to the document and study it.

2251. Does Government keep up many secondary schools itself outside the municipalities of which you were speaking?—We have only five or six Government secondary schools throughout the province. I mean by secondary schools what are called upper secondary or high schools; we have a few more lower secondary schools in connection with training schools.

2252. Does Government keep up any special girls' schools?—Yes, the largest number of Government schools which we have are girls' schools.

2253. I want to make it clear how far Government manages schools directly. You say there are a few boys' high schools and a number of girls' schools?—Yes; and there are a few schools for Muhammadans and a considerable number of schools for hill tribes.

2254. Those are managed by the Local Boards?—And by missionaries.

2255. But the Local Boards do not manage girls' schools?—Hitherto they have not.

2256. Take the schools which are under the control, financially, of the municipality; would they ordinarily be municipal schools completely staffed and run by the municipality, or would they be aided schools—private schools, helped by the municipality with grants-in-aid and so on?—There are both sorts.

2257. But which predominate in number and in importance?—The aided schools.

2258. Do the municipalities have to aid the schools entirely or does the Government help at all?—Under the new Code, if it is a secondary school the aid comes entirely from provincial funds direct; if it is an elementary school, the aid comes from, or through, municipal funds; that is to say, it is either municipal money or it is provincial money which is paid through the municipality.

Dr.
A. G. Bourne.
25 Nov., 1907.

2259. Never mind how it is paid; is it provincial money in the long run?—Yes, a great deal of it.

2260. Therefore, the Government does aid some schools in municipal areas?—Yes.

2261. Is that a recent tendency?—No, I think it has been going on for some time.

2262. Let me put it generally. Of late years has the tendency been for the municipalities to take more or less of educational expenditure off the shoulders of the Government?—It has not altered much in my period of administration. I am hardly prepared to answer as to the past history of the matter.

2263. But the bulk of the expenditure in the municipalities is provincial and not municipal?—In the municipalities the bulk is municipal; not, of course, in District Boards.

2265. Who is the principal officer within a district?—The assistant inspector. An assistant inspector has usually two districts; there are twelve for twenty-two districts.

2266. Who is the local Educational Officer to whom the municipality would ordinarily look when it became a question of establishing a fresh school or abolishing a school?—Theoretically that depends upon the class of the school; if it was a high school the inspector would be consulted; if it was a primary school the assistant inspector—not necessarily; it might be even a sub-assistant inspector.

2267. Has he to be consulted?—No, he has not; there is no rule by which he is consulted. Of course, a great many of our officers are on the Councils and on the District Boards, and they bring forward their proposals at the Board meetings.

2268. Can a municipality having a municipal primary school abolish that primary school without reference to your department?—Not if it is a municipal school.

2269. Who would do that?—The Government.

2270. It cannot do anything with the school without Government sanction?—No, it cannot.

2271. With regard to aid, can it withdraw its aid to a school or extend its aid to a school on its own authority?—Yes, by rule.

2272. Subject to the rules laid down in the Grant-in-aid Code?—What I meant was rather the other way—that according to the rule it can, but in practice it would never do so.

2273. It would never withdraw a school from its aided list without reference to Government?—Unless the proposal came originally from our department.

2274. All proposals come from your department?—I think so.

2275. If the assistant inspector went to a school and thought the school was in a disgraceful condition, could he not put the matter before the Council?—He could. This does not come to me officially; it is not part of the official routine that the inspectors should advise the Councillors or that they should settle the aid, but I believe that in practice they do.

2276. Is it the fact that, where the municipality pays for the upkeep of schools, it is controlled in every way by the Educational Department?—It is advised at one end and controlled at the other; it is advised to begin with, and controlled to finish up with.

2277. It is advised locally, and controlled at the top?—Yes.

2278. Does that control chiefly come through the budget proposals or through specific proposals?—In the first place, at the beginning of the year the municipality has to submit its budget through you—has it not?—Yes.

2279. And if the municipality wanted largely to alter their educational methods, that would be on the budget, and you would advise in that case?—Yes.

2280. But outside the budget, suppose they wanted to make some minor alteration, would it still have to come up to Government through you?—Yes.

2281. Do you sometimes differ with the municipality as to what is a fair amount of provision to be made for education?—I do not think we often differ in the case of municipalities; the whole extent of municipal operations is so small that we do not pay so much attention to those matters as in the case of District Boards.

2282. When you say the extent of municipal operations, what do you mean by that?—I mean the total amount dealt with, the number of schools dealt with, and so on. The municipal budget for education is small as compared with the District Board budget; and as a matter of fact we rather tend to push them on I expect.

2283. Take the Madras Municipality; does that maintain schools?—Yes, it maintains one school.

2284. Does it not aid education?—No, very little; the Madras Municipality is on an absolutely different footing from all other municipalities. The Act is different.

2285. Does the Madras Municipality undertake educational functions as mufassal municipalities do; is it entirely responsible for the administration of education in the town?—No, the Act says it must provide for the education of the poor—that is all.

2286. But is not everybody "poor" when it comes to payment for education?—That is so; there is no definition of "poor."

2287. In practice, is the Education of Madras City financed by the Government or by the Municipality, speaking broadly?—I mean apart from the colleges. Take the primary schools first; who finances the primary schools generally; is it the Government or the Madras Municipality?—I should hardly like the figures to go on record, but I think the Municipality gives about Rs. 14,000 a year as their allotment and we gave them about Rs. 22,000 as contribution last year; all the rest of the money comes from private sources, Missions and so on; I am not quite sure about the exact figures.

2288. We may take it that the bulk of the expenditure is Government expenditure?—Yes.

2289. And, in so far as the Madras Municipality spends it, is it under the same control as the district municipalities, speaking generally?—The question has never occurred to me; I have never had anything passing through me from the Madras Corporation except their budget.

2290. Then I may take it that the Madras Municipality has a freer hand, otherwise you would have had the matter before you?—Quite so.

2291. Now with regard to the District Boards. You say your main interest is in District and taluk Boards. The taluk Boards run the primary schools?—Yes.

2292. Are the bulk of the schools under them board schools or are they aided schools?—The bulk are aided schools.

2293. However, you are doubtful as to the expediency of applying the same principle to female education as you propose for boys' schools?—Under our new Grant-in-aid Code, we have given them the nominal power of giving grants to girls' schools as well as to boys' schools; we have given up an old distinction which we used to have, and given them that power. That is how this case happened to come up where they gave grants to the boys' schools and not to the girls' schools.

2294. You said you would give them larger powers with regard to boys' schools and do away with certain restrictions. Would you do the same with regard to girls' schools?—I said I should like to, hoping that it would work, but I should have my doubts as to whether it would work or not.

2295. Taking this list which the Chairman discussed with you, all these educational rules and the Grant-in-aid Code and so forth, are those the rules and the Code of the Madras Government, or of the Government of India?—These are all Madras Government rules.

2296. Then is there anything to prevent the Madras Government giving you these powers to-morrow?—Nothing with regard to most of them, if not all, I think.

2297. Then they might have given you the powers two years ago, for that matter, or at any time?—Yes.

2298. They are not in any way fettered by law or by executive regulations of the Government of India in regard to these matters?—Speaking generally, not; I would not answer for all of them.

2299. Take the regulations for European schools; is that a matter that the Government of India would be likely to control, or is it entirely a Madras Code?—No; that is the one Code which is an Indian Code.

2300. There is a centralized Code for India?—Yes. Our power under that Code is very small indeed.

2301. Is there one uniform Code sanctioned by the Government of India for the whole country, or do they sanction separate Codes for each province?—One Code was issued for all the provinces and the Local Governments were asked to modify certain details; but generally speaking they were not empowered to modify the articles of the Code. What was actually done in this Presidency was to add footnotes explaining how the articles should be read in the Madras Presidency.

2302. The Code was sent as a model Code and re-issued as a Madras Code?—Yes, with very slight modifications.

2303. The general principles were fixed for the Local Government, but they might make modifications and re-issue it as a Madras Code?—Yes.

2304. Consequently you could not alter it in any material respect without reference to the Government of India, is that what you mean?—Yes.

2305. I understand you to say that the rules about text-books for use in aided schools and colleges were merely in order to forbid the use of objectionable text-books. Are there not two things there?—One is under Rules 85 and 91 of the Educational Rules; the other under article 12 of the Grant-in-Aid Code; then we have rules for the Text-book Committee.

2306. Generally does the Government prescribe a large list of text-books among which the aided schools may choose, or does it merely say "You can use what you like provided you do not take anything that is in our index expurgatorius"?—It makes a large list.

2307. And they have freedom within that list?—Yes.

2308. But they may not go outside the list even though the book is not kept?—Quite so. The other list I referred to is in force too, but there has never been an example; the one rule was intended to allow them to build up an index expurgatorius if necessary, but there has been no case so far as I know.

2309. It is naturally not necessary, when the other list exists; it is a power proposed to be given to the Director of Public Instruction; would you apply it to an institution like the Christian College in Madras?—It refers to schools.

2310. It is "schools and colleges" according to the wording in some of these items?—The list refers to schools; the power to forbid refers to schools, colleges and all institutions.

2311. The list refers to schools; the college only is subject to the index expurgatorius?—Yes.

2312. Has there not always been a certain amount of—shall I say—healthy competition and jealousy between the Presidency College and the Christian College?—Yes.

2313. They look upon each other as rival institutions?—I do not know that the Presidency College picks out the Christian College as its rival.

2314. Is there a tendency to convert aided schools into Board schools or vice versa?—Within the last year or two we have been converting a certain number of aided schools into Board schools—perhaps 200 or 300—a few hundreds out of 28,000 schools that we have got in the Presidency.

2315. Has the taluk Board anything like a free hand in the matter of that policy; suppose it wants to convert a Board school into an aided school, would it have to come up to Government through you in every case?—It would.

2316. And in the selection of teachers for its Board schools has it got to consult the local educational authorities?—Yes; I think there must be some financial rule; as to appointments over Rs. 50 they have to consult the local authorities.

2317. The bulk of the appointments in primary schools would be under Rs. 50?—Yes.

2318. The schoolmaster might get Rs. 10 a month or so?—Yes.

2319. In the selection of individual teachers have the taluk Board a free hand or must they abide by the decision of the inspector of schools?—I know of no rule which guides them.

2320. But, in practice, they would follow the opinion of the inspector?—I presume so.

2321. These taluk Board schools are paid for by the taluk Board?—Yes.

2322. But are they managed by them or by your officers?—They are managed by our officers.

2323. Is that a good system?—There is nobody else to manage them; nobody else comes forward; they are nominally managed by the Boards, but the Boards never pay any attention to them.

2324. Your opinion in regard to the municipalities was that Government should take over the work of the secondary schools?—Yes. I would not put that too strongly, but we might take over at any rate some of these secondary schools with advantage.

2325. But in the Local Boards would you keep the existing method, or if Government controls, would you let the Government take it over straightforwardly?—I would rather like to see all secondary schools under public management as Government schools, that is to say to confine the local bodies to elementary education, and to give them a freer hand in that matter.

2326. You propose that the State should take the secondary education and that the local bodies should take primary education; and that, in that case, the local bodies should not have to come up to you as to any school the status of which they wanted to alter?—Just so.

2327. When you say primary education, do you include what are known as middle vernacular schools?—We have got hardly any of those.

2328. You made a distinction a little while ago; you said there were schools that were nominally secondary schools but were in reality not so?—Even now we are obliged to classify them in two classes; a school which intends to train its pupils for secondary teaching, and a school that has not got that intention. There is no clear distinction between the two.

2329. But if you applied the broad principle you formulated just now the distinction would be clear?—I mean on the one hand the real secondary school, where the pupils are going in for secondary education, whatever stage of it the school may cover, and I mean on the other hand the elementary school, which may go up to what you mean by the middle vernacular standard.

2330. You would call that elementary?—Yes, so long as the bulk of the pupils were not going further.

2331. Then as to female education, would you leave that to Government as it is now, or would you leave female primary education with the Boards?—Well, we have a number of Government girls' schools.

2332. Would you apply the same principle to the girls' schools as you propose for the boys' schools—Government to take the secondary and the local bodies to take the primary?—I should like to, if I thought the local bodies would not neglect it; but I had a case last year where they deliberately gave the grants to the boys' schools and cut the girls' schools short; I think that would often happen, or might often happen.

2333. Therefore, at present you would keep it in the hands of Government, or would you risk an occasional failure of justice so to speak, and give the local authorities the power?—Of course, it is a wide question. I cannot help thinking that very little will be done for female education until the people realise that they want it, and perhaps they might begin to realise that they wanted it if they were badly treated by a local body. But it might be rather bad for female education in the meantime.

2334. On the other hand, the people would have what they wanted; if they preferred increasing male education rather than female education they would get it?—Yes.

2335. But would there be any dislike on the part of the Christian College authorities to having these text-book regulations vested in you instead of in the Local Government?—It is just possible that they might raise an objection.

2336. They might regard the Director as being perhaps more connected with the Presidency College than with the Christian College?—Objection has been taken by certain of the Missions to the Director being substituted for the Government in other places.

2337. On the ground that the Director is more related to the Government schools with which they may regard themselves as competing to some extent?—Yes.

2338. (Sir Steyning Edgerley.) I take it that on the whole you are satisfied with your relations with the Local Government?—Quite.

2339. And so far as they are concerned all you think is that there might be a certain delegation of authority to you and power to you to again delegate that down to your inspectors and principals of colleges?—Yes.

2340. Do you think they could give you that in a general form subject to a monthly or quarterly return of what you have done?—I almost think I would rather not have it subject to the condition of a monthly return.

2341. Would that not help to find out the places where the shoe pinched and so lead on to more formal delegation?—I understand we are speaking of the delegation of matters of detail.

2342. No. I am speaking of anything.—I submit a yearly report on Public Instruction.

2343. In Bombay we are trying, purely as an experiment, a plan by which Government entrusts its right of sanction, so far as it can be assumed, to all Heads of Departments subject to their sending in a statement at the end of the month showing how they have used it; and they in their turn have been given authority to delegate their authority to the next officer below them on the same conditions. The idea is that we shall thus get a body of information with regard to matters in which the control now exercised is useless and may be finally abrogated. Do you think that would help you at all?—Yes, it might; I do not picture exactly at the moment how it would work. A return always invites opposition, I think; I find that when an officer sends returns to me they are scrutinised in my office with the view of finding something in them—some clerk wishes to pick a hole somewhere. A return is always of that nature; it invites criticism from the clerks in the office.

2344. That would depend on how it was dealt with?—Quite so, but I mean that almost naturally follows.

2345. Suppose Government were endeavouring to decentralize and were looking at these returns from the point of view of seeing what they could unload; would that not alter the case?—It depends on who Government is.

2346. I mean Government itself; I do not mean any officer?—Just so.

2347. As to your relations with the Government of India on educational matters, I take it that speaking very generally your position is that education is a function which properly appertains to the Local Government and not to the Central Government?—That is the general position that I wish to take up.

2348. As regards the Director-General (I do not wish to put it at all offensively to the Government of India), your idea rather is that so far as he lessens the educational inefficiency of the Home Department you consider him distinctly beneficial; is that not about what it comes to?—What I really mean is that when a scheme gets on to paper, and there is an expert there, the Home Department may be led astray; office-notes are sent up and may go off at a tangent, and the main issue is very often lost sight of.

2349. The Director-General helps them to understand the case?—Exactly.

2350. So far as you are concerned, if you had to use the Director-General at all, you would like to consult him yourself before you approached the Local Government?—If I consulted anybody outside the Presidency, I would sooner consult the Director of a neighbouring province.

2351. You would not care to consult the Director-General at all?—I would rather consult another provincial Director, I think.

2352. You would not care to go to him for information as to whether there was anything of the same sort at work in another province?—Personally, I have no great passion for that sort of information; I prefer to deal with the facts that we have here, and to do the best we can with them.

2353. Then, honestly, you do not want to consult the Director-General?—No.

2354. There were a number of questions put to you as to the abolition of the Secretary of State's control and so forth. I take it that your position there is that you think that people should recognise that the Local Government is composed of sensible and tried administrators, with a responsibility to the public, and is worthy of the widest confidence as to the application of general principles in its own territory?—Yes; I spoke more as a member of the public than as Director of Public Instruction.

2355. I mean if reference is made to matters like the abolition of the University, you regard that as outside the pale of practical politics?—Yes.

2356. You spoke of an occasion on which 3 lakhs were ordered to be cut down from your budget. Do you happen to know where that came from?—It was a Government of India order.

2357. And I suppose it was on the ground that you had not been able to spend your money in the previous year?—I suppose so.

2358. Your view is that you purchase that accuracy of estimate which is insisted upon at considerable administrative inconvenience?—Yes, that is all; I did not mind whether the budget was cut down; all I could say was "I have said what I want to spend; you do not tell me that I am not to spend so much; you merely tell me that I have over-estimated; you do not tell me to curtail my expenditure; you tell me that I have over-estimated." I say "It does not matter to me; I do not think I have over-estimated, and it will not matter to me so long as I can spend what I want up to the end of the year."

2359. Only if you happen to be right you have got to go through a considerable amount of trouble to get that 3 lakhs back again?—Yes.

2360. And you, being nearer the actual matters to be administered and subject to the delays of administrative sanction, consider that you are more likely to be able to know what you can spend in any particular year?—That is what I thought.

2361. You prefer not to be governed by figures of the past; is that what it comes to?—Yes.

2362. How low down does your cadre of provincial appointments go?—Take the headmastership of high schools—are they provincial?—Yes, but we have only two or three Government high schools in this Presidency.

2363. The assistant divisional inspector?—Yes, what we call the assistant inspector and the college lecturers.

2364. Does the fact of the Government appointing these officers rather give them prestige and status?—No doubt.

2365. As to the Subordinate Service you send up no appointments at all; you make all those yourself?—Yes; they are also gazetted, but they are not technically Gazetted Officers.

2366. They are gazetted by you; you put them into the Gazette, not Government?—Quite so.

2367. Does your system of grants-in-aid give you very much routine work and trouble?—An enormous amount of work is entailed by the Grant-in-Aid Code.

2368. Could that be simplified at all?—I have tried very much. This Code is much simpler than any other we have had. Any proposals I made, I think, would be accepted.

2369. Suppose a school comes up for a grant-in-aid for a building costing Rs. 20,000; what is your procedure?—That is a building grant; we give very large amounts for teaching grants here.

2370. Those are settled on the inspectors' reports?—Yes.

2371. They give you less trouble?—They give a great deal of trouble too. However, take the building grant; you suggest that I am asked for a grant of Rs. 20,000.

2372. You know it is coming; how do you set about it?—All such applications go to Government. We send up the plan; we ask the manager who wants the grant to send up plans of the proposed building, and we scrutinise those plans. I scrutinise them from the educational point of view; we agree to them from that point of view; they go on to Government, who then refer to the Public Works Department, who look at them from a constructional point of view, and generally suggest modifications.

2373. Do you first of all include it in the budget?—We budget generally for all buildings for the following year; it is one of our uncertain items in the budget, because we never know what applications we shall get; still less do we know what applications will be got through during the year.

2374. Then after you have got the administrative sanction you also have to get a trust deed?—Yes; that is in our Code; I have power to exempt from any trust deed.

2375. If it is decided, however, to have a trust deed, can you dispose of that matter yourself?—Yes.

2376. You do not send it to Government?—No, I do it with the aid of the Government Solicitor.

2377. Do you think it would be a practical suggestion that Government should say, your relations being what they are, "Our budget grant for education is so much, 20 or 30 lakhs or whatever it is; we will give you a much closer control of the different heads; we will let you have your own budget in fact"?—I cannot see what harm it would do.

2378. Have you power of reappropriation within your educational budget?—Yes; there must be some limits, but I cannot say offhand what they are. Generally I have no trouble about that. The money for grants-in-aid I can reappropriate from any head to any other head.

2379. (Sir Frederic Lely.) I do not quite understand one thing you said about the municipality having to get sanction through you for every item of expenditure. Do you mean that if there is a grant of Rs. 100 for repairs to furniture, the repair of every broken bench has to go up for Government sanction?—I am not quite sure as to repairs.

2380. Take the matter of the purchase of a book.—In the matter of buying a new book or adding any periodical to the list, I know that both those cases go up.

2381. The municipality's budget for the year having been duly sanctioned, if there is any expenditure against a budget item for a book, say a one-rupee book, does that have to go up to Government for separate sanction?—Apparently; usually they send me a list of books, and I am expected to scrutinise them, and say whether they are good books or not.

2382. That is probably necessary?—That comes in in connection with the sanction for expenditure.

2383. Every separate act of expenditure has to go up?—Yes, I think so, if of that nature.

2384. I do not quite understand what is meant by the great majority of primary schools being aided. They are most of them in the villages?—Yes.

2385. Who are considered the managers of a village primary school for the purpose of receiving a grant-in-aid?—A large number of them have Mission managers.

2386. I am speaking of the ordinary village primary school?—We have an enormous number that are Mission schools; we have many others—a larger number—where we speak of the teacher as the manager.

2387. Is he responsible for the running of the school?—It is his school.

2388. It is his private speculation so to speak?—Yes, that is what it comes to. He starts a school in the village.

2389. Suppose a village is in want of a school, what would be the first step towards creating one? Does a private teacher come to a village and propose to set up the school?—What usually happens is that an officer like the munsif or the karnam has children to educate; he sends round to a man and says, "You come here and start a school and I will give you two or three of my boys, there are others who will do the same and you can take in other children; then you can ask for a grant-in-aid, and Government will probably give you a grant-in-aid."

2390. Who decides upon the man?—There is no rule; it would be a private arrangement; he is not paid in any way; he makes what he can.

2391. Who decides the holidays that should be taken; do you interfere in a matter like that?—We have a list of holidays, but we do not know what happens in these villages. It is usually only once a year that any of our officers get to any particular village.

2392. But you theoretically assert the power of fixing the holidays and the hours of attendance?—Yes, theoretically. We have relaxed those rules very much in our new rules. We have educational rules which lay down those things; then we have grant-in-aid rules which take count of some of the educational rules for the purposes of the grant, and we say that if certain of these rules are not complied with, we shall cut down the grant.

2393. How far do you leave the management of a school in regard to all those details to the discretion of the villagers, and how far do you, through your officers, interfere?—For instance, with regard to free scholars, have you any rules about fees?—We know nothing about fees.

2394. Practically you leave the school to be run by the villagers?—Practically it comes to that, and the inspector goes round once a year, or twice if he can do so.

2395. There is no such thing as the formal appointment of a village school committee?—No.

2396. You deal with the master?—Yes. I have been to very few villages where the people would take sufficient interest to form a committee. There is no objection now to their forming a committee; if they compose a school committee we would deal with them now under our rules; we should call them the managers.

2397. Have you annual examinations?—Yes; when the inspector can, he goes round and examines.

2398. And upon the result of that you base your grant-in-aid?—Yes; or rather we fix the grant first; we say so much per teacher and so much per pupil, and the District Officer might recommend the grant being cut down by so much, or enhanced by so much per cent. We do not give him absolute power to withdraw the grant; we give him power to reduce it or increase it by 25 per cent., and we give the set of sub-assistants belonging to a district the power to distribute a certain allotment in that way, cutting down the bad schools and giving the balance to the better ones.

2399. Do you give any money in building grants for village schools?—No, not in building grants; what we have done is to build school-houses—not as a grant.

2400. Are repairs left to the villagers?—In some cases; it differs in different districts; we are trying to let the system develop.

2401. In the case of a new school, would you build a house for them?—We have been doing that lately, in the last year or two.

2402. Do you not think it would be much better to leave it to the village itself to house its own school?—There again we have tried to help the villagers to do it, but it has been different in different districts. In some districts it has been given into the hands of the Public Works Department, which has led to greater expenditure.

2403. That is taking it entirely out of the hands of the villagers?—Yes, that is one extreme; then we have had other cases where we have allowed the local Revenue Officer to do it, and there the villagers have co-operated with him; and lastly, there have been cases where it has been given to one of their own village contractors.

2404. Do you think there would be any objection to saying to the villagers when they come to you and ask for help to build houses "You build your own houses; we will leave the school house to you entirely"?—You mean to make them pay for it?

2405. Perhaps they are scarcely ready for that, but to give them a small grant to spend themselves. —Yes, that might be done. What happened in some districts where we were building, to my personal knowledge, was that the villagers said "Now, if you will build this school twice the size that you contemplate we will provide the other half of the cost." We encourage that as much as we can, and there is a great deal done in that way.

2406. So far as superintending the building goes, might not the expenditure of such money as you give be left entirely to the villagers very often in the case of the better class of villages?—I am afraid I am not sufficiently conversant with the village communities here to say how it could actually be done; I suppose it could be done.

2407. One question about the Training Schools. Have you more than one Training School for high class education in the Presidency?—We have between 20 and 30.

2408. For secondary schools?—We have two colleges where we take graduates and train them to be teachers, and there are between 20 and 30 Training Schools where we take people of lower educational qualifications and train them to be teachers for elementary, and in some cases for secondary schools.

2409. Do the Collectors and Sub-Divisional Officers and District Officers generally visit the Training Schools and Training Colleges; do they take any interest in them?—It depends on the man; some of them take a great interest.

2410. If a Collector, for instance, never goes near a Training School which happens to be in his district, does it excite any remark?—I do not think it does; you mean does it excite any remark in the village?

2411. Or in the department?—Yes, I think our officers rather wish he would.

2412. Are you aware that there are any specific Government orders to that effect—that the Collector should visit the various institutions—primary schools to begin with?—I could not quote the orders; I have an impression that it has been laid down somewhere that officers should interest themselves in schools and colleges.

2413. You think there may be orders to that effect, but if so they have probably become obsolete according to what you say?—I do not know of them as orders.

2414. In your knowledge, Collectors very seldom do visit schools?—I say sometimes they do; it depends upon the man; some men do, and some do not.

2415. So that the orders of the Government, if they exist, have become rather obsolete?—If they exist, yes.

2416. Suppose a Collector visited a Training School and found the discipline very bad; suppose he formed a very poor opinion of it and wrote to you to say so; what action would you take?—We have got an Inspector of Training Schools; I should write in the first place to him and await his report.

2417. And if his report was that the school was in a bad state?—It depends how bad the state of things was; presumably, if it was something very serious, I should go and look at it myself at once.

2418. Suppose the Collector discovered what he considered to be a serious defect in the Training School, but not serious enough to call for your personal attention, you would send it to your subordinate and call for his personal opinion?—Yes.

2419. If his opinion was different from that of the Collector would you let the matter drop?—I should not follow a general rule: it would depend entirely upon what the matter was. If I thought the Collector was quite wrong in the matter, I should ask Government to give a ruling; if it was a serious matter and I thought the Collector was wrong, that is what I should do.

2420. A Collector is an officer of high standing in his district?—Yes.

2421. Suppose he went to see a Training College and formed a strong opinion about it and communicated that opinion to you, and it was submitted by you to an officer of inferior rank, it would put the Collector rather in a false position, would it not?—But our Inspector of European Training Schools is one of our senior inspectors; of course he has not the rank of a Collector.

2422. Would not that rather discourage District Officers from co-operating with you, or rather do you think there is any objection to making it a rule that if the Collector brought to your notice any special point, any defect or otherwise in the department, and your opinion after enquiry disagreed with his, you should forward the case as a matter of course for the orders of Government?—No.

2423. It would put the Collector in a stronger position?—Yes.

2424. And it would encourage him more to co-operate with you?—Yes. I see no objection to making such a rule.

2425. (Mr. Dutt.) Referring to the list of powers which the Government recommend for delegation, did you say that in these cases you would like the powers delegated to you or that they should remain with the Government?—I am confining my question to the items relating to text-books?—I am not aware that I have expressed an opinion about it.

2426. Then I would ask you whether you would recommend that those powers now exercised by Government should be delegated to you or that they should remain with the Government?—I would recommend that they be delegated.

2427. That is as to prescribing text-books for use in schools, and prescribing lists for unaided schools and colleges, including I suppose missionary colleges?—Yes.

2428. In fact, all these items you think might be delegated to the Director?—Yes.

2429. Then you would undertake the duty of framing rules for the Text-Book Committee, and also of appointing the members of the Committee?—Yes, I always have done so, and the suggestions have been accepted speaking generally.

2430. But you would have no objection to doing it yourself?—No.

2431. A large number of Board schools are aided schools?—Not Board schools.

2432. The schools maintained by District Boards from their district funds?—If they are really what are called Board schools they are not aided.

2433. They are entirely supported by the District Boards?—Either with their own funds, or with funds that we give them for the purpose.

2434. From the educational grants?—Yes.

2435. The others you call aided schools?—Yes, they are under private management.

2436. But aided by Board funds?—Yes or from funds paid through the Board. We really pay the bulk of the contribution.

2437. Their net expenditure is very small?—Our contribution is very large.

2438. Have the District Boards any deputy inspectors or sub-inspectors under them?—They have at present certain inspecting officers called supervisors.

2439. What would be the pay of those officers?—It varies from Rs. 20 to Rs. 25, or even Rs. 30, Rs. 40, and Rs. 50; there is some difference under different Boards, but that is about what those men draw.

2440. They inspect these schools as well as your Educational Officers?—Yes, they go to the schools. The idea is that if they have been properly looked after by the inspector and he has trained these men, as some of them are being trained, they really try to help the teacher rather than to inspect the school, and show them how to do things; they teach them a few things; they even spend a few days there; that is the theory, and the theory is gradually coming into practice in some of the districts under the more active inspectors.

2441. You say your inspectors and officers are not able to inspect these schools frequently?—It comes to about once or twice a year. It is either once or twice. If a man has 150 schools scattered throughout the country, it is not likely that he will visit them all twice in a year.

2442. You made a suggestion that the primary schools might be made over to local bodies and the secondary schools might be kept under the management of the Educational Department?—That seems to me to be the most rational course.

2443. Would you in that case suggest that the inspection and management of these primary schools should be vested in the local bodies subject to such special instructions as your department may lay down?—I think it would be much better that the inspectors should be a Government agency.

2444. Are you familiar at all with the Bengal system? The District Boards have got their own schools and their own educational inspecting staff, and all the schools aided or supported by District Boards are inspected by their staff, who are paid by themselves; practically they take over the whole management of the schools which they pay for. Would you recommend that system for the primary schools which you say may be placed under the District Boards?—Perhaps I should if they paid for them, but I say they do not pay for them, and as they do not pay for them, I recommend that the person who pays should inspect.

2445. Would it not be more consistent with the objects of the Local Self Government Act that the institutions should be made over entirely to the Local Boards and should be inspected and maintained by the Local Boards?—I think it would if our object is to teach the people to govern themselves. If our object is an educational one, I think perhaps we had better save education from their control for the present.

2446. So far as primary education is concerned, would not the staff under the District Boards, under the instructions which your department would lay down, be fairly able to inspect the institutions? Of course it may be necessary to increase their pay, but if the duty was devolved on them, you could decentralize to that extent. The Government might require the Boards to keep more inspectors, and the whole duty of inspecting these primary schools might be devolved upon them?—I do not see any reason for it. I should think that one man is as good as another for inspection purposes; perhaps I do not quite follow you.

2447. In your opinion could not the Bengal system, as I have described it, with certain help from you, be introduced into Madras?—If you have the inspecting agency under Government, it is a larger Service, and there is more prospect of promotion to the men—it is all one Service—and we get better men in that way than a Board would get. There are many men who would come and serve Government who would not serve under a District Board.

2448. You mentioned incidentally the little interest taken by members of the District Board in such secondary schools as there are under their management?—In all schools under their management.

2449. You are aware of the section in the Local Self Government Act which gives the entire executive power to the Collector?—I am not familiar with the terms of the Act.

2450. The section runs thus: "Resolutions of the Local Board" (that of course includes a District Board and a taluk Board), "shall be carried into effect by the President, in whom the executive power of the Board shall be vested, and who shall be directly responsible for the due fulfilment of the purposes of this Act." I understand that the entire executive power of the Board vests in the District Collector as President of the District Board?—Yes.

2451. And under those circumstances would you not expect that the duty of looking after these schools would require to be performed by the President and not by the members?—Yes, but then I say they are not performed by him as President, but they are performed by him as Collector; that is a subtle distinction, but you are making a more subtle distinction still; he is touring as Collector, and he would inspect equally if there were no District Board at all; that is the point.

2452. He is the President of the District Board?—Yes.

2453. And when he goes round he goes round as Collector and President of the District Board?—Yes, in a sense.

2454. You mentioned something about the mismanagement or neglect of the schools by the members of municipal councils and of your receiving complaints that their relations are very often recommended as teachers. Would you like that to go down as part of your formal evidence?—I say that I think there are complaints with regard to these matters.

2455. You would like that to go down as part of your formal evidence?—I have no objection one way or the other.

2456. May I ask you in how many cases have you generally received such complaints?—That I can hardly say; these things do not come to me in detail; I spoke of it as hearsay; I mean, it is what is told me when I am touring.

2457. Can you tell me who makes these complaints?—I believe they come both from officers and from teachers themselves.

2458. Have you thought any particular case sufficiently important to make any enquiry into it?—There have been cases where I have asked Government to interfere in the appointment of teachers in municipal schools.

2459. And have Government taken action by cancelling the appointments?—Yes.

2460. Within this current year or the last two years?—I think the last case was two years ago perhaps.

2461. So they are very rare?—They are very rare, but we do get them.

2462. Occasionally, but rarely, you do receive such complaints, and action has been taken?—Yes; as a rule I pay no attention to them.

Dr.
A. G. Bourne.

Dr.
A. G. Bourne,
25 Nov., 1907.

2463. Comparing the results of examinations have you found that schools worked by municipalities are worse than schools of the same standing worked by Government?—I could not generalise as to that.

2464. You made some remark as to the inferiority of the schools managed by municipalities?—I did not compare them with anything. I did not say that they were inferior to some other class of schools. I think I said that they were inferior to what they might be, and what I hope they would be, if we could have a free hand in managing them.

2465. You would not go so far as to say that the schools worked by municipalities are worse, judged by their annual results, than schools worked by Government?—I could not generalise in that way.

2466. Now in the list that is before us, recommendations have been made for the devolution of power from the Local Government to the Director of Public Instruction; is there any way that you can suggest by which any powers of control or supervision now exercised by the Education Department could be devolved on local bodies, either District Boards or taluk Boards?—With what object?

2467. Simply with the object of decentralization; a great deal of work is in your hands, and for that reason proposals have been made to give you ampler powers; in the same way would you trust Local Boards or municipalities to perform certain duties and to exercise certain powers which are now exercised by Government officers?—That must depend on the point of view. If you tell me to take the point of decentralization, it could be done, but if you mean would that improve education, I say I am very doubtful whether it would.

2468. Have the village unions got any power of supervision over the primary schools in the villages?—No, I think not; I am not sure; I have never come across a village union.

2469. Would you agree with the suggestion that they should have some powers in managing or supervising the schools within their own limits?—I really cannot answer.

2470. If by giving them some supervision they got more in touch with the village schools, they might probably come forward to build houses, and you would save that cost?—My impression was that there was a union here and there, but that there was no system.

2471. (Mr. Hichens.) You have indicated in general terms where the shoe pinches in the relations between the Government of India and the provincial Government with regard to education. Is one of the points that you feel most strongly about the financial point, viz., the reduction in your budget, and another point, not a financial point, but in regard to appointments to your staff; you want further freedom on those points?—When I spoke of reduction of the budget I did not mean curtailing funds.

2472. But you meant the reduction of your estimates?—Yes.

2473. Then you wanted further powers in regard to the appointment of your staff?—That the Madras Government should have further powers.

2474. Are there any further points that you can suggest in regard to which you would like to have freer powers?—No. I cannot give you any points with regard to which I could suggest that this Government should have freer powers; of course, it is not my business to do so; I do not know exactly what the relations are at present between this Government and the Imperial Government.

2475. So far as you are concerned, those are the two points that appeal to you?—Those are the points that appeal to me as Head of a Department under this Government.

2476. (Chairman.) You have advocated several times, and you have repeated again, your desire that there should be greater financial freedom to yourself as Director of Public Instruction?—Freedom from financial rules.

2477. And control?—I do not quite catch the difference.

2478. Have you reflected at all what would be the effect on the finances of the Government of India if ten provincial Governments were all allowed to have unrestricted power of sanctioning large educational schemes involving considerable expenditure?—I assumed that they would have so much money to deal with, and it was for them to decide how they would deal with a certain sum; that is all.

2479. You are quite contented then, from your point of view as Head of a Department, that the Government should allot to you a certain sum of money, and, having allotted it to you, that you should be free to spend it as you liked?—Yes, and afterwards, if I can show that it has been well spent and that we can spend more, they should be prepared to consider whether they can give more, without considering in detail what it is to be spent upon. I mean that they should not go into detail; that is the point.

2480. But suppose that the Government of India desired to give you more, yet, having themselves only a certain sum to spend, and desiring to allot that sum to the best of their ability between the different provincial Governments, are they not bound to examine the proposals of the various Governments in order to see which best deserve the grants that they can afford to give?—Of course this is a little out of my province, but I should have thought that the area of the province, the number of the people, and the revenue which it contributed, were elements to be taken into consideration—not the value of the scheme proposed.

2481. Do you at present consult either officially or unofficially the Directors of Public Instruction in other provinces?—Two years ago we all met together and had a conference, and exchanged our views pretty freely.

2482. I do not quite mean that, but do you communicate with them pretty constantly?—We agreed then to send to each other all our publications of any importance. I have looked through all the documents that I have had sent to me; nothing, I think, has actually cropped up recently; I have got all their Codes.

2483. When you are confronted with any difficulty in solving an educational problem, do you ever write to the other Directors officially or otherwise?—I should write demi-officially.

2484. You have told us that you cannot make any further suggestion which would affect any delegation of power to provincial Governments. Is there any direction in which you, as Head of the Education Department in Madras, would like to see further delegation of general power other than particular power?—I mean in larger questions?—I can only note details. I have noted the details of certain work which I have to do which could be done equally well by other people.

2485. (Mr. Meyer.) Would you give a statement of the amount to be spent in grants-in-aid this year on schools aided by District Boards? How much comes from "Provincial" and how much from "Local"? Does such amount as is shown as contributed from "Provincial" to "Local" really represent contributions by the Government of India to District Boards passed pro forma through the provincial account?—The total amount required for grants-in-aid this year to schools aided by District Boards is about Rs. 8,24,000, of which only Rs. 2,64,720 may be expected from "Local" funds, the balance if paid must come from "Provincial." The Boards also require a sum of Rs. 4,18,262 towards the cost of maintenance, &c., of their own schools. In reply to the last part of the question I do not know whether this is or is not the correct way of stating the case. With the permission of the Government of India 6 lakhs has been of recent years added to the Educational budget for expenditure by or through the agency of Local Boards.

(The witness withdrew.)

Colonel R. J. MACNAMARA, I.M.S., was called and examined.

2486. (Chairman.) You are Inspector-General of Prisons in Madras?—Yes.

2487. Have you any general remarks which you wish to make?—I think that centralization in the Jail Department exists more in the relations of jails to the Inspector-General of Prisons than between the latter officer and Government. Superintendents are much too restricted in the powers they can exercise, and their energies are not judiciously directed. There is too much office work and too many statistical returns of various sorts to be prepared. I would recommend that Superintendents be given more power in the matter of managing the jail guard, for instance, without reference to headquarters, except in certain important matters, and would relieve them of the duties of submitting many of the detailed statistics they are now required to do. Superintendents as a class are officers of intelligence and integrity, and quite capable of conducting their duties without too large a measure of interference from without. They have, moreover, the advantage of being on the spot and can, I believe, be trusted to exercise their initiative with judgment and discretion.

2488. What are your general duties?—My general duties are to inspect all the jails in the Presidency and some of the sub-jails; to check the expenditure on jails and to sanction expenditure; and, generally, to see that the orders of Government and the Prisons Act and rules made by the Government are duly carried out. I act as the go-between between the Government and the Superintendents of Jails.

2489. You are a Commissioned Officer in the Indian Medical Service?—Yes.

2490. What is the class of officer in charge of jails?—There is a Superintendent over each jail.

2491. Are they Commissioned Officers?—Some of them, not all.

2492. What department of the provincial Government do you correspond with?—I correspond directly with the Chief Secretary.

2493. In the Public Department?—Yes, and in the Judicial Department, too.

2494. Do you find that you have full and easy access to him?—Quite.

2495. The relations between the Public Department and yourself are free and unfettered?—Yes, quite free.

2496. Is there any particular direction in which you would look for somewhat greater latitude?—Well, I think there is a good deal of correspondence that goes on between my office and Government that might be cut down, and I think there is a good deal of correspondence between myself and the Superintendent of Jails that might be done away with.

2497. First of all as to the correspondence between yourself and the Public Department?—For instance, I have to go to Government for sanction on very trivial matters—matters sometimes of very small expenditure.

2498. Can you give us any idea of the amount of expenditure involved?—If I wanted, for instance, a rubber stamp, which would cost two or three rupees, I have to go to Government to get sanction for it.

2499. Do you know the reason of the restriction in that particular case?—I believe the Stationery Manual rules prescribe that I should do so.

2500. How much does that kind of petty and trifling expenditure come to in the course of the year?—Not very much; I simply give you that as an instance.

2501. Would it be a couple of hundred rupees in the year?—No, nothing like it; the items are small.

2502. So that if you had general sanction to spend Rs. 100 a year in petty cash, that would cover a good deal of correspondence?—Not a good deal; but a certain amount. That is only an isolated instance of correspondence which might be cut down.

2503. Can you give me any other instances, not on matters of expenditure?—I will take one question that is not so much connected with expenditure. The Inspector-General of Prisons is not allowed to fix the number of convict warders that are attached to the various jails.

2504. Who fixes the number?—The Government of Madras.

2505. On the recommendation of yourself?—Yes.

2506. That would involve expenditure?—It involves a certain amount; these convict warders are paid some small amount, from 4 to 8 annas a month.

2507. That again would involve very small expenditure?—Very trifling.

2508. Is there a good deal of correspondence on that subject?—No.

2509. How much would the expenditure in a year be upon these convict warders?—Probably it would be less than a thousand rupees; I could not give you exact figures.

2510. So that we may say a provision allowing you to spend up to Rs. 500 would get rid of that correspondence?—If permission were given to me to fix the number of the convict warders without reference to Government at all, that would meet the case.

2511. But you must have some limit?—The total number of convict officers that can be employed in a jail is limited to 10 per cent. of the population; convict warders are also limited according to the qualifications of the man appointed, according to the time he has been in the jail, and so on; so that I could not go beyond 10 per cent. if I wanted to.

2512. So that without fixing an absolute limit, the 10 per cent. restriction would practically prevail?—Yes, or if you fix the sum to be given to me, I could always keep within it.

2513. Is there any other similar point?—In the Postal Department they issue what are called window-delivery tickets. The jail is supplied with a postal bag for its letters; for the window-delivery ticket Rs. 12 a year has to be paid; I cannot get a ticket for any jail without going to Government for it, although the amount is only Rs. 12.

2514. There are practically a considerable number of references necessary by you to the Public Department about which a small fixed annual sum would enable you to get rid of correspondence?—Yes.

2515. Who settles these questions in the Public Department: do they go as a matter of fact to the Secretary in the Public Department or are they settled by a clerk?—That I cannot tell you; they go to the Chief Secretary, and I hear nothing till I get my reply; I do not know whether the Chief Secretary even sees them; all I know is that the letters generally come back signed by an Assistant Secretary.

2516. If there is any considerable difficulty owing to the gradual accumulation of precedents and rules in the department, that could be obviated by the granting of leave to you to spend up to a small yearly sum?—Yes. As a matter of fact, a budget estimate is prepared, and it will be quite easy to limit us to the budget.

2517. How much correspondence in your department would that get rid of?—Not very much.

2518. Would it enable you to get rid of the services of one clerk in your department?—No, not the things which I have recommended.

2519. But the accumulation of all these things?—Well, possibly.

2520. When you refer these questions to Government, do you actually see and sign the letters conveying the remarks to Government?—Always.

2521. It is not done by one of your clerks or subordinates?—No.

2522. Now, having made suggestions of that sort, suppose you were free from these pretty restrictions, what powers could you advantageously delegate to your Jail Superintendents?—I would give them far more authority over warder establishments in jails than they possess at present.

2523. For instance, you want power to appoint convict warders to a certain number; would you delegate to each Jail Superintendent the power to select the warders?—They possess this power as it is; as long as they keep within the limits laid down, I have no objection to their doing it themselves.

2524. Do you mean that you would be prepared to delegate up to a 10 per cent. limit?—I think so, as regards convict officers of all grades.

2525. Could you do it in all cases, or would you choose the Superintendents to whom you would like to delegate the power?—What I mean is this. There are 10 per cent. of the prisoners in a jail who are convict officers; as a rule, there are a small number of this percentage who are convict warders.

2526. There are three grades; there is the warder overseer, the ordinary warder, and the convict warder?—Yes; the convict warder comprises two or three out of the 10 per cent. If you limit that, there is no objection whatever to giving the Superintendent power to appoint his own individual men, provided that they comply with the rules as regards their selection.

2527. Now it comes to you?—Now it comes to me and goes up to Government if the number is to be increased.

2528. Suppose you were free yourself, would you be prepared to let the Superintendent have the power?—Certainly, but within limits.

2529. Do you come into relations at all with the District Magistrate?—No, not at all; he is the official visitor and he comes and makes remarks, and I see copies of his remarks and sometimes action is taken upon them, if there is anything that requires action to be taken.

2530. Is there a good deal of correspondence between your office and the various District Magistrates?—No.

2531. Or between your office and any other department of the Government in consequence of the remarks of District Magistrates?—No.

2532. None at all?—Of course a District Magistrate might remark "repairs wanted," or something like that, and we should send round to the Public Works Department; or perhaps he might raise a question concerning a prisoner, and there would be enquiry made into whatever he suggested.

2533. When a District Magistrate visits a jail, how do you know whether he finds it satisfactory or not?—He says so.

2534. To whom?—In the book; he makes a written record saying, "I have visited jail so and so, and I find so and so; things are satisfactory," and it ends there.

2535. If it is unsatisfactory, your Superintendent reports to you?—He makes a report. The book remains at the jail, and a copy of the District Magistrate's remark is sent to me.

2536. Is there a Director-General of Prisons under the Government of India?—No.

2537. Do you find that you, as Inspector-General of Jails in Madras, suffer at all from the lack of some centre of information from the Government of India?—I cannot say that I do.

2538. Do you ever correspond with the Inspectors-General of Prisons in other provinces?—Occasionally.

2539. Officially and unofficially?—Sometimes officially, sometimes demi-officially. If there was a question regarding which I wanted to know the practice in another province, I should write to the Inspector-General in that province.

2540. Do you ever have a conference between the various Inspectors-General of Prisons?—I have never been to one.

2541. How do you know whether your administration of jails in this Presidency is better or worse than the administration in other provinces?—Our administration report goes on to the Government of India, and the Government of India generally issue a review of the whole administration of jails throughout the country, comparing the different provinces and the conditions in the different provinces.

2542. Is the review prepared entirely from the administration reports of various Inspectors-General?—Yes.

2543. There is no actual human contact between the Government of India and the jail administration of the provincial Government?—No; there is no direct communication between me and the Government of India in any way; all correspondence goes through the Local Government.

2544. Is that a satisfactory state of things or not?—So far, I see nothing to object to about it. There are a few points perhaps where it might be advisable to have general rules applying all over the country in preference to provincial rules.

2545. Is there great difference between the rules in one province and the rules in others?—Yes, there are differences in practice; the differences are brought about by matters that are really insurmountable, like climate, diet, and so on.

2546. Of course, you could not have absolute rigidity?—No, but there are certain points where conditions might be absolutely the same all over the country.

2547. Would that be practically brought about by annual or biennial conferences?—At present the Government of India frames rules under the authority of the Prisons Act, which are applicable to the whole of India, and at the same time they allow the Local Government under a section of the Act to make rules which are applicable to the province itself.

2548. Before those rules are made for the province, is the Local Government consulted and in turn does it consult you as to the suitability of the proposed rules?—I think so. In fact, my department probably made the rules and submitted them to the provincial Government for approval.

2549. (Sir Frederic Lely.) I take it you see no necessity for co-operation between the different departments?—Very little; we have a certain amount of correspondence with other departments, with the Public Works Department, and the Accountant-General's Department and the Judicial Department.

2550. Apart from isolated cases you do your own work and leave other departments alone?—To a certain extent I think that is so; we are seldom interfered with, and seldom interfere.

2551. Do you think it is possible that you might obtain the co-operation of other departments even in jail work?—In what direction.

2552. For instance, I suppose you have a large number of men fit to employ on outdoor work?—Yes.

2553. Do you employ men in that way?—Yes.

2554. You have strict rules relating to them?—Yes.

2555. You cannot employ them unless you can show a cash profit?—I do not think that is the rule.

2556. What is the restriction on the employment of outdoor gangs?—The only restriction is that the work must be something connected with jails.

2557. Suppose it was something connected with the public advantage, not necessarily jail work?—You mean municipal work.

2558. Not necessarily municipal work; it may be an embankment to keep out floods or something of that kind, some matter of public advantage; would you be precluded by the rules from supplying labour?—We are not precluded, I think, but I do not think anything of the kind has ever been tried in this Presidency.

2559. Suppose a Collector came to you and said, "Here is something that would be of great public advantage, although it is not strictly urgent, and nobody here can afford the funds for it"; could you arrange to turn out a lot of men to do that work?—I should not arrange it without reference; I should not consider myself competent to employ prisoners in a case like that.

2560. Looking at it from the broadest point of view of the public good—the jail is a public institution and supported by public funds—would it not be a good thing if more elasticity was allowed in the way of employing prisoners?—I do not know; it might be a great disadvantage in some ways; if we put prison labour to do certain work, it would deprive the public of a certain amount of labour.

2561. On this question of co-operation between your department and other departments, most of your jails have gardens in which you grow vegetables and fruit?—We grow vegetables. Some of them grow fruit.

2562. For the use of the jail population?—Yes.

2563. Do these gardens pay as a rule?—I do not think so. I think jail gardens in Madras are not well managed.

2564. Would it be an advantage to your department if you were to go to the Agricultural Department and ask them for advice and assistance?—Possibly it would.

2565. You have never done that?—No, but it is not everywhere that the Agricultural Department is in a position to visit the jail and give advice.

2566. But it might be done?—Quite so; it has been done in one place, I think.

2567. A further advantage would be that it might not only make the jail garden a profitable place, but it might advance the culture of fruit and vegetables and so on?—Yes.

2568. The District Magistrate is also a visitor?—An official visitor.

2569. Suppose he made a criticism of the management with which you did not agree, what would you do?—I should probably send a copy of his remarks, with my comments, up to the Government.

2570. I remember a case, years ago, in which at a time of heavy flood the District Magistrate sent word to the Jail Superintendent that he had prepared a place of safety for the prisoners, and the Superintendent refused to avail himself of it because the care of the jail was not the District Magistrate's business. Would that be possible under you?—I should not approve of such action by a Superintendent, and never heard of such a case.

2571. It is not a rule of your department that whenever you disagree with the District Magistrate you must send a copy of his remarks with your comments to Government?—No; I have, so far, never seen an instance that called for action on the part of Government.

2572. But do you not think that ought to be the rule?—I think so.

2573. (Mr. Dutt.) Is it the fact that Civil Surgeons in districts are generally the Superintendents of the district jails?—In some cases, not in all. There are only three jails in the Presidency where the District Medical Officer is also Superintendent.

2574. In other cases there are special Superintendents, specially paid?—Yes.

2575. There is a sub-jail in each sub-division of a district?—Yes, sometimes more than one.

2576. Who are the Superintendents of those sub-jails?—Generally the Sub-Divisional Officer or Magistrate.

2577. Not the Hospital Assistant or any medical officer?—No, he acts the part of a jailor or medical officer.

2578. The Sub-Divisional Officer will be either a young Civilian or a Deputy Magistrate?—As a rule he is a Deputy Magistrate.

2579. You have to submit an annual budget?—Yes.

2580. Do you not in that annual budget provide a lump sum for articles of stationery which will be required?—Yes.

2581. Then could you not, when the budget is passed, buy what you wanted out of the lump sum which is already sanctioned?—I do not think so. It does not follow, because I have budget provision which will meet the purchase of the rubber stamp, that therefore I can always purchase the stamp; I may have to get sanction to the purchase from the Government apart from the financial provision.

2582. The passing of the budget does not empower you to purchase articles included in the budget?—No. The same question comes in with regard to articles made in the country and articles imported. I have permission to sanction up to a given amount, but further than that I cannot go. For instance, I have power to sanction up to Rs. 50 for the purchase of articles of European manufacture; if the article costs Rs. 52 I have to go to Government for sanction.

2583. Are these difficulties created by rules prescribed by the Indian Government or by rules prescribed by the Madras Government?—With regard to this particular question of the purchase of articles of European manufacture, that is laid down in the Civil Account Code which is applicable to the whole of India.

2584. And with regard to other matters?—With regard to the purchase of articles of country manufacture, that is a general order of the Financial Department of January, 1895.

2585. Except so far as the rule has been prescribed by the Civil Account Code, the other difficulties could be removed by the Local Government?—I think so; as regards articles of country manufacture, I think they could be removed.

2586. Are there any non-official visitors to the districts jails?—There are.

2587. Are they generally named by the Government, or are they visitors ex officio?—They are named by Government as a rule; they are not officials at all but private people.

2588. Do you find anything valuable in the suggestions that they make?—Sometimes their suggestions are of use.

2589. Then does the Superintendent adopt them, or does he wait for your orders as to adopting them?—It depends upon whether there is any immediate action called for, or whether it is something trifling. Of course if a non-official visitor was to recommend some large work involving a large expenditure, there would be no action taken upon it until I saw it.

2590. You have mentioned the Prisons Act of 1894. Have any rules been passed by the Government of India under this Act?—The rules passed by the Government of India are based on the Act.

2591. Those rules, as far as I remember, have not been changed since?—I do not think so; they may have been altered slightly.

2592. Anyhow the changes are not frequent?—No, certainly not in the Government of India rules.

2593. Besides those, certain rules are framed by the Madras Government?—Yes.

2594. And these are changed from time to time?—Yes.

2595. They apply to food, discipline, labour, clothing, and so on?—Yes.

2596. Do they apply to the whole Presidency?—Yes.

2597. Is non-official opinion consulted in the framing of these rules?—I could not say that.

Col. R. J. Macnamara.

(Col. R. J.
Macnamara.
25 Nov., 1907.

2598. So far as the food of the prisoners and prison labour are concerned would non-official opinion be of use in framing these rules or in changing these rules?—I am quite sure it would; in framing these rules, local advice would be most useful.

2599. You do not know whether in these matters the public are consulted?—I cannot say.

2600. (Mr. Hichens.) Have you a central jail in this province?—There are eight central jails here.

2601. It is only life sentences that are sent to Port Blair?—Yes.

2602. You see no objection to that being under the Government of India?—None whatever.

2603. (Mr. Meyer.) Is it only life sentences that go to Port Blair?—At present. Formerly they used to send term prisoners—men condemned for 7 and 10 years' transportation—but of recent years the population has overgrown the premises, and they have restricted the number.

2604. Would you say that the sentence of transportation to Port Blair was any great hardship as compared with incarceration in a central jail in the Presidency?—I have never been to Port Blair; but as far as my information goes a prisoner sentenced to transportation prefers to go to Port Blair to remaining in Madras; I have known them sometimes to make the request.

2605. I was not clear whether you had the appointment of convict warders; do you say that the matter has to go to the Local Government?—Let us say that there are 300 warders for the province; suppose I wanted to make 305; I could not appoint them; I should have to go to Government, although the nominating of the particular men rests with the Jail Department.

2606. Not with the Superintendent of the central jail?—No; he appoints the convict warders, but he generally sends me a list of them.

2607. For your information or for your approval?—It depends; if he appoints them according to the rules laid down, well and good; but if he has violated the rules because he has not sufficient men available, then he sends the list on to me for approval.

2608. The rules provide certain tests of fitness and behaviour and so forth?—Yes.

2609. As long as the rules are complied with the Superintendent can make anybody he pleases a convict warder?—Quite so, up to the limit allowed him.

2610. If the limit has to be departed from, whether as to number or as to qualification, then it has to come up to you as to qualification, and in certain cases, as to number, it has to go up to the Local Government?—Yes.

2611. You have said that there are only three District Medical Officers in charge of district jails; is that really so?—That is so.

2612. I should like to be certain of that, because when I was a Collector here the Medical Officer took charge of the district jail as a matter of course; has that ceased to be the case?—At the present time there are only three jails; one is at Mangalore, the other is at Madura, the other is at Berhampur.

2613. How many district jails are there?—Eight.

2614. You are not speaking of central jails?—No; there are eight central and eight district jails; it is the policy of the Government to reduce the jails and to increase the number of sub-jails.

2615. The district jail is now generally in charge of what you may call a professional jailor and not of the District Medical Officer?—Yes.

2616. The sub-jails are under the control of the District Magistrate?—Yes, they are under him.

2617. You said that you had no personal relations with the District Magistrate; is that so? Are you not concerned with statistics?—Of course, but there is no correspondence; there are merely a certain number of forms filled in.

2618. Suppose statistics showed that the cost of the inmates in a certain jail was higher than it should be, would you call for an explanation?—We should call for an explanation. Considering the number of sub-jails there are, the small amount of correspondence that goes on is surprising.

2619. You tour a good deal?—Yes.

2620. When you go on tour into a district would you go and see the District Magistrate?—I do not always see him.

2621. You would not make a point of seeing him and asking him about the sub-jails in his district?—I cannot say that I have done so. To begin with, I have not been in Madras very long.

2622. Suppose the District Magistrate happened to be in the headquarters station when you were there, you would try to see him?—Possibly I would; I have seen a good number of them, I think.

2623. You would as a matter of course try and see him I suppose?—I do not say that I should make a special point of going to see the District Magistrate to enquire about sub-jails.

2624. You have informed us that there is a general Prisons Act for India. Was not that Act passed as the result of a conference of jail officers from various provinces?—Yes.

2625. And the rules framed under that Act were considered by the conference?—They made suggestions I think upon which the Government of India framed the Act.

2626. At any rate the Act is the result of that conference?—Yes.

2627. Was there not a conference of Jail Superintendents this year at Simla?—Yes.

2628. Did you attend?—No.

2629. May I ask why?—I was not told why, but I fancy it was owing to the distance from my headquarters to Simla, because there were other Inspectors-General of Prisons who were not asked either.

2630. What was the conference about?—It was about the mark system.

2631. The system by which prisoners earned a remission of their sentence by marks?—Yes.

2632. With regard to jail labour, in some ways it is rather a difficult matter. Is there not every now and then an outcry about jail manufactures competing unfairly with private industries?—Yes.

2633. And if you were to put men to different work of public utility, as was suggested to you, would there not be a possible outcry about your competing with the coolie?—I think there would. I understood that in the cases suggested to me the prison labour was to be employed only in case of emergency; anyhow, I do not think it ought to be employed so as to compete with the public supply.

2634. As regards the purchase of country stores and so forth are you aware that there is a Committee sitting upon that subject?—I think the Committee met some time ago.

2635. Did you give evidence before it?—No.

2636. (Sir Steyning Edgerley.) I was not quite clear as to what you said with regard to sanctioning Public Works expenditure?—A certain amount is put on the jail budget for petty constructional works and repairs to jails. The maximum amount allowed for a work debitable to that account is Rs. 2,500; that is the limit. I have authority to sanction up to Rs. 1,000; if the work exceeds Rs. 1,000, but costs Rs. 2,500 or less, it has to go up to Government for sanction, though the sum is debited to the Jail budget. That causes a great deal of correspondence, because the amount of petty works in connection with jails between Rs. 1,000 and Rs. 2,500 is large; whereas with regard to smaller sums I can sanction the expenditure myself, and it does not go to Government.

2637. Is there anything else of that nature that you would like to mention?—I think the Head of a Department should be allowed to sanction the maximum pay of a lower intermediate appointment when a subordinate is reduced from a higher to a lower grade as a penalty.

2638. You mean that if you reduce a man from a higher to a lower grade he would begin with the minimum pay?—If he is reduced he must, as a matter of course, go to the lowest pay of the lower grade. Now it is not always desirable to punish the man to that extent. It comes rather hard if the case has to go to Government for sanction; it would save some correspondence with the Government if the Head of a Department was allowed to condone such a punishment.

2639. Do you know the article dealing with this matter?—It is article 157-B of the Civil Service Regulations.

2640. Is there anything else you wish to mention?—Only about appeals against the punishment of dismissal. In the case of lower subordinates, that is subordinates appointed, say, by the Superintendent of a jail, I think an appeal should lie to the Inspector-General and should not be allowed to go further.

2641. You would only give one appeal?—Only one appeal, but in the case of officers appointed by the Inspector-General I would allow them to go to Government.

2642. Again one appeal?—Yes.

2643. What are your powers of appointment—up to how much?—I can appoint all the men up to the appointment of Superintendent; the gazetted appointments rest with Government.

2644. Do you appoint anybody over Rs. 250 a month?—No; here the highest payable is Rs. 225 a month.

2645. Is there anything further you want to mention?—There was a question asked as to whether it was advisable that the authority dismissing an officer should give him a certificate that there was a reasonable ground of appeal. With regard to that, I think it is not advisable. I would not make the appeal dependent on the man whose decision is appealed against; I would give the right of appeal without any such certificate.

2646. You would give the man one appeal without any certificate?—Yes.

2647. I suppose the first object of your department is penal discipline?—It is one of the objects.

2648. And the carrying out of the sentences of the Court according to the recognised standard?—Yes.

2649. One form of jail punishment for insubordination and so on is penal diet?—Yes.

2650. I understood you to say, in answer to Mr. Dutt, that you thought you could get great assistance as regards the settlement of labour questions and the settlement of food questions from non-official consultation?—Yes. The non-official visitor, especially if a native of the country, would be in a position to give good advice with regard to food.

2651. Is there not an officer in medical charge of the jail?—Yes.

2652. Does he not know sufficient of the country to know what is a fair diet?—Of course he knows a good deal about it, but there is no reason why we should not take suggestions from a native non-official visitor.

2653. Does not the Medical Officer examine the prisoners once a week or every day?—He examines all the newly admitted prisoners, and he then all once a week on parade.

2654. So that if the general diet is unsuitable, the Medical Officer has discretion to order a man special diet?—They generally manage it by testing a man's weight; the men are weighed once a fortnight, and if any disposition is shown to fall off in weight the Medical Officer will know that the man is not very well or is perhaps getting too much work to do, and he alters his diet accordingly.

2655. (Chairman.) I understood you to say that you take an estimate en bloc for probable expenditure on works?—Yes.

2656. Any sum that you propose to expend on individual works exceeding Rs. 1,000 has to be referred to Government for sanction?—Yes, up to Rs. 2,500; that is the limit in the case of a minor work.

2657. What happens in the case of a work over Rs. 2,500?—The amount is debited to the Public Works budget.

2658. Taken out of the Jail Budget altogether?—Yes; we have nothing to do with it; it is only minor works costing Rs. 2,500 or less that are debited to the jails.

2659. Would it be an advantage to you to estimate beforehand for particular works instead of budgeting generally?—I do not think so.

2660. Would that not reduce correspondence?—No.

(The witness withdrew.)

Mr. F. A. LODGE was called and examined.

2661. (Chairman.) You are Conservator of Forests?—Yes.

2662. By whom were you appointed as Conservator of Forests?—By the provincial Government.

2663. Will you describe to us of what your charge consists?—A Conservator of Forests is in charge of a forest circle, and of these there are three in the Madras Presidency. My circle consists of eight forest districts (six revenue districts) for each of which there is a district forest officer (either of the Imperial or Provincial Service); there are also four Provincial Service officers available for special duty in any of the districts.

2664. Then what is your staff?—The staff below the district forest officers is as follows:—

	Southern Circle.	Presidency.
Rangers	42	143
Deputy Rangers	20	60
Foresters	48	139
Guards	About 300	980

Besides district and range office establishments and a large number of temporary hands, elephant establishment, depôt keepers, gardeners, watchers, etc.

2665. What are the duties of a Conservator?—(1) To advise Collectors on forest matters; (2) to control the utilization of budget allotments and the collection of revenue; (3) to control the preparation and execution of working plans; (4) to appoint, promote, punish and dismiss subordinates on Rs. 15 and upwards excluding office establishments; (5) to check the timber accounts of the districts in his circle; (6) to inspect the forests and offices of the districts; (7) to divide the districts into sub-divisions, ranges and beats; (8) to review the district budget estimates and annual reports; (9) to see that all forest produce collected is properly utilised, and to write off all inevitable wastage not exceeding Rs. 500 in value; (10) to supervise the work of the forest training school; (11) to control work in the forest museum. Items (10) and (11) are peculiar to the Southern Circle. Under the revised Forest Code (not yet sanctioned) modifications in the above list will be introduced, and the responsibility of Conservators as regards the internal working of the forests will be increased.

2666. Will the increased responsibility thrown upon you enable you to dispose of your work more effectually and more quickly?—It will give me more authority; instead of being solely an advising officer I shall be in a position to issue orders. At present I can only advise the Collector; under the new Code I should be able to give orders to the local forest officer—the Collector's forest assistant.

Mr.
F. A. Lodge.
25 Nov., 1907.

2667. What service have you got?—I shall finish 24 years this month.

2668. What is the size of your district?—It is a circle comprising eight districts; it contains rather over 5,000 square miles of forest spread over about 60,000 square mile of country.

2669. What sort of population have you got under your charge?—I should think about 10 millions.

2670. Will the new Code give you all the responsibility and freedom that an officer of your standing, and whose authority extends over so large a district, ought to have?—In technical matters, yes; that is to say, in the internal portion of the forest, which is the great part of our work of course.

2671. Are you under the control of the Collector?—No.

2672. Are you subordinate to him in any respect?—In no respect.

2673. You are co-equal authorities?—We are co-ordinate authorities.

2674. And co-equal?—Well, we run on such different lines; my line is only a portion of the business; he has the whole of the revenue charge of one district; I have the forest charge of six revenue districts.

2675. Do you not overlap?—Not at present, because I only advise the Collector; he has his forest assistant under his orders.

2676. You collect the revenue?—I practically touch no revenue.

2677. You control the collection of revenue?—I control the collection of revenue by the district forest officer.

2678. Do you not hand the revenue over to the Collector?—My control is to see that the budget is worked up to, that prices are fairly fixed, and that at all sales that take place the revenue is collected and not left outstanding.

2679. Take the question of leave to prospect for minerals; do you and the Collector not overlap in that particular?—In that particular we do.

2680. Suppose a man wishes to get leave to prospect, who grants permission?—The Collector.

2681. The man applies to the Collector?—Yes.

2682. And the Collector refers to you?—Sometimes.

2683. Generally?—No. I do not think I can say generally.

2684. If the area that is proposed to be prospected over is within what you call forest, does not the man always apply to you?—Not always.

2685. When the proposal does reach you through the Collector, would you in turn apply to your own forest officer?—It would depend whether I had local knowledge of the forest concerned.

2686. But could not the Collector instead of applying to you apply to the forest officer?—He might.

2687. That is to say to one of your own department?—Yes.

2688. Would he not always apply?—In the case of a right to prospect in a reserved forest, he would certainly ask the district forest officer for his opinion.

2689. Is not a forest a very curiously constituted area very often?—In what way?

2690. It is not always forest.—It is not always wood; it is not necessarily trees; it may be grass.

2691. This application for leave to prospect goes from the forest officer back to the Collector if he objects?—In either case, whether he objects or not, it would go back to the Collector.

2692. Then where does it go to?—If the forest officer objects, it would probably come on to me.

2693. Then what happens?—If I supported the forest officer's objection, it would have to go up to the Board of Revenue.

2694. If you agree with the Collector and disagree with the forest officer?—Then the Collector can issue the prospecting license.

2695. Do you know how long it generally takes to get a prospecting license through in Madras?—I know of one case in which it took three months.

2696. Do you know any case in which it was done in a month?—I cannot think of one.

2697. Do you know any case or many cases where it has taken over three months?—No, I think that three or four months would be about the maximum so far as I am aware.

2698. You would be very much surprised to learn that in some cases it may have taken as much as a year or eighteen months?—I should be very much surprised.

2699. Do you think then, speaking generally with regard to prospecting licenses, that any diminution of reference could be devised by which time might be saved both to the administration and to the persons who wish to invest capital?—I cannot see any. The local forest officer must be able to say whether the forest can be given up for the purpose, and if he differs it must come up to some higher authority.

2700. Is there a geological authority in the Government of Madras?—Yes.

2701. Would the Geological Department have anything to do with leases at all?—They have nothing to do with leases in reserves.

2702. They would not be consulted as to whether the place was suitable or not for the granting of prospecting leases?—No, not in reserve forests.

2703. Then in respect of your other work, is there any suggestion you can make by which time or work might be saved?—There is the question of appeals. At present an appeal lies from every petty punishment; I think in the case of small punishments—black marks or petty fines—it should be distinctly laid down that no appeal could be allowed, and in the case of larger punishments that the number of appeals should be limited. At present a forest guard on Rs. 8 may be dismissed by his district forest officer, and he can carry his appeal up to the Board of Revenue; there is nothing to stop him doing so.

2704. Of course, that is a paper appeal the whole way?—Yes.

2705. Suppose it was made a personal appeal to you, would that satisfy the justice of the case?—I do not think it could be done; I have about 300 guards in my circle, and they are a very unsatisfactory class; dismissals are very frequent, and I should have the whole of my time taken up with appeals if they all came to me. As it is, the appeal of a forest guard from dismissal lies to the Collector, so that these appeals are distributed between six Collectors.

2706. There is the appeal to the Collector, and then an appeal from the Collector to the Board of Revenue?—Yes.

2707. So that the appeal is not from the subordinate to a superior officer in the department, but to a superior officer in another department?—The district forest officer is the Collector's forest assistant.

2708. So that in this matter your department does overlap the Collector's department?—In certain appeals.

2709. In all appeals?—Not all appeals; the appeals of range officers lie to me.

2710. Suppose appeals to the Collector were stopped, would that diminish the Collector's work a good deal?—No, I do not think it would; you mean if they were allowed to appeal to the Collector and no further; it would diminish his work in this way; where the appeal goes on at present he has to review the case and go through the papers and send the whole thing up; that time would certainly be saved.

2711. Would it also save your department time and labour in correspondence?—It would save time in appeals that came through me.

2712. I suppose when a Collector decides and the appeal is carried up from him, those appeals come up to you and then to the Board?—They all come through me to the Board.

2713. They come back to you?—Whichever way they go, all correspondence between the Board and the Collector comes through me.

2714. Is that not rather a complicated method?—It is necessary so long as the Collector and the Conservator are co-ordinate officers.

2715. Is there any other direction in which you could suggest any measure of decentralization?—There are some minor matters; for instance, the audit of accounts gives rise to a very large number of objections and a great deal of correspondence. The Accountant-General's standard list of objections contains 203 entries, any one of which may be quoted against any particular item any month. A lot of them are very minor points and could be eliminated if a district forest-officer was allowed a monthly sum as petty cash which could be spent on his certificate, without all the detail vouchers that are now required by the Accounts Department.

2716. What sum would you decide as a limit to this petty cash?—It should depend on the seniority of the officer; it would depend on the Conservator to fix the sum; the Conservator is the best judge of his men.

2717. Instead of fixing a limit, would you suggest that the Conservator might be given a fixed sum of money which he could assign as he thought proper to the forest officers for the purpose of petty cash disbursements?—I think that would mean more complication in the accounts. The Conservator does not distribute grants; there is given to each district forest-officer a letter of credit on the treasury in his district and he draws cheques against it, but a voucher is required if he buys a two-pie box of matches.

2718. If a certain sum was given to the Conservator for petty cash, for which his personal voucher would be sufficient, would that not meet all your objections?—I do not think that would do as well because that would mean that the money was distributed through various districts, whereas each district account is required to be separate.

2719. Would not the proposal which I make to you be a good substitution for the present method?—I would sooner see it the other way—that each district forest-officer should have power to spend from his own Government money—not from the Conservator's allotment—a certain monthly sum. That would diminish a lot of petty objections from the Accounts Office.

2720. And would give time to the district forest-officer for more practical attention to the proper business of conservancy?—Yes.

2721. Are there any powers which you think could be usefully delegated by you to your district officers?—A great many, and if the revised Code is carried out that will be done. The revised Code provides for the delegation of a great many powers; in fact, it does all that is necessary, I think, in that line.

2722. How is it that you have got a revised Code which is not sanctioned yet?—It is pending with the Government of Madras for orders.

2723. Practically if this is sanctioned it will give you greater freedom and give your subordinates all the freedom you think necessary?—Yes, as to minor references—writing off stock, giving contracts and sanctioning minor expenditure, etc., a lot of these would be entrusted to the district officers.

2724. Have the Government of Madras been very willing to meet the suggestions of Conservators?—The Code is now with the Government.

2725. How long has it been with the Government of Madras?—I think since April of this year.

2726. In what department?—The Revenue Department. I am not quite sure when it went up to Government; it may be later than that. We finished with it in April; a certain amount of printing had to be done before it went in, so it may have been later.

2727. Where did these suggestions come from—from the officers or from the Government?—They came from a Committee that we had. It was a question of working out the relations between the Collector, the Conservator and the district forest officer, and various suggestions were made.

2728. Are your forest officers pretty good linguists as a rule?—I am sorry to say they are not.

2729. How can an officer who has not a mastery of the vernacular get into communication with people?—He is dependent on his local subordinates knowing English in most cases.

2730. Instead of knowing the vernacular, he expects these people to know English, or else he depends on an interpreter?—Yes.

2731. Is that a satisfactory state of things?—Certainly not; now it has been modified; this has only been the case for the last ten or twelve years. The examination standard in the vernacular was lowered some years ago; it has just been raised again. The older men had a perfect command of one language and could talk to the natives anywhere; the men who came out more recently with this lower standard test have not been able to get very much command of the language.

2732. And that has led, I suppose, to very unfortunate results?—I think it has kept us out of touch with the villagers.

2733. Is there much movement of forest officers from one circle to another?—Not much.

2734. You do not find that the leave regulations—the desire of officers to go on leave or the granting of leave—have necessitated the movement of officers very much?—When a man goes on short leave he comes back again to the same district; if he goes on long leave his post is very often filled up and he gets another district.

2735. In forest districts may one assume that—in adjacent tracts at all events—the same language more or less prevails?—In adjacent tracts one language prevails more or less. It works gradually down from Telugu in the north to Tamil in the south and Canarese on the west coast.

2736. Who assigns the various districts?—The Government.

2737. What do you mean when you say the Government?—Well, it is rather outside my ken; the matter is taken up in Council; whether it is the Governor in Council or what department it is I am not certain; it appears in the Gazette as a Government order.

2738. Do you find, as a matter of working practice, that regard is had to the fact of an officer knowing a particular language being sent to a district where that language is spoken?—As a rule, yes; not always. It may happen that a man is particularly good at a particular sort of work, and that he is transferred from one district to another in order to carry out a particular kind of work, irrespective of the fact that the language of the district he is going to is different from the language he has studied.

2739. Do you have to report confidentially on your subordinates?—On certain subordinates.

2740. Do you know whether in assigning men to various posts consideration is had to the question whether or not they are well acquainted with the people in the district which they have to manage?—I do not think their acquaintance with the people is considered; their acquaintance with the language is considered.

2741. Does not one rather go with the other?—Not necessarily; you may have a language spoken over many districts; the people vary from district to district.

2742. Is it not almost an essential requirement of a forest officer that he should have an intimate acquaintance with the people scattered about his district; is not that necessary to good forest administration?—For administration he ought to have it, yes.

2743. And yet as far as you know that is not considered when the assignment of posts is made?—So far as I know that is not considered.

2744. But you would agree with me that it is an essential?—Not from a forest executive point of view; but from an administrative point of view I admit it.

2745. Is it not very difficult to divide the two?—So much more of our work now lies really in the forests.

2746. A good deal of the conservation of forests depends on the good will of the people who dwell therein?—The dwellers in the forest are few; it is the dwellers outside who demand the forest produce; they are the people we have to get to know.

2747. (Sir Steyning Edgerley.) You said that if you get this new Code you will have sufficient authority in technical matters and that it will practically settle your Forest Department co-ordination to your satisfaction?—Yes.

2748. But you seemed to me to make a reservation; you said, sufficient authority "upon technical matters"; is there any field where you consider that the control of the Collector should not come in?—There are certain matters in which at present the requirements of the forest are entirely subordinated to the requirements of the villages.

2749. And you do not think you would like to have more authority in that sphere?—I think there are cases in which the subordination is carried too far, and carried so far that it results in a gradual deterioration of the forests.

2750. Do you suggest that that subordination is carried further than the requirements of the people necessitate?—Further than the actual needs of the people require; yes, I think so occasionally.

2751. You think it is overdone?—It depends; it is so very difficult to make a statement as to its being overdone in a particular case. It is overdone in this way; that if it goes on being done to the same extent to which it has been done, the area of forests will diminish and there will be then less area for the people's privileges.

2752. But with regard to what I may call the outside factors of the case you would admit that the Collector is possibly a better judge than the forest officer?—I think politically he is.

2753. So that although you can point to the deterioration of the forests, it may be a painful necessity?—A painful advisability.

2754. Take for instance impounding villagers' cattle?—One of the things we have most to complain of is the very heavy grazing in the forests that we have to provide for.

2755. But after all, so far as that goes, you consider that the Collector and the district authorities have a very complete control?—Quite a complete control.

2756. And so far as regards what we may call reserved forests, in actual forest work this new Code will give you all the powers you require?—Yes.

2757. (Mr. Meyer.) The Head of the Forest Department in Madras is a Member of the Board of Revenue?—Yes.

2758. Each Collector is the local Head of the Department in his own district?—Yes.

2759. The district forest officer is his assistant?—He is forest assistant to the Collector.

2760. You are the advising and inspecting officer?—Yes.

2761. Do you control the district forest officer direct in any matters?—In the examination of sanctioned working plans and in certain account matters.

2762. That is to say in what you might call technical forestry?—Yes, only then when it has been approved by the Collector and sanctioned by the Board.

2763. When you talk of working plans you mean the regulation of coupes and so forth?—The regulation of the working of the forest in all matters.

2764. The Collector does not know anything about that scientifically?—The regulation provides what portions are to be open to grazing, and what portions are to be closed to grazing, what the annual outturn of fuel, etc., is to be, all these are technical matters altogether.

2765. The Collector sends the district forest officer's diaries up to you and you deal with them?—Yes.

2766. Then as to establishments, you have the district forest officer, who in general administration is under the Collector, and in technical matters under you to a certain extent?—Yes.

2767. Then who come next?—There are a few sub-divisional officers, either junior imperial officers or provincial men.

2768. So far as they are provincial men they are rangers?—No; the provincial men are the extra assistant conservators; then come the rangers. Each district is divided into ranges. Below the rangers come assistants in the way of deputy rangers.

2769. The rangers and deputy rangers get their training at Dehra-Dun?—The rangers do; the deputy rangers who have been there are those who went up to pass for rangers and failed.

2770. Can a man become a ranger without having received a technical training at Dehra-Dun?—Only after long approved service.

2771. Who appoints the rangers?—The Conservators.

2772. So that you have a certain power of appointment?—Yes.

2773. The Collector does not appoint rangers?—The Collector makes no appointments in forest administration.

2774. You spoke of appeals. You said that when a district forest officer dismisses a guard the guard has an appeal to the Collector. Is that so?—That is so. The question was discussed by the Code Committee and for the reason I have already given—that there were such a number of them to come to one officer—it was decided that the appeal should continue to lie to the Collector instead of being transferred to the Conservator.

2775. Is that advisable?—I think if the Conservator had the authority it would be better, because a forest guard is often dismissed for neglect of technical work.

2776. Anyhow, if it must go to the Collector you would let the appeal to the Collector be final?—Yes.

2777. You would let these people have one appeal only?—Yes.

2778. The character of the Madras forests is special; your forests are scattered all over the plains, are they not, although of course you have your hill forests?—We have forests scattered over the plains, and we have big blocks of forest.

2779. A great deal of the plain forest is really scrub jungle?—Yes.

2780. Part of it is grazing land?—Yes.

2781. That is really managed by the Revenue Department?—Not in the reserves.

2782. The Chairman asked you some questions about prospecting licenses. Do not prospecting licenses come under the general mining rules?—Yes, but the prospecting license and the mining license are two very different things.

2783. There is a set of rules which govern both?—Yes.

2784. You deal with them because the land which the applicant desires to prospect and to mine happens to be in the reserve forests?—The forest heads include the minerals; the mica mines in Nellore, outside the reserves, are under the Forest Department.

2785. These mining rules were sanctioned by the Government of India and by the Secretary of State more or less?—I do not know.

2786. You spoke of a revision of the Madras Forest Code that was in the course of being effected. The Madras Forest Code is modelled, I think, on the Government of India Forest Code more or less?—More or less.

2787. With necessary differentiations?—Yes; I say more or less.

2788. The Government of India have recently been revising their Forest Code and giving ampler powers to Conservators and forest officers?—Yes.

2789. Are the amendments proposed in the Madras Code analogous to those or are they independent of them?—They are analogous to those, but the Government of India had not the question of the relative position of the Collector, the Conservator, and the district forest officer to decide; we had to decide that in addition.

2790. But the amendments are analogous so far as they go?—Very much so. We began the revision before the last issue of the Government of India Code was published.

2791. You began the revision first, independently?—Yes. That Code was received while the Committee was sitting, and we utilised it; it helped us considerably.

2792. Are not the powers of the Inspector-General of Forests in Madras and Bombay much less than they are in northern India?—Very much less; he has, I believe, only power to advise when asked to do so.

2793. Can he come into the province without being asked by the Local Government?—I understand he cannot.

2794. Has he been much to your province?—No; but he is expected next week.

2795. Can you say when the last visit of an Inspector-General took place?—I cannot remember; I think it was while I was home on furlough in 1899.

2796. Therefore he is a rare visitant to Madras?—Very rare.

2797. Do you think that his visits when they happen produce good?—I think they might.

2798. They do not, but they might?—Well, in this way; he may give advice, but the advice may not be followed by the Local Government.

2799. He might give good advice?—Yes.

2800. He has a larger experience than any forest officer in this province?—Yes.

2801. And as the result of his experience in other parts of India he might give good advice?—Yes.

2802. But you think it would be rejected by the Local Government?—It might be.

2803. But if the Local Government followed it the results would be good?—Probably.

2804. Personally would you like to see the Inspector-General here oftener?—Yes.

2805. You think that good would accrue to yourself professionally?—I think with his wide experience of forests all over India and Burma his advice would be very useful to us.

2806. Chiefly in technical matters, not upon matters of administration?—Solely in technical matters.

2807. In your Madras Forest Act there is a section which requires a reference to the Governor-General in Council before any disafforestation can take place. Do you think that is necessary?—I do not think that the Local Government should have absolute power to disafforest large blocks of reserves which are required for the good of the State but there are numerous cases in which it is necessary to disafforest a few acres, e.g., for a railway station in a reserve, or to improve a boundary line, etc., and in such cases I think the Local Government should have power.

2808. Is there any other section of the Forest Act which you consider is unduly obstructive?—No.

2809. Would you give the Board of Revenue larger power to notify reserved forests?—Yes. As you are aware, under the Forest Act two notifications have to be issued; one is under section 4 stating that the Government is going to make the reserve, and calling upon anybody who has a claim to make to put his claim before a specially named officer; then an enquiry takes place and in due course, when all claims and appeals have been heard and decided, another notification, which is called the final notification, is issued also by Government, saying that until such and such a date the forest shall be a reserved forest. I do not see why anything should go to the Government after it has once approved of the original notification; I would leave the details to the Board.

2810. (Mr. Dutt.) You have spoken of the Forest Act; what is the date of that Act?—It is the Madras Forest Act V. of 1882.

2811. That is the last Act that has been passed; no newer Act has been passed since?—No. Rules have been passed under the Act but no new Act has been passed.

2812. Are there reserved and unreserved forests in all the districts?—I should say there are reserved forests and unreserved lands; not necessarily forests.

2813. In most revenue districts in this province?—In every revenue district in the province.

2814. You call them unreserved tracts; you do not call them forests?—They are occasionally referred to as unreserved forests, and occasionally as unreserved lands; they do not come under the Act as unreserved land.

2815. Has the Collector equal powers with regard to both, or has he larger powers as regards unreserved tracts?—He has larger powers with regard to unreserved tracts.

2816. As laid down in the Code or in the rules?—The restrictions as to unreserved forests are laid down in the rules.

2817. So that you may say that so far as unreserved tracts are concerned the management is almost entirely in the hands of the Collector?—The management of the lands is entirely in the hands of the Collector; the management of the produce, until the lands are required for other purposes, is a good deal under the control of the district forest officer, who is the subordinate of the Collector.

2818. So that his action is controlled and directed by the Collector?—Yes.

2819. Do not these unreserved tracts include much grazing and pasture lands adjoining villages?—They include practically all unoccupied land, all waste lands outside the reserved forests.

2820. So that villages have no waste lands which are not included in the unreserved tracts?—They have free rights in the unreserved tracts—rights to graze, rights to cut timber and fuel for domestic purposes. There are certain tracts which are reserved; one or two of the more valuable tracts are reserved, so as to stop their actual denudation.

2821. Have they to pay any sort of tax for these rights of grazing cattle and so on?—On unreserved lands, none whatever.

2822. Do you not limit the amount of fuel which one individual person can take away?—Not if he takes it for personal use.

2823. Suppose a man took cartloads of fuel away, not for his own personal use but for sale in the bazaar, you would not allow that?—Not if we caught him. Most of our officers are in the reserved forests; the protection of the unreserved forests is very weak.

2824. You would stop it if you caught a man at it?—The revenue establishment assists us to deal with big cases like that.

2825. Then with regard to these pasture and grazing lands; do you know if the villagers—the village unions—have any share in the management of these lands?—I think, as a rule, they all mismanage; there is no control at all.

Mr.
F. A. Lodge.

Mr.

2826. Have they any power of management?—The thing is free to every man.

2827. But somebody looks after them?—Nobody looks after them.

2828. Would you recommend that the village unions should have some power to look after them and be made responsible for looking after them?—Not the whole of the unreserved lands, because some portions must be left for the extension of cultivation and various other matters; but I should recommend that, when available, a portion should be set aside as a fuel and grazing reserve, and that village communities, when they become trustworthy enough, should have control over them.

2829. Have you much experience of village unions?—This experiment of starting village forests was made when I was quite a junior officer many years ago, and had to be given up because the rich men of the village absorbed all the fuel and all the grazing, and the poorer people were left out in the cold.

2830. That was many years ago; has there been anything of the kind since?—It has been given up.

2831. You have not had any experience since then?—Experience in what matter?

2832. To justify your talking as you did just now about the untrustworthiness of village unions "when they become trustworthy."—I have experience, more or less, every year of the forest offences in villages.

2833. You would restrict the right of appeal to one appeal only?—I should like to modify that a little. As a rule I should say there should be an appeal to one officer above the appointing officer; that is, generally one appeal, but there are certain cases in which there might be more.

2834. In some cases a man can appeal to the Board of Revenue?—There is practically no limit to the appeal.

2835. An eight or ten rupee man can appeal to the Board of Revenue?—Yes.

2836. Your objection to that is that it adds to work?—It adds to work, and it serves no useful object.

2837. Would the Government get the same class of men if you restricted the right of appeal of dismissed servants?—In the lower grades I think we should get a better class.

2838. You think that giving them this right of appeal results in your getting a worse class of men than you otherwise would?—Yes; they come in to loot, knowing that they can come back again on appeal.

2839. Are you referring only to the forest guards or generally to the Government Service?—I should be sorry to make such a statement about the Government service generally; I was speaking of the lower grades.

2840. Then you would restrict the right of appeal only in their cases?—No, I would restrict it in all cases.

2841. (Sir Frederic Lely.) As a matter of fact, in recent years, there has not been much friction between the Revenue and the Forest Departments?—Very little.

2842. Any at all?—Practically only on quite minor and personal matters.

2843. In some parts of India we point to the relations between the Forest and Revenue Departments as a model of harmonious co-operation between departments; I take it that that is pretty much so in Madras?—It is, I think.

2844. Is the Forest Department popular in Madras among the people?—No.

2845. Why, do you think?—They have been accustomed for years and years to cut and graze and do as they like; they regard the forest as noman's land, and they do not understand land being reserved for forests. If a thousand acres is given up for coffee planting there is not a murmur, and the people do not attempt to steal the coffee trees or anything of that kind; if the same thousand acres is reserved for forest, and the people are kept out of it, they begin to howl at the injustice of it.

2846. As a matter of fact is it not true to say that the actual supply of grazing is on the whole increased by the forest conservancy because of the better management?—It should be for a time.

2847. The people get a great deal more out of forest conservancy than they understand?—Undoubtedly.

2848. So that much of the unpopularity is simply due to the fact that they do not appreciate the facts of the situation?—Exactly.

2849. Why cannot they be made to take a clearer view of the facts; is it not chiefly because forest officers are not sufficiently acquainted with the language to talk to them freely and explain matters to them?—It may be partly that.

2850. I do not wish you to be too hard on your own men, but is there not a great deal of truth in that?—It is partly that, no doubt; but it is partly also that all our men are so hard worked that they have not the time to talk to the villagers.

2851. But a forest officer is not tied too much to his desk surely?—He is terribly tied to it. In the Anantapur district, my first district in India, in 1885, the office consisted of two clerks who had each about two to five hours work a day; the same office now consists of six clerks, the area of the district being the same.

2852. An essential of good forestry is out-door work?—Yes.

2853. And an essential of efficient and popular forest administration is that the forest officer should be able to make himself understood by the people?—Yes; to enable the people to be gained over to our side it is necessary that the officer should be able to do that, for administrative purposes; for executive purposes it is not necessary.

2854. I understand that you would favour the setting apart of a village forest as an experiment for management by the people in return for the enjoyment of fuel and grazing there?—I should be very glad to see it applied as an experiment, but not wholly under the control of the village communities; there must be forest management.

2855. It must be under the direction of the department?—Yes; subject to that it should be managed for the village community by the Forest Department.

2856. Is not the examination in languages for forest officers the same as for civilians?—It is now: it has just been revised.

2857. As at present conducted, is enough stress laid upon colloquial knowledge of the language?—I have not conducted an examination in the vernacular for many years; I do not know how they are managed now.

2858. (Chairman.) You gave us to understand a moment ago that you were very much tied to your desk. Will the suggestions that you have made to us and which have been made by the revised Code liberate you to a great extent?—Not as much as I would like. There is one thing that will liberate us to a great extent, and that is a proposal which is also before Government to introduce a scheme of having trained accountants to relieve district officers of the preparation of accounts. As to what those accounts mean, I may say that in one district alone the account of timber brought in and moved during the month runs to 36 sheets of foolscap paper.

2859. Have you or has any forest officer got to certify to each of the 36 sheets of foolscap paper as being correct?—No, I do not certify to that; it comes from the district forest officer; the district forest officer signs that as correct; it is compiled from the different range returns in the district; it comes to my office and it has to be checked with the cash account.

2860. You are responsible that the account is correct?—Yes.

2861. And you sign somewhere or other?—I pass the accounts.

2862. Of course you never attempt to check them?—I cannot personally do it.

2863. Although you sign for their correctness?—I do not sign for their correctness; I raise certain objections and subject to those they are passed. The accountant-clerks do that and they are not sufficiently educated or well paid to do the work properly.

2864. It is this that accounts for so much of your time?—More particularly in the case of the district officers.

2865. What is it that occupies so much of your time at your desk?—I have had all sorts of special reports to do lately.

2866. Called for by whom?—Chiefly the Board of Revenue.

Mr.
F. A. Lodge.
25 Nov., 1907.

2867. On what sort of subjects?—We had to write a long report on the proposed re-organisation of the department; the necessary strengthening of it in all its branches and so on, to justify certain proposals that were going to be made.

2868. Do you get many of these special reports in the course of your ordinary duties?—No, not many; I am not nearly so much tied to my desk as the district officers, and they are chiefly tied because of the accounts.

(The witness withdrew.)

Mr. C. G. W. CLOGSTOUN was called and examined.

2869. (Chairman.) You are District Superintendent of Police in the South Arcot district?—I am.

2870. What is the organisation of police in Madras roughly speaking?—There is an Inspector-General of Police and five Deputy Inspectors-General.

2871. I mean in your own district?—I am in charge as the District Superintendent of Police, and I have under me an Assistant Superintendent in charge of a sub-range, but I have now a native deputy superintendent who has taken his place.

2872. Under you and the deputy superintendent, what are there?—I have 15 inspectors, about 100 head constables, and 700 constables.

2873. Do you take any administrative charge of a portion of your district or is that entrusted to your subordinates?—The district is for administrative purposes divided up into divisions; each division is under a police inspector; he has under him again 5 or 6 or 7 or 8 stations; a head constable is in charge of each station with so many constables under him again. These head constables look after a certain number of villages and deal with the crime which is committed therein.

2874. I understand that in Madras the inspector is in executive charge of a sub-division?—We call them divisions.

2875. Is a great deal of your time unnecessarily devoted to work in your office as distinct from your district?—I do not find that I have too much office work to do. I can very easily do my office work. What I do find is that in the districts the area of supervision is too large. My district, for instance, is 5,000 odd square miles. I have in it 86 police stations. Now, one-half of these stations, roughly speaking, are handed over to the deputy superintendent, and we each of us have to inspect these stations at least once in the year. If there are many interruptions, it often happens—I will not say very often, but it will happen—that a station will not be inspected for 18 or 20 months together; it may be inspected at the beginning of one year and towards the end of the next year. I think our districts should be small enough to enable us to get over them at least three or four times during the year.

2876. You would represent not that the office work of your district is too great, but that the size of your district is such that you are practically prevented, for physical reasons, from visiting your outlying stations as often as you ought?—Quite so.

2877. The remedy lies, in your judgment, not so much in an alteration of the kind of work allotted to you, as in an increased staff allotted to the district?—An increased staff or a decrease in the area. If the District Superintendents were all given Assistants to do their office work when they go on tour, they would be able to move about more quickly and inspect more often than they are now able to do.

2878. I understand that the administrative charge of half your district is run by yourself and that of the other half by the deputy superintendent?—Yes.

2879. Is it not clear therefore that either one-half of the district is controlled by too high an officer or one-half is controlled by too low a grade of officer?—So far as supervision is concerned, the work is much the same. Virtually the District Superintendent has charge of the whole district; he is responsible for everything that takes place in the whole district. As a matter of fact he is expected to visit, besides his own range, a portion of his Assistant's range during the year. The actual amount of inspection performed by each is about the same, because the assignment of work differs in each part of the district.

2880. Do you find that you are in close enough touch, not only with your Assistants, but with the various authorities in your police district?—I think so. We often meet to discuss matters, and so far as I know in the whole of my service our meetings have always been amicable; I have never had any difficulty.

2881. Do you yourself and your European divisional officers have a good knowledge of the vernaculars in your district?—Fairly good for general conversation; I do not think I should be able to discuss politics in the vernacular, but for enquiry into cases of crime I find my knowledge is pretty well sufficient.

2882. When you have to interrogate a witness or a prisoner, are you able to follow him with ease in the vernacular?—Unless his dialect is very bad; occasionally in some of the outlying villages the dialect is very vulgar and it is very difficult to follow; in that case we have to get an interpreter.

2883. You think you have sufficient knowledge of the language of the district to be able to follow the enquiry?—Yes.

2884. To follow it closely and accurately?—Fairly accurately.

2885. Your immediate superior is the Inspector-General for Madras?—My immediate superior is the Deputy Inspector-General.

2886. Do you find that in your relations with him you are unduly hampered by existing regulations or practice?—No, I do not find it.

2887. In every way you are as free of control, you have as full an exercise of responsibility, as an officer could reasonably require?—I think so; you mean in the matter of appeals?

2888. I mean generally?—Generally speaking, I am thoroughly satisfied; I could not wish for any better arrangement than exists at present.

2889. You can exercise the full amount of responsibility which your position requires?—Quite so.

2890. With regard to your subordinates, can you delegate to them sufficient freedom and responsibility?—I think so. I think the rules are quite satisfactory for the general administration of the department.

2891. Can you suggest any means by which unnecessary office work could be diminished or any way in which by decentralisation the efficiency of yourself or your subordinates could be increased?—There is a difficulty at present owing to the dearth of deputy superintendents; the time will come when there will be sufficient experienced deputies provided for all important districts. When that time comes, I think there will not be much trouble because then the Superintendent will be able to get rid largely of his office work and able to go about his district as he ought to do.

2892. What are your relations with the District Magistrate?—We have always been on the best of terms.

2893. I am not speaking personally?—As a Superintendent of Police I have never had any difficulty. I have served in various offices. I myself always admit that the District Magistrate is my immediate superior officer; I never fail when I go to a district or when a new District Magistrate comes on the scene to make him understand what my feelings as regards my position are, viz., that during the absence of the Inspector-General I am entirely subordinate to all orders of the District Magistrate.

2894. Do you find that that works well and smoothly?—Yes, always: it really throws the responsibility on the District Magistrate; he gives you an order to carry out, and you carry it out.

2895. It entails no unnecessary correspondence or delay?—No, I think not.

2896. Can you make any suggestions to us by which either delay or too much correspondence might be obviated; I mean in regard to your relations with the District Magistrate?—The correspondence is always direct; it does not go through any outside channels; if you ask for a District Magistrate's order you always get it as soon as possible.

2897. Can you mention any subject in regard to which you think you might have a freer hand in your relations with him?—No.

2898. (Mr. Hichens.) I understand that your police district is divided up into divisions?—Yes.

2899. But so far as you are concerned you are only brought into relations with one District Magistrate?—Yes.

2900. With regard to the matter of appeals, is there any appeal from your subordinates to the District Magistrate in the case of dismissal?—No: they appeal from an order of the District Superintendent of Police to the Deputy Inspector-General, and from him to the Inspector-General of Police.

2901. Can any one of your subordinates appeal right up to the Inspector-General?—Yes.

2902. There is no finality?—Constables appeal up to the Inspector-General of Police. I think perhaps the appeal might lie only in cases of dismissal to the Deputy Inspector-General of Police, with revision if it were found necessary or found that something had been overlooked or hidden; in that case an appeal should lie to the Inspector-General.

2903. It has been suggested to us that an appeal should lie to one officer above the appointing officer; that is to say, if the appointment of a constable was made by the District Superintendent, an appeal should lie by the constable, if he was dismissed, to the officer just one grade above the Superintendent. What do you say to that?—I think that would be sufficient in the case of constables and head constables, but as I say if there was any reason why he should appeal to a higher power it might go up to the Inspector-General of Police. There may be instances of a mistake being made on account of some paper being lost or kept back, or some fact not being known, and justice having been evaded; an appeal might then lie one step further.

2904. Then you would allow everybody an appeal to the Inspector-General?—In those cases, yes, in the case of dismissals.

2905. Are you brought into relations at all with the Inspector-General under the Government of India?—No, I have nothing to do with him.

2906. (Mr. Dutt.) The pay of inspectors ranges from what figure to what figure?—In my particular district I do not think I have any below Rs. 100 or above Rs. 200.

2907. What is the pay of the head constable?—Rs. 14 to Rs. 25; the Rs. 25 grade is now being done away with. Then I have sub-inspectors also; they are now being introduced into the Police Department.

2908. Will you tell us how many you will have; you have not got any yet?—They are now coming in from the Training School.

2909. At present these head constables are in charge of stations?—Yes.

2910. Do you think that head constables are sufficiently up to their duties to be fit for station charge?—Yes; in very many instances they have turned out very satisfactory work. The idea now is to substitute sub-inspectors in place of these constables, who are more highly trained officers from the Vellore Training School. It is doubtful whether they will be of any practical use to us for several months to come, because their knowledge is more or less theoretical at present.

2911. So you cannot give a final opinion till you have tried the new sub-inspectors for some time?—No.

2912. What supervision has the District Magistrate over the investigation of criminal cases; do special reports go up to him in important cases?—Of course he gets the judgments from the whole of his courts.

2913. I am referring to cases under investigation by the police?—In grave crimes, such as murder or dacoity and gang robberies, the Superintendent and Assistant Superintendent in their weekly reports submit investigation reports of new cases and old cases to the District Magistrate, and, through the District Magistrate, to the higher police authorities; so that the District Magistrate is fully aware of how the investigation into these grave crimes is proceeding.

2914. On the receipt of these reports does the District Magistrate give his opinion as to how the future enquiry should go on?—In very rare instances, I think. Although I am getting reports week after week it is difficult generally to follow up cases unless we register the cases as a whole in some register; in fact we find it very difficult ourselves to follow up cases like that.

2915. In a very serious dacoity case would you not expect some instruction or opinion from the District Magistrate while the case was under investigation?—If the case has been immediately enquired into and the investigation has been regular and according to law, there will never be any opportunity or necessity for the District Magistrate to give instructions.

2916. So that there will be no such instructions?—Very rarely.

2917. You think there will be some?—I do not remember any case; probably it would be put on one side to await the result of the trial; often when a case has been disposed of, I have had passed on to me the duty of making an enquiry into the conduct of the police.

2918. Then, when the investigation is complete, does it sometimes happen that the District Magistrate on perusal of the papers directs that the case should come up for trial?—I think I remember a few instances where that has happened, but very few.

2919. How far does the District Magistrate interfere in the departmental work—the promotion of sub-inspectors and constables and so on?—He very rarely interferes. If one is on friendly relations with the District Magistrate he may often suggest that a certain inspector or head constable is unfit for the position he holds; but he very rarely will go out of his way to interfere with the police administration of the district so far as appointments are concerned.

2920. Do the police rules give him any power to cancel promotion?—No.

2921. Then how does he interfere?—He would only do it in a friendly manner.

2922. He would suggest that so-and-so ought to be promoted or that so-and-so ought not?—Yes; he may say "I think so-and-so is a good man."

2923. Is it necessary under the rules to inform the District Magistrate when a Police Officer is to be promoted?—I do not think it is. We have a personal knowledge of our own subordinates and keep careful records of their work, carefully following their career. Then they are promoted on a six months' probation; if a man turns out satisfactory his promotion will be confirmed, otherwise it will not.

2924. (Sir Frederic Lely.) It is not very long ago that an order was issued that District Superintendents of Police should not make long tours, but should return at brief intervals to their headquarters?—I do not remember such an order.

2925. I have heard of it in other parts of India?—As a matter of fact we always understand that we should return to headquarters once in a few weeks, but there is no specific order that we should; we do it for our own benefit.

2926. You say that you are in charge of one-half of the district and another officer is in charge of the other half; are you empowered to make an exchange with him, he taking your half and you taking his, so as to give the other division a chance of your personal supervision?—We do that.

2927. Have you the power yourself to arrange that?—Yes we can inspect any division in the range that we think fit.

2928. You can take permanent charge of it?—Yes; the inspectors are in permanent charge of these divisions, and we inspect the inspectors' work.

2929. A certain portion of the district is handed over to your Assistant, and the other is under your superior charge; you do not change about with him?—Not entirely.

2930. Do you think it would be a good thing to do so sometimes, so that all the district may within a certain period come under your own special eye?—I do not think it could be done very well, because in our range we have the headquarters office which requires constant supervision. We have the manager there and some 12 or 13 clerks, and at least once a month we have to look through all the various registers and books to see that they are properly kept.

2931. Now as to touring; it is very necessary that you should tour a good deal?—Yes.

2932. Have you to take tents with you?—Nearly always.

2933. Is your district not supplied with circuit houses?—There are very few bungalows; sometimes you will find only six or seven in a whole district.

2934. Would it not add to the efficiency of your work to have bungalows at stated places?—I think it would. The tents are Government property and it is impossible to strike a tent when it is wet without doing it damage. In the rains our marches are often delayed because we cannot strike our tents; so that it would add to the ease and comfort of inspection if bungalows were built everywhere.

2935. It would be a great help to you to be able at an hour's notice to take your portmanteau and go straight off to a house which you would find ready furnished for you?—It would.

2936. You speak of the very satisfactory attitude towards each other of yourself and the District Magistrate; is that universal in the Madras Presidency?—I think it is.

2937. (Sir Steyning Edgerley.) You have no personal assistant?—No. I have been in charge of this district only for the past six weeks, but I have been in districts like Bellary where I have had no Assistant for three years.

2938. The South Arcot district is supposed to have an Assistant?—Yes.

2939. At present it is temporarily without one because the recruiting is not up to full strength?—Yes.

2940. When the recruitment gets up to full strength will you have an Assistant Superintendent as a personal assistant?—We hope so.

2941. Is that not against the principles of the Government of India; have you seen any orders on the subject?—Yes; the deputies are supposed to be our personal assistants, I think.

2942. You think that if you have a deputy in this particular district it will be really to free you in the matter of office superintendence?—Yes.

2943. That will be of much more use to you than say a second Assistant Superintendent in the district?—Yes; I think that is the universal opinion of all Superintendents.

2944. You told us that you recognise your position of subordination to the District Magistrate, and you added "while the Inspector-General is away"; what did you mean by that?—I meant this. If we were to rely upon the advice and guidance of the Inspector-General of Police in perhaps a serious matter of riot in a headquarter town, he might be up in Ganjam, out of reach at the time.

2945. Suppose he was actually in South Arcot when anything of that sort occurred, he would not displace the District Magistrate?—No.

2946. Your allegiance would still be to the District Magistrate?—I should inform the Inspector-General of Police about the occurrence, but I should still look to the District Magistrate because of his local experience.

2947. On the constitutional position, who is the man who is responsible?—The District Magistrate is responsible for everything that goes on in his district.

2948. Would you have to take your orders from him or from the Inspector-General of Police?—I might not take orders at all; it is a very rare instance where one would ask for orders; possibly it might arise in case of a serious riot occurring during festivals or something of that sort; then, of course, one would apply to the District Magistrate.

2949. With regard to instructions from the District Magistrate, referred to by Mr. Dutt, is the position here the same as in Bengal? Under the Criminal Procedure Code your investigations go up to the magistrate having jurisdiction?—Yes.

2950. That is not necessarily the District Magistrate at all?—Not necessarily the District Magistrate.

2951. I mean, he would be the person who would give the investigating officer instructions, if any one needed to do so, about the investigation of a crime?—Yes; he is the magistrate having jurisdiction.

2952. (Mr. Meyer.) When your police officer is investigating a case and the investigation has lasted more than a certain time, he has to submit reports to the magistrate in order to get authorization for the further detention of the prisoner and so forth?—Yes.

2953. And upon that he may receive instructions from the magistrate saying that he must not detain the prisoner any longer and so forth?—Yes.

2954. Do those reports ever go to the District Magistrate or would they go to the Sub-Divisional Magistrate?—They would go to the Sub-Divisional Magistrate; I doubt if the District Magistrate would be aware of them at all in the ordinary course.

2955. And therefore any order you might receive from a magistrate telling you to go on investigating a case would come, not from the District Magistrate, but from the local magistrate?—Exactly.

2956. The District Magistrate learns of the case generally from your diary?—Yes; in grave crimes.

2957. And if he wants information he sends for you or asks for a separate report?—Yes.

Mr. C. G. W.
Clogstown.

25 Nov., 1907.

Mr. C. G. W.
Clogston,
25 Nov., 1907.

2958. Then in all matters relating to the peace of the district you are the assistant of the District Magistrate?—Yes.

2959. You obey the orders of the District Magistrate even though the Inspector-General should be in the district?—Yes.

2960. You are under the Deputy Inspector-General and Inspector-General with regard to matters relating to discipline and the arming of the force and so on?—Yes.

2961. Suppose you had got both the Assistant Superintendent that you want, and the deputy superintendent that you have already, is the idea that each of them should be in charge of a portion of a district?—No. The Assistant whom we should like to have would be a personal assistant.

2962. I do not ask you what you would like, but what the orders of Government are?—If he is an experienced man I presume he could be utilized to go out and make enquiries or to do some inspection if any important work detained us at headquarters. If he was an experienced officer I think he should be made liable to do a portion of the inspection work that would otherwise be performed by the Superintendent.

2963. You have an Assistant Superintendent normally; he is now a deputy and is in direct charge of inspection over a portion of the district; suppose you had two; could not the second also take direct charge of another portion of the district and thus reduce your work; even if you were left with the office work would that not mean a reduction of your work?—I do not know that that has ever been put forward.

2964. You think that the idea is that he should be a personal assistant to you?—A personal assistant for the sake of office work.

2965. Sir Frederic Lely raised a question as to the larger provision of bungalows in the district. Whose property are the bungalows that you already have?—Sometimes they are Public Works Department bungalows, sometimes Local Fund bungalows.

2966. The ordinary travellers' bungalows are under the District Board?—Yes.

2967. Therefore if you wanted more the District Board could supply them if necessary?—Yes.

2968. (Chairman.) Is there any correspondence which you now have to send in the way of diaries to the District Magistrate which could be usefully cut out from the weekly or daily correspondence?—We keep a daily diary which we submit once a week to the District Magistrate, and the diary includes the progress of the investigation of any particularly grave crime occurring in a district; it is forwarded to the Deputy Inspector-General and then to the Inspector-General, and finally it comes back to us minus these grave crime reports, which are filed in the chief office; very often they are returned with remarks.

2969. If you sent the grave crimes report alone to the District Magistrate, would that not save you a lot of correspondence without having any harmful effect on the peace of the district?—He sees them when he passes them on.

2970. But it is necessary for him to see the diary apart from the grave crime reports?—He likes to know what the District Superintendent is doing.

2971. But is it necessary?—It is difficult for me to say, not being in the position of the District Magistrate.

2972. Would you think that any harm would be done as regards your police administration if these enquiries were not forwarded to the District Magistrate?—I think it is a very good system.

2973. You do not suggest any modification?—No.

2974. Is there any other point which you desire to mention to us?—The question of transfers has come up; there is no doubt that the administration suffers on account of these transfers; whether they are absolutely inevitable or not it is difficult to say. I do not think that District Superintendents should be transferred from one district to another without very good cause. In the case of severe illness where the Medical Officer finds that it is absolutely necessary for the District Superintendent to be changed to another climate, the transfer of course is inevitable, and he must go; otherwise, I think a Superintendent once in charge of a district should remain there as long as possible; it is for the benefit of the public that he should do so; he does not get to know his district until he has been in it some time; if you consider that the district may cover 5,000 or 6,000 square miles, with possibly two or three million inhabitants and three or four thousand villages, it is excessively difficult for any Superintendent, however energetic he may be, to get to know even a small portion of his district under a couple of years; there are no doubt hundreds of villages in every district which have never been visited and can never be visited by a European officer. The result is that the people, not getting to know their European officers, have no confidence in them. I think that if the Superintendent were to remain for a long period in a district the people would get to know him better and have more confidence in him, and bring to his knowledge many evils which now exist of which we are not aware.

2975. How long have you been in your district?—Only a few weeks now; I was lately officiating as Deputy Inspector-General in the Central Range.

2976. How many times have you been transferred from district to district in the course of your 24 years' service?—I have had eleven or twelve transfers.

2977. That means that you cannot have been in any district more than two years on the average?—One district I was in for three years; that was in Bellary.

2978. Does the pay in the Madras Police attach to the district or to the individual?—To the individual.

2979. You have been in your present district before?—For three weeks; on that occasion I was a probationer.

2980. What is it that necessitates this continual transfer of District Superintendents?—Officers ask for it; they want a change; they go upon leave; they have no lien upon their district on their return, and they are posted where there is a vacancy.

2981. Do officers take leave every year?—No.

2982. I do not say long or short leave, but do they take any leave every year?—Rarely, I think.

2983. Do you not think it would be advantageous to an officer if he was bound to take leave every year?—His privilege leave do you mean?

2984. Some period of leave?—I do not think in healthy districts an officer requires leave so often as that.

2985. Do you know that in all Government Service in England every officer is entitled, and is practically bound, to take leave every year. I did not know that; I know they get a great many holidays which we do not get.

2986. Do you know that, as a matter of departmental practice, for the good of the office, an officer is generally required by the Head of his Department to take his leave every year?—I did not know it.

2987. Do you not think it would make an officer's work of greater value during the remaining eleven months if he was bound to take leave for one month?—Possibly; the difficulty would be as to the acting appointments.

2988. Might it not be possible during the 28 days' leave to leave the district in charge of the Assistant?—Possibly.

2989. And would not that change of system, which would not necessitate the continued long absence of a District Magistrate or District Superintendent from his charge, obviate ultimately the constant transfers which now go on?—I cannot see that. If officers were bound to return to the district when they went away on three months or six months' leave, I do not think any particular harm would be done. Where I think the harm is, is that the officer, having no lien on his district, is often transferred to another district in which he has had no experience.

2990. Then what do you say as to transfers in the case of Assistant Superintendents?—I do not see how these continual transfers can be obviated in their case. For instance, a vacancy occurring in the case of an Assistant Superintendent in Ganjam necessitates an Assistant Superintendent acting for him; yet the next Assistant Superintendent may be at some place 800 miles away; under ordinary circumstances you cannot pass him over for the appointment, and up he goes.

2991. Because of the consideration of pay?—Exactly; he often does not come back again to the place where he was Assistant Superintendent before; somebody else takes his place, and at the end of his acting term of three or six or twelve months he goes into any vacancy there may be, which may be in a district in which he has no practical knowledge of the language at all. These are great difficulties, and I do not see how they can be obviated.

2992. You have not been able to think of any scheme which would get over them?—The only scheme that has crossed my mind is that possibly the Presidency might be divided into Deputy Inspector-General's ranges for the purpose of acting promotions and the senior Assistant Superintendent of a range might act for the District Superintendent who was going on leave. The question would then arise about acting allowances.

2993. (Mr. Meyer.) The Chairman has referred to the system in England under which each officer gets a limited amount of leave every year and has to take it. Would a system that is applicable to officers serving in their own country, and not necessarily separated from their families, be applicable to European officers serving in India?—There would be a great objection to forcing officers to take a month's leave every year; they would not be able to accumulate the three months' privilege leave which entitles them to run home and see their family.

2994. With regard to your suggestion about acting appointments, is it necessary that when there is an acting appointment to be made the next senior man should be put in; could not the next senior man in the same district, if he is fit, be put in; I am not speaking of permanent promotion but of an acting appointment?—Perhaps it would be fair enough to give him an acting appointment for two or three months, but occasionally a District Officer taking short leave is bound to extend his leave on medical certificate and he might be absent for a year; then what would you do?

2995. Suppose a man takes six months' leave on private affairs; could you put in a local man even though the next in seniority would lose his turn?—The loss of pay for the six months would be rather heavy.

2996. But in the course of twenty years' service would not things more or less balance themselves; where he lost once he would gain another time?—The chances might be equal for and against it, but the opportunities might not occur in a man's career to make up the balance. I think, on the whole, it would be considered unfair.

2997. It would be unfair perhaps to the personnel of the service, but of advantage to the district?—That might be so.

2998. (Sir Steyning Edgerley.) Do you not think this might be done without any hardship to individual officers: on the Bombay side we allow Assistant Superintendents to go on special service; for instance two or three have gone into the service of the Rajputana Railway. It is very desirable to transfer them when a vacancy occurs. The Government of India sanctioned an arrangement by which, when any of these two or three officers cannot get a vacancy according to their turn, they are given the acting allowance. Could you not serve the public service without injuring the individual by making an arrangement of that sort generally?—Do you mean giving an acting allowance without transferring them?

2999. Yes; the audit officer says, A. B.'s junior is now acting in charge of the district, therefore A. B. is entitled to an acting allowance?—What allowance would the other get?

3000. He gets the acting allowance as District Superintendent?—That would be an increase of expenditure.

3001. It would be an increase of expenditure, of course, but my suggestion is that if Government wishes this improvement in administration they must not make it at the expense of the particular officer, but at their own expense?—I quite agree; if that could be done, there is no doubt that the administration would benefit.

FOURTH DAY.

MADRAS, Tuesday, November 26th, 1907.

PRESENT :

C. E. H. HOBHOUSE, Esq., M.P., Under Secretary of State for India, Chairman.

Sir FREDERIC LELY, K.C.I.E., C.S.I.

Sir STEYNING EDGERLEY, K.C.V.O., C.I.E., I.C.S.

R. C. DUTT, Esq., C.I.E.

W. S. MEYER, Esq., C.I.E., I.C.S.

W. L. HICHENS, Esq.

Rao Bahadur M. ADINARAYANA AIYAR was called and examined.

3002. (Chairman.) What experience have you had in the Madras Government?—I was for several years employed in the Board of Revenue and the Government Secretariat; I was also employed for some time in the Collector's office in Madras and in the Sea Customs office; then for about 13 years or more I was connected with the Settlement Department as Assistant Commissioner and Deputy Commissioner of Settlements.

3003. In Madras?—In the Madras Presidency. I did settlement work in Tanjore, Trichinopoly, and other districts. I have now retired.

3004. Do you think that the tahsildar on whom depends the work of revenue collection is rather inclined, looking at his prospects of advancement, to pay too much attention to the amount of revenue which he collects in the year?—He pays a good deal too much attention to that; he does not concern himself sufficiently, I think, with ferreting out local troubles and causes of deterioration, and that kind of thing.

3005. Perhaps you mean, not so much ferreting them out, as paying attention to them when they are brought to his notice?—Yes.

3006. It would hardly be the duty of an officer of Government to ferret out grievances?—No, not to needlessly get them manufactured; but where they do occur, instead of slurring over them, he ought to give attention to them.

3007. You think that his idea is that his promotion depends upon the amount of revenue he collects?—He practically has come to be identified with the collection of revenue; I do not mean to criticise the whole class adversely.

3008. The tahsildar is the superior of the revenue inspector?—Yes.

3009. Do you think that the position of these officers ought to be raised?—Yes.

3010. You do not think a knowledge of the vernacular is so important as it used to be?—Yes; there is a considerable extension of English knowledge at present, but a better knowledge of the vernaculars would be very useful, because it would give more opportunities for the officer to get into close communication with the people.

3011. Probably the man who has the keenest grievance is the poorest man?—Yes.

3012. And it will be the poorest man who has least knowledge of English?—Yes, he is the least vocal of the people, too.

3013. A man, unless he knows the language well, cannot express his troubles?—No.

3014. Therefore it is very important that the Government officer should know the vernaculars?—It is, but, with the amount of correspondence that goes on, the need of that knowledge is not perhaps felt so much.

3015. You say you think the tahsildars should be graded with Deputy Collectors?—That is my view; that would give them a status, and add strength to their opinions, too.

3016. Would it raise their pay?—It need not very much raise their pay; the present lowest rate of a tahsildar is Rs. 150; I think about Rs. 200 should be the minimum that a tahsildar ought to get.

3017. What does he get now?—Rs. 150; we must have some interval between the revenue inspector and the tahsildar, and as I propose that the revenue inspector's position also should be raised, I would charge him more with the collection duties and make him more responsible for that; as he will have a smaller charge, he could look after that work more closely.

3018. What is the size of the tahsildar's charge?—His taluk consists of about 100 to 120 villages; I cannot be exact.

3019. How many people would there be in a village on the average?—About 300 or 400 you may say; there are many villages which are uninhabited; there are also larger villages with 200 or 300 inhabitants only.

3020. Is it your view that the tahsildar, owing to the necessity of collecting the greatest possible amount of revenue, is so occupied that he is not in touch with the people in his taluk?—He looks mostly to the collection work.

3021. He does not mix with the people very much?—He cannot mix closely with them when he is making collections.

3022. Has the tahsildar much opportunity of being in touch with all the people in his taluk?—He has to move about; recent orders require him to be on the move for about 20 days in the month.

3023. How often will he visit each of his 100 villages in the year?—I cannot tell exactly.

3024. Once every year?—I daresay he will inspect the more important villages, not every one of them, once a year.

3025. You say that the system of jamabandi, which used to be intended for an annual gathering of all the raiyats of the district, has rather dropped into disuse?—I think so.

3026. Do a less number of the raiyats come up to jamabandi every year?—Yes; practically very few, except a few stray people; it is more a gathering for going through the accounts of the annual settlement than a gathering of the raiyats; the pattas and other things get distributed in the villages.

3027. Where are you living now?—In Madras.

3028. Have you got property in the district?—Yes, in the Chingleput district; but I am not a Government tenant.

3029. You have property there, and you go out and visit your tenants? You therefore have the opportunity of knowing what is going on outside Madras?—Yes.

3030. You suggest that for the District or Divisional Officer the tahsildar should be substituted?—The taluk tahsildar himself should be graded as a Divisional Officer; he should be graded with the rank of a Deputy Collector, and he should have the assistance of an annual gathering of the raiyats.

3031. That would be resuscitating the jamabandi?—Yes; the jamabandi is practically the occasion for presenting individual grievances.

3032. Did that system work well in the old days?—I have not much experience of that; of course, as to individual grievances, the people come up and wait, and it is every man for himself; there is not any collective opinion gathered at the time, nor does it strengthen any enquiry by giving the public an opportunity of discussion.

3033. You think that private discussion is better than public discussion?—I think public discussion would be better. The jamabandi, as hitherto conducted, is simply an occasion for individual grievances being presented; there is no collective discussion of general grievances affecting localities, or anything like that.

3034. Do you think that an Advisory Council, which the District Officer could consult, would assist very much?—Yes.

3035. And that it would bring to the notice of the Divisional Officer grievances or questions on which it would be important that he should know the native opinion in the district?—Yes; such questions can also be discussed publicly there, and any decision come to upon the matter could be recorded, which would be of use.

3036. You understand that this is a question of Advisory Councils, not Councils with power to decide?—Just so, but where any action is recommended it could be noted.

3037. You suggest that some increase of power might be given to the village unions?—Yes.

3038. You suggest grants for expenditure on the repair of irrigation works?—Yes.

3039. Has that ever been tried before?—Under the old kudimaramat system, it was done without payment; now, if there is any large work affecting any particular village or locality to be carried out, I think it could be entrusted to the union.

3040. Up to what limit would you suggest that the union should have power of expenditure?—That is a matter which I have not thought out.

3041. Where would that money be raised from?—The Government. What are called minor irrigation works, which could be carried out without professional assistance, could be safely entrusted to the villages; I do not think there is any reason to apprehend that the work would not be done properly.

3042. Would the money come from Government generally or from a cess on land?—From the Government.

3043. Not from a cess on the land which is going to be benefited by the irrigation?—There is no such system here.

3044. Therefore you think it would be a good thing that the Government should give a certain amount of money to the panchayat?—In the minor irrigation works budget certain works are put down every year; such works might be entrusted to the villages concerned.

3045. And you think they would carry it out well?—They are interested in it.

3046. The same, I suppose, with regard to sanitation and the supervision of village schools?—Yes.

3047. Those three powers would be quite sufficient?—For the present, I would stop there.

3048. You think that would interest the villagers?—Yes; their own interests are concerned in the matter.

3049. Then you also wish them to have the power of disposal of civil cases up to Rs. 50 and the disposal of small criminal cases?—Yes.

3050. You think they would have the knowledge necessary?—Well, I am talking of the panchayats of larger villages, where the necessary intelligence is available, I think.

3051. Does that system obtain elsewhere?—I do not know about other provinces.

3052. (Mr. Dutt.) I understand you recommend that representatives of the raiyats should be brought into regular association with District Officers, and you think that some such scheme should be devised?—Yes.

3053. You consider that there is a sense of aloofness now on the part of the people, and that there should be occasions for officers to meet the people in assembly and consult them?—Yes.

3054. Do you think that the old jamabandi system could be revived now in order to meet these requirements?—I make a distinct proposal which I consider is a little in advance of the old jamabandi procedure. The old jamabandi procedure was an occasion for presenting individual grievances; I put forward my suggestion as some improvement upon it, giving an occasion also for public interest in questions affecting particular localities.

3055. Can you tell us how long a Divisional Officer is on tour during the year?—The rules require him to be something like six months or so on tour.

3056. Can you tell us roughly the number of taluks in a division on the average?—I believe two or three is about the maximum.

3057. And there are something like 100 villages in each taluk?—Yes.

3058. The Divisional Officer is out on tour for about six months in the year. Do you think that he could, with advantage, pitch his tent in different places so as to be in nearly all parts of the division and meet the villagers coming from surrounding groups of villages?—You mean that we should institute an occasion for meeting?

3059. The jamabandi might be the occasion, or there might be some other occasion, but if the Divisional Officer pitched his tent in different places in his division during those six months, would it be possible for him to visit all, or nearly all, the villages in his division in the course of one year?—Very likely; I do not see why he should not.

3060. Would it be possible for him to do the jamabandi locally, of the villages surrounding his tent, and in the presence of the cultivators who may choose to come there?—That is the present theory, but I would like to add that there is no obligation on people to come and take part in the jamabandi, and many of them do not come; they utilise the post for any individual grievances that they may desire to advance.

3061. Would you create an Advisory Council for the District Officer and also an Advisory Council for each taluk?—An Advisory Council for each taluk would be sufficient. The Collector is now required to do the jamabandi of a taluk himself in rotation so as to visit all the taluks in the district once in five years; so that he has opportunities of coming into contact with all of them.

3062. You say it should be formed of representative raiyats or of representatives of the raiyats?—Yes.

3063. Have you any idea as to how they could be selected for each taluk Advisory Council?—I think a maximum of 50 people would be sufficient. The more important villages, by themselves, might send a representative, and the others might be formed into small circles of, say, two or three smaller villages.

3064. You mean that where there are village unions the union might be asked to send you one man, and if there is no union the Divisional Officer might select a proper man for a group of villages?—Yes.

3065. You say that when the taluk Advisory Board is formed the Divisional Officer should consult them once or twice a year?—At least once a year.

3066. Do you not think he might profitably consult them oftener than once a year?—The Council should meet as occasion arises, and of course he could consult them then; if there was any special epidemic, or any special famine trouble, or any other trouble like that, he might call them together at more frequent intervals.

3067. Can you suggest any other matters in which the Divisional Officer could profitably consult the taluk Advisory Boards?—Famine relief is one; fiscal measures would be another.

3068. What do you mean by fiscal measures?—The imposition of any assessment, or the revision of assessment; the Divisional Officer could take the general sense of the Council. I would make them simply advisory; I would give them no responsible position.

3069. The Divisional Officer might consult them also when plague relief measures have to be adopted?—Yes; he could use them for many purposes.

3070. You think they would be able to give valuable advice with regard to inoculation, with regard to the examination of women for plague, with regard to the evacuation of villages, the segregation of patients, and other questions that arise on the occasion of plague?—Yes.

3071. When there is a sudden calamity and suspensions or remissions are required, do you think the advice of these Advisory Boards would be valuable?—Yes; they would be able to show, with the chance of misrepresentations being exposed, what is required, and what they said would be liable to correction, and the real facts would be open to verification, and so on.

3072. Have not union panchayats or village unions been instituted in some important villages?—Yes; the unions at present are institutions which come under the category of local institutions under the Local Self Government Act.

3073. Were you referring to those?—No. I am talking of panchayats to be newly constituted irrespectively of them. Unions have an organisation at present which it will be possible to utilise as the Government may think proper; I have no objection to that; but, where they do not exist, I say you can form panchayats and give them these little interests to keep them usefully occupied.

3074. Where unions already exist under the Local Self Government Act you would utilise them?—Yes.

3075. You say that small irrigation works might be safely made over to these unions for construction?—Yes.

3076. What are known as kudimaramat?—Not kudimaramat; that is work which they have to do without being paid for it.

3077. Do you think that other works, besides, such as tanks and drinking water wells, might be safely entrusted to these unions?—I do not know about that. Possibly lengths of road might be Rao Bahadur entrusted to the villages situated alongside of them, but I will not venture an opinion as to that.

M.
Adinarayana
Aiyar.

26 Nov., 1907.

3078. Do you think these unions could be profitably consulted in the matter of pasture lands or grazing lands used by the villagers?—That would form part of their village economy which they would probably bring to notice whenever they were pressed on such questions.

3079. Is it at present the practice to consult them about the management of grazing fields?—No; that is all done by the Forest Department.

3080. My question was whether it would be profitable and good for the people that these unions should be consulted in such matters?—Yes; all these would come within the circle of their interests. I do not proceed on the assumption that we must begin with any list of subjects to be laid down.

3081. Do you think they could be profitably consulted in the matter of the establishment of liquor and other excise shops?—Yes, but I would not make it obligatory on the Divisional Officer to list these subjects as subjects upon which he must absolutely necessarily consult them; these are all questions which will come up in the Councils for notice if there is any grievance about them.

3082. Do you think there are any questions about irrigation rates on which these taluk Advisory Boards could be profitably consulted—fixing different rates for different districts and villages; could they give any valuable advice in such matters?—I am afraid there will not be any consensus of opinion upon such matters. The union Councils would all be on one side only.

3083. Would it not be profitable to consult them?—The Divisional Officer might perhaps ask them, to see how far it is likely to be accepted; there is no harm in consulting.

3084. Would you think it advisable that at every settlement revision the taluk Advisory Boards should be consulted?—Not in the sense that they should have power to interpose.

3085. I mean consulting them only.—Yes, consulting them to ascertain the differences, to determine the measure of increase that could reasonably be imposed; in that way we might utilise these Councils.

3086. (Mr. Hitchens.) One of the large sub-divisions of our terms of reference is how far functions can be delegated from the provincial Government to authorities subordinate to Government. The authorities subordinate to Government are, to a certain extent at any rate, District Boards, taluk Boards, and village unions. Can you suggest any further powers that should be delegated to these particular Boards?—I have not thought out the question.

3087. You have not thought of the existing machinery, but you have suggested certain new machinery?—Yes.

3088. Have you suggested new machinery because you think the old machinery is bad?—I think the machinery now existing in the Local Fund Boards and the unions will not have that touch with particular local grievances and other troubles which is necessary, and a standing institution, like the Advisory Council, should be in close touch with the Divisional Officer, bringing the administration and the people closer together.

3089. Why do you not think the existing machinery would be adequate for that purpose?—The taluk Boards and the unions are constituted under special Acts for special purposes. The purpose that I have in view in suggesting the Advisory Council is to bring the revenue administration and the people affected by it into closer touch with each other. This lies very much outside those special regulations under which these particular bodies have come into existence.

3090. As far as the functions of local self-government bodies are concerned would you say that these Boards do their work well?—That is a point I have not considered.

3091. But you want now fresh Boards to advise on totally different points?—Yes.

3092. You cannot utilise the existing machinery for that purpose?—No. I do not think those special bodies created under special Acts can be utilised for this purpose. That fact would not prevent the members of them finding their places on the Advisory Councils also.

3093. There is a taluk Board to-day and the members are derived from the village unions? Would those form the members of your new Advisory Board?—Not necessarily, I think.

3094. They would be partly nominated, but they would mainly come from there?—Yes.

3095. That is the machinery you suggest for your Advisory Council?—Yes. I want a larger Council, about 50 people—not exceeding 50 for the whole taluk, and to meet for this special purpose only; there should be no regulation or anything like that controlling this matter.

3096. Is it your opinion that representatives of the taluk Board are really representative of the village unions, speaking from your experience of the country?—That is a point I have not thought out.

3097. But there is no reason why they, either collectively or individually, should not discuss any matter they wish with the Divisional Officer?—No, that is not within the province of their work now, because they are constituted under special Acts.

3098. But the District Officer would always in practice listen to anybody who came to him, would he not?—Yes.

3099. (Mr. Meyer.) You said that the pay of a tahsildar is Rs. 150 a month; is that quite correct?—That is the lowest rate of pay.

3100. And it runs up to what?—Rs. 250 I think.

3101. You propose to make the tahsildar a Divisional Officer?—Yes.

3102. In each district there are 8 or 9, possibly 10 taluks. You would have these 8 or 9 tahsildars in direct subordination to the Collector?—Yes.

3103. Then what is to become of the existing Divisional Officers, the Sub-Collector and the Head Assistant and the Deputy Collector?—They will all get a taluk each; I suggest that you should grade the tahsildars into that service.

3104. At present there are four Divisional Officers (two Civilians and two Deputy Collectors), and we will say nine tahsildars, in a district; you would have nine officers only, of whom two would be Civilians as before, and seven Deputy Collectors; is that correct?—My suggestion was to grade the tahsildars as Deputy Collectors.

3105. The present system is that two or three taluks are grouped into a division under a Divisional Officer; therefore you have primarily got the tahsildar; above him is the Divisional Officer; you say the tahsildar is to become a Divisional Officer?—Yes.

3106. What is to become of the existing Divisional Officers?—I mean that the tahsildars, some of them, would be absorbed when we raise the revenue inspectors to a higher status.

3107. What is to become of the tahsildar as such; is he to disappear?—Yes.

3108. That is to say, in every taluk there will be either a Covenanted Civilian or a Deputy Collector, exercising the functions of a Divisional Officer and also the functions of a tahsildar?—No; I would relegate the tahsildar's duty to the revenue inspector.

3109. Practically you would convert the revenue inspectors into tahsildars and the tahsildars into Divisional Officers?—Yes.

3110. Would that not involve very considerable expenditure?—Yes. At present tahsildars are not, most of them, doing any magisterial work, and if the status of revenue inspectors is improved and they absorb the tahsildar's duties, the tahsildars might be made Divisional Officers.

3111. In some taluks the tahsildar does magisterial duties?—Yes.

3112. What would you do as to them?—We must gradually work it out.

3113. Would you convert the revenue inspector into a magistrate?—No; I would appoint more stationary magistrates. It struck me that my proposal might lead to some considerable enhancement of cost.

3114. Would it add to the Collector's work to deal with eight or nine officers in the first instance, instead of four or five?—What the Divisional Officers now intercept in the way of work will still be intercepted by all these tahsildars as Divisional Officers, and with the aid of Personal Assistants I should not think there would be much additional work.

3115. Are you aware that there is a scheme under consideration for considerably increasing the number of taluks?—That is, I think, a recommendation for my proposal—to raise the status of revenue inspectors and charge them with the other duties.

3116. But you go much further; you do not think a mere increase of the number of taluks on the present lines would suffice?—No.

3117. You say that the jamabandi has become a mere farce. Have you ever attended a jamabandi?—Yes, I have had experience of my own jamabandi—the hearing of settlement appeals and so on.

3118. That is not the ordinary revenue jamabandi?—No, I have not personally attended one.

3119. You have not personally attended a revenue jamabandi; you speak from hearsay?—Yes.

3120. Suppose there are floods or anything which involves a large demand for irrigation, there would be a considerable attendance at the jamabandi?—Yes, for individual grievances only.

3121. Your taluk Advisory Council is to consist of a representative of each of the principal villages?—Yes.

3122. Selected by the Collector or by the Divisional Officer?—It would have to be done by the Divisional Officer.

3123. In making those selections would you pay any attention to the character of the population, its distribution into castes, and so forth?—I would take the landed interests.

3124. Therefore your Council would be a land-owners' Council?—Yes.

3125. The people who possess no land or those who possess little land, the labouring classes, would not be represented?—Yes; I am talking of the revenue administration; it will naturally work out in the way you suggest.

3126. But I understand that besides the revenue administration you desire this Council to consider other matters, such as plague and so on?—They could be utilised for that purpose.

3127. Do you consider that they would be sufficiently representative if they were all land-owners?—I fix the number at a maximum of about 50, which would take in probably every alternate village in a taluk.

3128. Do you propose that they should accompany the Divisional Officer to the various places he visits or that they should only meet at a fixed place on stated occasions?—On stated intimated occasions.

3129. You recommend that the jamabandi should be conducted gradually, so that the Divisional Officer or the Collector or whoever conducts it should be able to conduct it locally at each important village.—It is so done, I think, now; it is done at three or four centres in a taluk. What I recommended was that there should be a time fixed.

3130. One of the most important matters of the jamabandi is to settle the claims for remission on lost or damaged crops?—Yes.

3131. That must of necessity be done at a time when it can be ascertained whether the crops have withered or have been lost?—Yes.

3132. Therefore it would be impossible to conduct that part of the jamabandi at intervals right through the year?—That would be impossible.

3133. At present you have a taluk Board for each division?—Yes.

3134. If you double or more than double the divisions, as you would by this scheme, you would double the taluk Boards also?—It may be, yes.

3135. Therefore you would have two Councils, one dealing with Local Fund questions—an administrative Council—the other dealing with revenue and other matters—a consultative Council?—Yes, one has special functions under special Acts. The other is not a Council with any legal responsibilities or powers; it is simply an Advisory Council.

3136. But you do not think it would be possible to give the taluk Board, which is an administrative and recognised legislative body, advisory functions in respect of other matters?—Unless you made legislative provision for it.

3137. You propose to give certain powers to panchayats in all the important villages?—Yes.

3138. How would you constitute those panchayats?—I would ask the villages to nominate the members, other than the two prominent head village officers.

3139. The prominent head village officers are the head-man and the head village accountant?—Yes.

3140. Then three others would be selected?—Yes.

3141. How would the villagers appoint them?—From amongst themselves.

3142. In a large number of these villages there is a great proportion of low caste people—Pariahs and others?—Yes.

3143. Do you think their interests would be safe in the hands of the higher castes?—I think so.

3144. Do you think that these panchayats or Advisory Councils would work satisfactorily?—Yes.

3145. Are there factions in these villages?—There are factions, of course, but I do not see why these Advisory Councils, which are intended for eliciting information and for conveying information, would not be useful.

3146. But is not the panchayat rather to be an administrative body?—Yes.

3147. Would the factions interfere with that?—I think not.

3148. You mentioned the kudimaramat system, that is to say a system under which the villagers could be told off to do irrigation works; you do not wish to revive that?—No; it has fallen into disuse, and so many settlements have taken place since; except as to small works we feel now that the villagers cannot be called upon to do the larger things for which Government budgets.

3149. You think the system of kudimaramat has got out of date, and what you want is to let the villagers do their own work with the assistance of Government funds?—Yes.

3150. You said you thought they should have power to dispose of small civil and criminal cases. Would you allow any appeal from the decision of the panchayats in such cases?—My idea was to constitute them as arbitration courts in regard to civil cases.

3151. Suppose the parties are not satisfied?—I should say that if the parties agree and choose their own arbitrator from the panchayat, the scope for appeal except in cases of fraud or anything like that is very limited; the appeal now lies to the munsiff's court, which would still continue.

3152. Then it is to be optional with a person who has a petty suit either to bring it direct to the munsiff's court or to submit it to the village arbitration court?—No; if we really mean to do business I would make it compulsory that the people should in the first instance go to these arbitration courts.

3153. They must go first of all to the arbitration court, but you would still allow an appeal?—Yes; of course that will happen in exceptional cases.

3154. In a criminal case would your procedure be the same—that the petty criminal case must first be lodged in the village court?—No, we could not do that, because we may not be able to constitute Benches all over the country at present.

3155. Supposing you had a Bench?—Well, we might try it; it is new ground.

3156. But there would still be an appeal from the decision of the Bench to the local magistrate?—I mean non-appealable cases only—small cases of nuisance and petty things like that.

3157. Might it not be advisable to give these panchayats, if you had them, full powers as to the disposal of petty cases, and not allow an appeal at all?—Yes, I should think so.

3158. You would be prepared for that?—Yes.

3159. At present there is some petty magisterial and civil power vested in the village head-man?—Yes.

3160. You would transfer that to the village panchayat as a Bench?—Yes.

3161 (Sir Steyning Edgerley.) Supposing that an Advisory Council is to meet next month for some purpose or other; how would you arrange your business; would anybody be at liberty to bring up anything?—They would have previously to communicate the points they would bring up, because it might require some definite reply or previous enquiry.

3162. Then anyone who wished to bring up anything would have to give notice?—Yes.

3163. The President would be the Sub-Divisional Officer?—Yes.

3164. And he could add to the notice paper any subject he wished discussed?—Yes.

3165. Then the Council would meet. Would the proceedings be formal or conversational, or how would you deal with them?—I simply mean that any man who has got any particular subject to bring forward would put it before the Advisory Council, and any decision thereon or remark thereon would be noted down in the book.

3166. Do you think that a man of the class of whom these panchayats would consist would be able to get up in an assembly of 50 or 60 people and say what he wants?—I think so; it is matters that they are intimately concerned with which they would talk about.

3167. To what causes would you attribute the decay of the jamabandi?—The villagers think that each man can bring his grievance properly forward by post.

3168. I have heard it said sometimes here that the younger generation of European officers who come out are less well trained in the vernacular and less able to hold converse with the people; do you think there is anything in that?—I cannot speak from personal knowledge.

3169. (Sir Frederick Lely.) You wish to see Advisory Assemblies created. Do you not think that it would be more congenial to the spirit of the people and the general wishes of the villagers to revive the former jamabandi; does not the jamabandi answer practically all that you wish to obtain by an Advisory Assembly?—The jamabandi is loaded with the question of the settlement of the land revenue demand and the settlement of individual grievances. Even where that is concerned, people prefer to make known their grievances by post or somehow in that way. You might make the jamabandi season the occasion probably when they might call this Advisory Council meeting, but I do not agree that the jamabandi gathering itself will answer the purpose. The jamabandi concerns particular individuals who may have particular grievances.

3170. (Chairman.) You yourself have been a Deputy Commissioner for settlements. Have you ever had to punish subordinates or to fine subordinates?—Yes.

3171. It has been suggested to us that supposing you punish one of your subordinates, he ought to be able to appeal from you to one officer who is higher in the scale of authority than you, and that, having gone to that one officer, there should be no further appeal open to him. Do you think that stopping the number of appeals in that way would be satisfactory to all parties and that justice would be done?—In the majority of cases it would, I think.

3172. That would meet all reasonable requirements?—Yes.

3173. And in any case one officer above the officer who appoints the person punished would be sufficient?—In the majority of cases; but I am not able to tell offhand what the different classes of cases may be.

3174. Speaking generally that would be your view?—I think so.

(The witness withdrew.)

Mr. C. T. H. JOHNSON, I.C.S., was called and examined.

Mr. C. T. H.
Johnson.
26 Nov., 1907.

3175. (Chairman.) You are a Sub-Collector?—I am a Sub-Collector and Joint Magistrate at Negapatam. I have been in this country nine years and three months.

3176. Will you describe to us the organisation of your office?—I have under me directly an office of seven clerks on the revenue and magisterial sides, and an office and two clerks on the Local Fund side. My executive subordinates are two tahsildars, two deputy tahsildars with magisterial powers, and two stationary sub-magistrates. The tahsildars have offices of nine and ten clerks respectively, whilst deputy tahsildars and sub-magistrates have two clerks each. Under the tahsildars are seven revenue inspectors; under them come the village officers, viz., a karnam and village munsiff for each village, with three or four village menials under them. There are 367 villages in the division, which is rather over 500 square miles in extent and contains a population of not quite half a million. On the Local Fund side most of the work is done by the special departments concerned, Local Fund engineer and staff, the District Medical and Sanitary Officer and staff, the Inspector of Schools and staff; but in my capacity as taluk Board President, I have financial control to some extent in the administration of these departments within my division, and I am also expected to inspect the various institutions under the taluk Board's control, and to report and advise. On the magisterial side I deal with nearly 400 original cases per annum, and hear about 80 appeals from sub-magistrates. My duties are the collection of land revenue and the administration of the various accounts and rules comprised in the Land Revenue Code, under the Collector; the administration of criminal justice under the District Magistrate; the general and financial supervision of Local Fund affairs, i.e., roads, schools, hospitals and sanitation; in these matters I am the executive officer of the taluk Board and the subordinate of the President of the District Board. As ex-officio member of the Negapatam municipality, I am expected to take an interest in the affairs of the municipality, and to bring to the notice of the Collector any defects in its management.

3177. Has the separation of the Public Works and Salt Departments from your duties, and the more important position now assigned to the police officer, lowered the status of the Collector?—That is so.

3178. On the whole has the separation of these responsibilities been to the advantage of the district or not?—Looked at from the point of view of efficiency merely, the administration is very likely improved, but looked at from the point of view of the satisfaction of the raiyat, who wants justice quickly and likes to have his order on the spot, the separation has been for the worse. For instance, no doubt we have an extremely good Executive Engineer in Negapatam, and his work is very well done; but suppose I go to a village and find that a bank is being eroded by the river, or that the distribution of water is palpably inequitable, I cannot alter it on the spot as I could if it was under a Collector. On the other hand, the technical work is very much better managed by an Executive Engineer.

3179. Could there be a combination of the two systems—efficiency in the Public Works and at the same time the immediate remedy of grievances such as you speak of about the distribution of water?—It could only be done by putting the Executive Engineer under the Collector.

3180. How would you get at the Collector, who might, and probably would, be 40 or 50 miles away?—He would delegate certain powers to me in trifling matters of the kind I have mentioned, and I would undertake the responsibility. With a Collector whom you can trust and who trusts you, you will take upon yourself to give certain orders which technically the Collector only can give; you then explain your action and report.

3181. What you want then is powers delegated through the Collector to enable you to give orders to some of the subordinates in the Public Works Department?—Yes.

3182. In order that the difficulties which the cultivator meets with may be remedied at once?—Yes.

3183. Does the same thing occur in reference to the Salt Department?—To a certain extent; I do not know so much about the Salt Department.

3184. You talk about the raiyats wanting to get an irrigation dispute settled. Cannot that be done at the present moment speedily?—No.

3185. Why not?—Because you have to refer to the Executive Engineer, who is in control of irrigation as a rule.

3186. Is this again a question of the distribution of water?—Yes, and also there is the fear of a civil suit.

3187. Brought by one raiyat against another?—By one village against another; we very rarely interfere with the internal distribution of water within a village; we let them fight it out, so to speak.

3188. One village will bring a suit against the other?—And against Government.

3189. Could that be avoided by giving you more power?—I do not think that could be avoided except by legislation. There is talk of an Irrigation Act.

3190. You say that all Divisional Officers of two years' experience should have the powers given to Sub-Collectors in the matter of appointments. What powers has the Sub-Collector in the matter of appointments?—He can appoint the whole of his own office, including his head clerk upon Rs. 85, subject to the Collector's veto, and he has charge over his revenue inspectors and all officers beneath them.

3191. He cannot make a new appointment but he can fill a vacancy?—Yes.

3192. You wish that power given to all Divisional Officers of two years' experience?—Yes.

3193. Do you think that at the end of that time a young Civilian or a Deputy Collector would be in a position to fill appointments wisely?—I should admit that he might make mistakes, but I think the good done by giving him power over his subordinates would be greater than the harm done by an occasional mistake.

3194. You would teach him what responsibility means?—Yes.

3195. I understand you want to limit the right of appeal?—Certainly.

3196. By village officers?—I begin with village officers.

3197. Will you give us a concrete instance?—Nearly every village officer who is dismissed and most of the village officers who are suspended, appeal first from me to the Collector, then from the Collector to the Board, and in rare instances to the Government.

3198. Would you be inclined to say that the appeal should end at one officer above the original decider?—Yes.

3199. Have Executive Officers sufficient opportunity of personal contact with the people?—I think they can make a good deal of opportunity, but it is rather at the cost of their office work. Personally I know that my office work lacks in finish because I give up time to interviews and talking with the people.

3200. Do many people come and want to talk to you?—A good many.

3201. Is their number increasing or decreasing?—I think they keep up to a steady average.

3202. About the same from one year to another?—Yes. When I first came there were more, I think, because they wished to get to know me.

3203. And now they know you?—Yes. I have two sets of people; I have what I call interviews, —for people of more or less status, who come to see me at the bungalow, and I have a set time for them; then, I call petitions every day in court and there are always a good many come then.

3204. They come to talk over the affairs of the countryside with you?—The people who interview me come to talk over the affairs of the countryside; the people who come at 12 o'clock bring a definite petition; the petition is read out in their presence so that they may know I have heard it, and unless it is upon some technical matter I tell them at once what I propose to do.

3205. In the case of most of these petitions are you able to give an immediate decision?—Very seldom; in most, I can only say I will look up the papers.

3206. Is that because you have not power to deal with the subject-matter of the petition, or because it is rather a complicated case and requires time for consideration?—Either that, or there may be previous papers on the subject which would require some time for my clerks to look out for me, or it may be some local matter which I must look up personally.

3207. It is that the petition requires consideration for one reason or another?—Yes; in camp sometimes I will walk out in the evening and see what can be done.

3208. When you go out in camp, do you ever publish beforehand a programme of your tour?—I gave orders that that should be done; I am not quite certain whether it has been carried out in my office.

3209. When did you give the orders?—Shortly after I came to the division I remember that I gave orders in my office that notice of my camp should be put up with a notification that I could not promise to adhere to it.

3210. Would it not be a matter of great convenience to the people of your district?—Yes.

3211. In future could you not only give instructions for such a desirable thing, but also see that the instructions are carried out. I suppose it might be published?—I believe it is published.

3212. In the local papers?—I could not give notice for that more than a week beforehand; circumstances are frequently arising—a plague scare, or a special criminal case to investigate, or some breach in the river, and it would be very dangerous to post my programme more than a week beforehand.

3213. You think it cannot be done?—Not beyond putting it up on the office wall, I think.

3214. That would not be much use to the people of a village 40 or 50 miles away?—I could also send notice to the village where I was going.

3215. Do you do that?—No; that might be done.

3216. Would it not lead to a closer intercourse between you and the people of the district if they knew they might expect you at a particular date?—Yes, it would be a good idea.

3217. What language is spoken in your district?—Tamil.

Mr. C. I. H.
Johnson.
26 Nov., 1907.

Mr. C. T. H.
Johnson.

26 Nov., 1907.

3218. Do you know it well?—I can understand almost anything, and I can make myself understood; I do not pretend to talk fluently.

3219. Have you been very much moved about, in the course of your service?—Not very much.

3220. In the various sub-districts you have been in charge of do they generally speak Tamil or Telugu?—I have only been a year and two months in Telugu districts; the rest of the time I have been in Tamil; ever since December 1903 I have been in the same district.

3221. Therefore you have been able to get a good knowledge of the division and of the people in the division?—Yes.

3222. Have you been more stationary than most Assistants?—Slightly more so, but I think most Divisional Officers manage to put in two years, except in one or two divisions.

3223. Is two years a time in which they will get to know anything like a considerable proportion of a population of half a million of people?—No considerable proportion; you can get to know representative people all over the place.

3224. You have 367 villages?—Yes.

3225. How many of those villages have you been in in your four years?—I cannot say exactly how many; I have been within a mile or two of nearly all, so that the people would know that I was there.

3226. So that you have practically been able to visit all your villages?—People have had an opportunity of seeing me in person without going to any great trouble.

3227. But only once in each village?—I tour pretty constantly at certain fixed points; it is so arranged that I get within five miles of almost every village within the year.

3228. But it would take you one year to get round it?—I get round about every six months.

3229. How long did it take you to get round the whole division when you were first appointed?—A year to get round it properly.

3230. Therefore, unless you are kept for some considerable time in your division for the purposes of government you cannot be brought very closely into touch with the people of the division?—Not under two years certainly; that is the reason I specified two years.

3231. Do you make any suggestions—beyond points of detail—as to the way in which you might be taken more out of your office and placed more closely in touch with the people of the district?—My chief idea on the whole is that we should be given less office work; that is very largely a matter of detail in the way of reducing returns, registers, and so forth.

3232. You think there is an excessive number of returns?—Yes.

3233. Dealing with what?—They deal with almost every conceivable thing.

3234. How often have they to be submitted?—Some yearly; some oftener.

3235. Are there a large number of these returns with which you yourself are not, and cannot be, personally familiar?—Yes.

3236. Which you have to take on trust from one or other of your subordinates?—Yes.

3237. Would that amount to 50 per cent. of these returns?—I should think so, that is to say speaking of all the details; but in most of the returns there is something that I understand; there is one column or one particular figure which I look at which is interesting to me; the rest is more or less of no interest to me.

3238. Here is a statement of leave granted by the tahsildar to tahuk peons; do you know anything about them—is it important that you should know anything about them?—Not if you have a decent tahsildar; you might find that he was giving too much leave.

3239. But do you look at the returns of that particular thing?—Yes; I look to see if one peon, for instance, has been appearing in the column too often.

3240. Are there a great number of these returns required from you by the Board of Revenue which might usefully be taken on trust from one or other of your subordinates?—I should think it probable that some might be weeded out altogether; but of course I speak as a subordinate and not as the officer calling for them.

3241. But from your point of view as a District Officer, a considerable number of these might be abolished?—I should hope so.

3242. Will you put in a list of those which in your judgment might go?—Yes.

3243. Do you have to make loans for agricultural purposes?—There are hardly any loans in my division—not more than two or three.

3244. Are they made by you?—Some by me, some by the tahsildar; I think there have only been two or three in the course of the four years; they are not popular; I do not think they are needed really; it is a deltaic district.

3245. Have you any power to remit revenue in the case of distress?—Yes, I do nearly all that work.

3246. You remit revenue on wet crops?—Yes.

3247. You have no power to remit on dry crops?—No.

3248. Could such a power be usefully delegated to you?—In my present division there are very few dry crops. Speaking for my former districts, I should think that if the methods were somewhat simplified it might be usefully done.

3249. Did you come across cases in which scarcity was confined to a village area, or even two or three individuals—in which you might have relieved substantial hardship had you had power to remit in the case of dry crops?—I think so.

3250. Is the present system rather too complicated?—My impression is that Collectors will not recommend the remission of dry crops if they can possibly help it, because it is too complicated and requires too much work.

3251. Not because of a probably excessive zeal on the part of a subordinate which would seriously endanger the collections of the sub-division?—It would have to be done by special officers; I do not think any Divisional Officer could do it straight away.

3252. Even in cases of small remissions?—If it was a small matter any Divisional Officer might do it; I was thinking it would be rather dangerous to let a young fellow just in charge of a division remit half a lakh straight away.

3253. Subject to some limit and to a simplification of method, would it be advantageous if they had power to remit on dry crops?—I think it would be advantageous if they were allowed simply to say that in such and such a village the crops were very bad and they might have 25 or 50 or 75 per cent. remission.

3254. Would that often save hardship?—Very considerable hardship.

3255. When you go on tour do you require the inhabitants of a village or of your district (no doubt upon payment) to provide transport?—There is nothing in the way of levy. The cartmen are generally perfectly willing to come for the pay I give them.

3256. The police officer also tours?—Yes.

3257. The Collector tours?—Yes.

3258. And sometimes you get an Inspector-General touring?—Yes.

3259. Did you ever find that the constant touring through a district of officials becomes a hardship, or might become a hardship, to the inhabitants?—Not as a general thing. Occasionally one village gets rather a succession of them; there may happen for instance to be a big public work going on, and the village may get rather tired of touring officers coming.

3260. Does that interfere in the way of rendering them less likely to meet yourself and the Sub-Divisional Officers?—It is only a temporary irritation whilst the special circumstances continue.

3261. In your division would it be possible for you to get together an Advisory Council which would be of advantage to you?—I do not see exactly on what points an Advisory Council would be consulted upon which I do not consult local opinion as it is; as it is, I have my taluk Board; I know most of the influential and typical gentlemen of the place, and in matters of local interest I do already consult them.

3262. You not only go into one particular village, but when you are on tour you go into various villages and you see the principal inhabitants?—I think I may say that I know all the people whose advice would really be of any importance; I might almost say that I know them personally.

3263. You do not call them together as a body, but you see them repeatedly?—We have our taluk Board meeting, and that Board includes the majority of such gentlemen already.

3264. How many are there on a taluk Board?—It varies in different taluk Boards; my number is 14.

3265. How many villages would a taluk Board represent?—The taluk Board is supposed to be representative of the whole of the division.

3266. The whole of your division?—Yes.

3267. I thought there were two taluks in each division?—Yes, but it is called the taluk Board although it is for the whole division. These gentlemen meet monthly, and, as it is, if there is anything I want to ask anybody about, I do so.

3268. Then with regard to questions such as minor irrigation works, grazing lands, roads, village schools, sanitation, and so on, you think that you get at present from your taluk Board all the information that you would get from a somewhat larger Advisory Council?—I could do it; I do not say that I do; I get some.

3269. You might get more but it might not be such valuable advice?—As it is, it is some bother to these gentlemen to come up to the taluk Board meeting; if they had two separate meetings, an Advisory Council meeting and a taluk Board meeting, for one division, it would be practically identical people on the two bodies, and it would mean two separate meetings instead of one.

3270. Suppose you had such a Council and the members were drawn not merely from the land-holding class, but from other classes, do you think there would be anything in the system of caste to prevent them meeting and sitting side by side in the Council?—As it is we have Sudras, Brahmans, and Mahomedans, and occasionally Christians, all sitting together side by side.

3271. Quite happily?—Quite happily.

3272. (Mr. Hitchens.) How often does the taluk Board meet?—Once a month.

3273. How are the members selected?—They are nominated by the Divisional Officer, recommended by the Collector, confirmed by Government.

3274. Are all those stages necessary?—No. It would suffice that they should be recommended by the Divisional Officer and confirmed by the Collector.

3275. What exactly does a taluk Board do?—The taluk Board has financial control over roads, schools, hospitals, and sanitation, and spends the money. As to roads, the work is actually done by a Local Fund man, the schools by the Education Department, and the hospitals and sanitation are also under the control of the District Medical and Sanitary Officer; but I, as Executive Officer, have to visit these institutions and report on them, and generally keep in touch with the specialist officers.

3276. Practically you have no official subordinate to you quâ President of the taluk Board?—I have a Local Fund office, and my tahsildars are also members of the taluk Board and carry out certain executive orders.

3277. Do the members of the Board do anything?—We put them on for special work. I ask one gentleman to look after a school, for instance; nearly all the roads are under special supervision for the report of certain members.

3278. Do you find that in practice they take an interest in the work?—They take a great interest in their roads; one gentleman takes a great interest in the schools of his village.

3279. Do they raise points at the meetings of the Board?—Occasionally I have been over-ruled, for instance as to the alignment of a road; my tahsildar and I took one point of view and the taluk Board over-ruled us—and they were probably right.

3280. (Mr. Dutt.) You mentioned that the work of the taluk Board is really done by officers from other departments; the Boards keep a sort of financial control over the whole work, and provide the funds, but the practical work is done by officers of other departments?—Yes.

3281. The schools are inspected by the Education Department, and so on?—Yes.

3282. Would it be an improvement if you undertook to inspect your own schools through your own officers, appointing your own inspectors or sub-inspectors?—I think at the present stage of affairs it would be very much better if the Education Department were made provincial and relieved from the control of the taluk Board altogether. I would put all schools under the Education Department; because at present I consider that the Local Boards are out of sympathy with what they believe to be the present policy of the Government of India. They believe the present policy of the Government of India to be to promote primary education and decrease secondary education in quantity, while improving it in quality. The Local Boards represent the monied, educated, and land-owning classes; they are not really in favour of increased primary education, because it makes labour more difficult to handle; they are not in favour of a reduction of lower secondary education, because they like to have the lower secondary schools in their hands, those being the schools to which men of their type send their children; the reduction in number of their lower secondary schools will hit them in that way. They are sceptical about the improvement in quality. So that, on the whole, the Local Board as a class, that is to say not merely as representing the people, but as representing the class which it does actually represent, is opposed to what they believe to be the present policy of the Government of India in education. Therefore things would work smoothly and with less friction if the Education Department was made provincial, and did the whole work of education, and merely took advice from us.

3283. As a matter of fact, do you find that your taluk Board does not take sufficient interest in primary education?—The individual members of the Board take practically none; it is the secondary course in which they take an interest.

3284. The suggestion has been made that the primary schools might be placed under the Boards, and secondary schools might be taken over by the Education Department; do you think that that sort of thing would be feasible or advisable?—So far as sympathy goes, you might put it the opposite way round; if the Board take an interest personally in any schools, it is in the secondary ones—the sort of schools to which gentlemen of that class send their boys, and at which they themselves have been educated.

3285. If the whole of the schools are taken away from the taluk Boards would anything be gained by giving over a certain fund to the Board, taking it back and giving it to the Education Department; could not the funds be given to the Education Department?—You might make an apportionment; you could find out what apportionment ought to be made; so much money could be taken from the cess and given to that department.

Mr. C. I. H.
Johnson.

Mr. C T. H.
Johnson.

26 Nov., 1907.

3286. So that education would be removed altogether from the Self-Government Act as one of the purposes for which the Boards were created? —Yes. Under the present system of Boards we have sanitation, roads, schools, and hospitals; that is to say we have various objects scrambling for money at the time of the budget. Now, education and sanitation, being represented by officers in Madras, generally scramble rather better than roads, which are only represented locally. People sometimes think that if it was not for these schools, with which they are not in sympathy, they would have better roads.

3287. Roads you said are constructed by an officer of the Local Fund?—Yes.

3288. Is he a man paid by you or by the District Board?—By the District Board.

3289. And his services are placed under you?—No; he is a co-ordinate officer with me; he is under the District Collector; I am only a Divisional Officer.

3290. He is not under the Public Works Department?—No.

3291. Does he hold a pensionable appointment?—No, he has a Provident Fund.

3292. You said that you generally meet most of the men that you would meet if an Advisory taluk Board were formed?—I think so.

3293. Have you had many occasions to consult them in matters outside the range of the District Self-Government Act; have you had as many occasions to consult them in other matters as you would have had if an Advisory Board had been formed?—I try to.

3294. In other matters—famine and plague relief measures, etc.—do you have as many occasions to consult them as if an Advisory Board had been formed for that purpose?—I do not know much about famine, because we do not have it in the delta tract. As to remissions, I am able to inspect so many fields myself that I feel practically as if I had done it all myself; and as it has to be done by valuing the crops under a specific rule there is no occasion for consultation.

3295. But with regard to the extent of loss caused by any calamity?—I have had a good deal of experience in these matters; I have been on remission work seven years and I think I might almost say that I can value a crop as well as the raiyat.

3296. You do not think that that advice would be of any value to you?—Not now, but when I was younger possibly.

3297. In plague measures, as to inoculation or examination of women or segregation of patients, would their advice be of value to you?—There again, it comes under the taluk Board; if any question arises I know exactly what gentlemen I have to consult, as it is; I could give you names at once.

3298. So that you cannot think of anything in which an Advisory Board would be of any use to you?—Not as distinct from the taluk Board; that is to say in the taluk Board I have already the material.

3299. Can you tell me if local opinion is generally consulted by officers of your standing to the same extent as it would be if an Advisory Board had been formed?—I think so, probably.

3300. Generally?—Probably. There are one or two junior officers who have not realised the advantage of this, but you can use your taluk Board, I consider, for what you want.

3301. You have spoken of the constitution of your taluk Board and described how the members are nominated. Is there not a provision in the Act that in certain cases members could be elected by village unions?—I believe there is.

3302. Is that provision utilised in any taluk in the province to your knowledge?—Not to my knowledge.

3303. All the members of all the taluks are appointed by the Government on your nomination?—In my district, yes.

3304. To your knowledge all the members of all the taluk Boards in the Presidency are appointed by Government?—So far as I know, yes.

3305. Would it be a useful plan to make a small sub-committee of, say, two members for education, another sub-committee of two members for roads, a committee of two members for preparing road schemes, another for preparing the budget, and so on?—I am more in favour of taking one particular man for one particular road or school of which he knows the circumstances.

3306. You find that answer better?—Yes; a sub-committee very rarely meets and reports.

3307. You would not mind consulting two gentlemen if you found it might lead to good results?—I have done so.

3308. But you do not make them into regular sub-committees; you simply tell them off to do the work?—I request them to see to the matter.

3309. You said that a great part of the year you are out on tour?—About 90 days in the first half of the year, and the prescribed 75 days in the second half of the year.

3310. That is 5½ months; all the time that you are touring, how is the criminal work done?—I endeavour as far as possible to meet the convenience of my clients and the local bar; the result is that my returns do not look very pretty, because sometimes I have to postpone a case until I return from tour and so on. On the whole the local bar and myself work very amicably.

3311. But your divisional work suffers to some extent?—Slightly. I may say that mine is a small division; I could not do that in a big division; some are 2,000 square miles, some larger than that.

3312. Do you try all the criminal cases in your division?—No; the biggest cases of all are investigated by sub-magistrates and tried by a stationary judge.

3313. But you try those cases that are triable by a First Class Magistrate?—They all come to me.

3314. Have you any First Class Magistrates under you?—No.

3315. Have you any Second Class Magistrates under you?—Yes, four.

3316. Do they dispose of all cases that can be tried by a Second Class Magistrate?—Occasionally I may take a case of special interest on my own file.

3317. Do you think that the parties and witnesses concerned in these cases are put to inconvenience, because they have to follow you from place to place when you are touring?—In my smaller division there is no particular inconvenience; in bigger divisions, where I have been before, they were put to inconvenience at times.

3318. When the police are investigating a case do you receive any sort of report from the police in important cases?—Yes.

3319. In dacoity cases or in murder cases?—I get a few reports; the progress of the case is reported from time to time.

3320. Not weekly?—According to the case.

3321. It is part of your duty to peruse those reports?—Yes.

3322. And to find out what view the police take while the investigation is going on?—Yes, I try to watch them.

3323. Do you sometimes send out instructions to the police while the case is under investigation with regard to the course of the investigation?—Not often. I know the Assistant Superintendent of Police personally, and I sometimes write demiofficially to him or see him in an important case.

3324. And when the case is complete, and the police have not sent up the case, do you sometimes direct the police to send up the case?—If the case is to be tried, a charge-sheet is sent up.

3325. But when the police have not sent up a case and you think it ought to be judicially tried, do you sometimes direct the police to send up the case for trial?—I have done so. The rule is that if the police think a case is not to be tried it is to be referred. There is a slight controversy (which is not yet settled) as to whether, when the police have referred a case, I can call upon them to send up a charge sheet.

3326. Then, as a matter of fact, you are acquainted with many of the facts of the case before the case comes up for trial?—I know something of the course of the investigation.

3327. You said that you would allow appeals only to one authority above the authority who has appointed the appellant, and you would not allow appeals any further?—Yes.

3328. What are your objections?—That the present system of one appeal after another causes a great weakening of authority.

3329. In what way?—You say to the karnam "I have dismissed you," and he says, "I will appeal," and he doesn't mind.

3330. So you want to stop the appeals in order to strengthen the hands of the executive?—Yes.

3331. (Sir Frederic Lely.) From what you say, your taluk Board can scarcely be called representative at all?—It does not represent the uneducated and labouring class.

3332. It does not represent the great mass of the population?—No.

3333. It is nominated to begin with, and it is nominated on the basis of representation (so far as it really represents anything) of the higher classes?—Yes.

3334. Suppose you shift the basis of representation lower down, and take the village; would the general feeling of the village not be in favour of primary education?—If you could take a ballot vote, I think it would be in favour of primary education.

3335. As a matter of fact, do not the villagers as a rule take the initiative in establishing a school?—I do not think so.

3336. We understand from the Director of Public Instruction that as a rule the villagers call in a master and establish him and he opens his school; I understood that to be the ordinary course; and then they apply for a grant-in-aid. They are usually aided schools, are they not, in the villages?—I cannot say what the proportion is between the two.

3337. Still, the school is established in the village with the full consent of the majority of the population of the village?—Yes.

3338. Would it be feasible, instead of handing over the schools to the Education Department entirely, to entrust the school entirely to the villagers?—That is to say, to have aided schools only? I am very doubtful on the point.

3339. Not only aided schools, but schools where the villagers should be called upon to supply the housing entirely and should have full control over the master?—Unless you have board schools there would be no advance of education amongst the backward classes and in the more backward districts.

3340. That is another point, as to the backward villages; I am speaking of the ordinary village; the schools would do just as well as they do now at any rate, and it would have the additional advantage of evoking more local sentiment?—If they are under the direct management of the villagers themselves you mean?

3341. Yes.—It would depend very largely upon whether there was a good man in the village, some man to lead the movement and to look after the school—a man who would be manager of the school; you must have some definite man as manager.

3342. Would you advise trying the experiment in the better class of villages to begin with, where you could ensure the more intelligent agency that you speak of?—I should think it might be tried in one or two.

3343. Would you be in favour of developing local self-government in the form of intra-village action?—I do not think the village is quite a large enough unit.

3344. Take another branch of public work; take Public Works proper. Suppose a village needs a new well; how would it be to hand over five hundred rupees or whatever the estimate might be to the villagers and tell them to dig their well for themselves?—Again, unless you have some good and reliable man, the village community has not sufficient sympathy; they would squabble over the profit to be made out of the money.

3345. No doubt at first, but do you not think they would gradually come to see that it was to their common interest to build the well properly?—I think it would require a radical change in something or other before that came about. At present the village community is disintegrating; even in the short time I have been out, there is less unity of feeling in the village community than there was 10 years ago.

3346. Still, they live together and the village well is an object of common interest?—There are the Panchamas, the Sudras and the Brahmans; if there was only one well, they would quarrel which should have it.

3347. But you only have one well as it is?—Sometimes you have none; often you have only a tank; sometimes there is one well and the rest of the people get their water from a channel.

3348. The local taluk Board, I suppose, would only be responsible, as a rule, for supplying one well?—Yes.

3349. At present is such a case as this possible; the Local Board sanction the construction of a well in the village, and it sends the Local Fund Engineer, or whoever it may be, to arrange for the digging and building of it; it falls in afterwards through some cause; are the villagers to be allowed to say, "We are not responsible for that; it is not our business; it is the work of the Local Fund Engineer"?—In my division the making of a well is generally entrusted either to the village munsiff or to some respectable local gentleman; as a rule he builds up a well, worth Rs. 150, according to our own measurements and form, for about Rs. 85.

3350. Would you also (on the subject of roads) give a land-owner money to make or maintain a road through his estate?—If the people say that they want a road, we sometimes take a small contribution from them. In the case of the small branch roads affecting only one village, at present we only give them a nominal maintenance allotment, which will not really keep up the roads, and we expect the villagers to supply the rest.

3351. In the case of a land-owner who has an estate through which a mile of road runs, would you give him a grant to spend on his own responsibility?—We would make him a contractor if he would take up the work as a contractor for that piece of road.

3352. Do you consider that the people who have or fancy they have a grievance prefer as a rule to send you their petition by post?—No.

3353. They prefer to bring it to you?—Yes.

3354. You have a fixed time to receive petitions?—Yes.

3355. And although you may not be able to give an answer to the petitioner at the time, that does not mean that he is dissatisfied?—No; he has the pleasure of hearing his petition read out, and he knows that it has been heard.

3356. That is at the expense, you say, of your office work?—No doubt.

3357. Can most Divisional Officers find time for an audience every day?—If they are not expected to reach too high a standard in office work and reports.

3358. Can the Collector do that sort of thing?—It would depend very much on the district; some districts are harder worked than others.

Mr. C. T. H.
Johnson.

Mr. C. I. H.
Johnson.
26 Nov., 1907.

3359. How long do you stay at one camp as a rule?—From three days to a week as a rule.

3360. You say remissions go up for Government sanction. Virtually I suppose they are made on the report of the local officer?—Practically it is the Divisional Officer who does remission work.

3361. It is practically his department and the decision has to be based on what he says?—Yes.

3362. (Sir Steyning Edgerley.) Can you give us a slight sketch of a day's work?—I get up about 6.30 to 7; I go to the office and do scriptory work—office work—until about 11. At 12 I go to the office to my court; I then call petitions and I try the cases posted for the day, magisterial and revenue; the time occupied varies very much from day to day according to the length of the case; you never can tell exactly how many witnesses you will have; sometimes I get away at 3, sometimes it goes on till 5; then I come back to the house, and there will probably be a few papers brought to me, up to tea time. I generally manage to get my exercise at tennis or golf or something in the afternoon after 5.

3363. In the morning you are always at the office?—I was giving you a day at headquarters. Sometimes in headquarters I go out at once, and from 6.30 to 8 I inspect, say, municipal encroachments, or in camp I inspect irrigation works, with a view to the settlement of irrigation disputes and so on.

3364. From 12 to 3 you are practically occupied in magisterial work?—From 12 to 3 I should say is the average; the two hours from 3 to 5 are occupied in, you may say, odds and ends, all sorts of things,—getting up matters in relation to which you have been behindhand before.

3365. Then on tour?—On tour, you have rather less magisterial work. As I was explaining, you consult the convenience of parties; therefore you do inspection in the morning and your scriptory work in the afternoon.

3366. Do you reckon your magisterial work to be specially heavy?—No.

3367. How far do you see the villagers while you are doing the jamabandi?—I do not see many, because as a rule they have come at the time of calling the daily petitions. They do not wait for jamabandi; and my point is that the reason so much work now is not taken at jamabandi is that we now do not mark so many papers to be settled at jamabandi; we try to dispose of them at the time.

3368. You said you thought it would be very advisable if all these accounts and returns were scrutinised by a competent Committee with a view to reduction?—Yes.

3369. Do you remember that having been done since you have been connected with the district?—No, I do not remember anything radical being done; a few accounts have been altered, and so on.

3370. There has never been what one may call an effort on a big scale?—I remember none since I became a Divisional Officer.

3371. The idea of the last witness in suggesting Advisory Councils was something very like the idea of what was done on a higher scale at the Mysore Darbar. Do you think you would get anything out of that, if they held an assembly once or twice a year?—Perhaps once a year you might hear of something, but as a rule they would simply bring out something in the nature of an irrigation dispute or something that they personally wanted.

3372. It would be very difficult to keep order?—You could keep order, but you would only hear of things that you knew of already in your official routine; I do not think you would hear of many new things.

3373. You think it would be representative of particular grievances and not of the general wants of the people?—I think so; I think it would be the same thing over again.

3374. So that really your idea of facilitating your work would be the appointment of a Committee to cut up the returns and accounts and put them on to a modern basis?—Yes, and also the various other matters of routine of which I have given a slight sketch in my statement.

3375. If that were done, you think you would get sufficient relief to get in touch with the people?—I cannot say how far the Committee would go.

3376. If it decided on the lines of your suggestions you think that would give you sufficient relief?—If it did what I hope, I think it would give sufficient relief.

3377. (Mr. Meyer.) You speak of nothing having been done in the way of the reduction of reports and returns; was there not a considerable reduction in 1897?—I do not think it affected Divisional Officers very much.

3378. Did it not rather affect the Tanjore district?—I think it helped the Collector and the Collectorate.

3379. Did it not extend to the Sub-Divisional Officer?—I do not think it made any appreciable difference to the Sub-Divisional Officer.

3380. However, during the last few years there has been no attempt to abolish these returns?—Not that I know of.

3381. Are they all returns prescribed by the Board of Revenue and the provincial Government or are a number prescribed by the Collector?—A few I think are prescribed by the Collector.

3382. Those he could abolish if he thought fit?—I do not think there are many, and I doubt whether any of those could be abolished; I can only think of one, and that is about encroachments.

3383. Then as to the general revenue forms; was there not a general alteration of these forms in about 1898 or 1899?—This list is a revised list, but I still think it could be cut down.

3384. The village accounts to your mind are too complicated?—No doubt.

3385. You say there are about 26 village accounts; is it necessary to have so many, for administrative purposes and statistical purposes?—I know very little about statistics; they are managed from above; but for administrative purposes I think they might be reduced considerably.

3386. And as regards the taluk office accounts, do you think the same?—I think probably some could be reduced.

3387. You spoke of the desirability of giving the District Magistrate more control over special departments. Has he not already control over the Superintendent of Police, which is one of the departments you mentioned?—I spoke of the greater independence of the police.

3388. Do you consider that the police are undesirably independent of the District Magistrate?—I think they might be more directly under the District Magistrate.

3389. The District Superintendent is subordinate to the District Magistrate in matters affecting the prevention of crime and the peace of the district, but is not so subordinate to him in the matter of the organisation and discipline of the police force?—Yes.

3390. And you would bring him under the District Magistrate as regards that?—As regards the organisation and management of the force also, at any rate in some matters.

3391. Then as to the forest officer; do you consider that he is too independent?—No, I have not mentioned him.

3392. The forest officer takes, more or less, the technical matters independently of the Collector; and is his assistant in regard to the rest?—Yes.

3393. You would like the Public Works Engineer to be in the same position as the forest officer?—Yes.

3394. Are there not sub-engineers and overseers throughout the district?—Yes.

3395. You would like the sub-engineer in Negapatam, if there is one, otherwise the overseer, to stand to you in the same position as the District Engineer stands to the Collector?—No.

3396. Then would you desire that the District Engineer should be under the Collector and that the overseer and the Sub-Divisional Officer should be under the Executive Engineer?—Yes.

3397. The Collector has no direct charge in any part of the district?—No.

3398. The whole district is divided into divisions?—Yes.

3399. Do you consider that the Divisional Officer should have larger control over the repairs of tanks and so forth?—Yes.

3400. How would you propose to bring that about?—If the Executive Engineer were under the Collector I should feel justified in matters of emergency in requesting the Sub-Divisional Officer to do such and such work.

3401. Is not that practically what I put to you—that if the Collector is superior to the District Engineer you would similarly be able to give directions to the local subordinate of the engineer?—No; I would suggest no further powers than, for instance, with the Assistant Superintendent of Police. I feel justified in asking the Assistant Superintendent of Police, or suggesting to him, to do such and such work, because he is also a fellow subordinate with me of the Collector's; I have also power at present to issue direct orders in some matters to Police Inspectors. I do not now feel justified in doing that sort of thing with the Sub-Divisional Officer or the overseer of the Public Works Department.

3402. If it were put under the Collector the local arrangements would follow as a matter of course?—Yes.

3403. Are the Tanjore divisions especially heavy as compared with other divisions in which you have been?—My impression is that the revenue work is heavy.

3404. But not the magisterial work?—The magisterial work is average.

3405. Is it your usual experience that a Divisional Officer devotes three hours a day to magisterial work?—Yes.

3406. That is including appeals?—Including all kinds of work.

3407. The trial of original cases and the hearing of appeals from Second and Third Class Magistrates?—Yes.

3408. You desire a larger power of appointment for Divisional Officers generally?—Yes.

3409. You would go up to what?—Rs. 50 or something like that. I would give all Divisional Officers of over two years' experience the same power as that which is now enjoyed by the Sub-Collector.

3410. Speaking generally, what pecuniary limit would that be. He appoints his own personal office, and he appoints other people up to Rs. 40.

3411. How about revenue inspectors?—I think they should be under the Divisional Officer.

3412. Should they be appointed by him?—Yes.

3413. Are they posted by him now; is a revenue inspector sent to the Divisional Officer and posted within the division at the Divisional Officer's discretion, or is he appointed by the Collector from firka to firka?—I, as acting Sub-Collector, have all the appointments of revenue inspectors; I forget exactly what is the power of a junior Divisional Officer; I think he can remove an inspector from firka to firka.

3414. But your position as Sub-Collector is by grade seniority?—Yes.

3415. And if you reverted to the position of Head Assistant you would lose powers?—Yes.

3416. Do you consider that the personal grading of Sub-Divisional Officers is a good system?—Yes.

3417. Has it diminished transfers?—Yes.

3418. Would you be prepared to adopt the same system as regards tahsildars, to make their appointments personal and not according to the taluk?—Yes.

3419. Do you consider that the present system of attaching the pay to the taluk causes unnecessary transfers of tahsildars?—I think so sometimes.

3420. You spoke of village officers. You have at present the power of dismissing any village officer?—Yes.

3421. Do I understand you to say that you should have the power of dismissal with no appeal?—With only one appeal to the Collector.

3422. Is there ordinarily more than one appeal now?—In a great many cases there are appeals to the Board of Revenue.

3423. In the case of every village officer you punish there is an appeal?—Almost every village officer, I dismiss appeals.

3424. But suppose you suspend him?—I should say that about 15 per cent. of those suspended for three months or over appeal to the Board.

3425. If you fine him?—In the case of a fine, he hardly ever appeals.

3426. But whatever you do to him in the way of punishment he can appeal to the Collector?—I think in the case of petty fine there is no appeal.

3427. But you say he has a second right of appeal to the Board of Revenue in the case of dismissal; I am trying to get at whether it is only in the case of dismissal or whether there is any other form of punishment under which he is allowed a second appeal to the Board of Revenue.—He does appeal in the case of suspension as a matter of executive practice; sometimes the appeal is rejected on the ground that there is technically no appeal, but sometimes a report is called for.

3428. Is there a standing order which lays down that there is no right of appeal?—I believe so, but I am speaking of executive practice where he does appeal.

3429. And in spite of the standing order, the Board admits the appeal?—I have frequently been called upon to report in such cases, and the appeal is dismissed finally on the ground that there is no appeal.

3430. That is to say, although the matter might have been rejected originally on the ground that the appellant had not the right to a second appeal, you were put to as much trouble as if he had had that right?—I have had to report, yes.

3431. As regards these village officers, over the greater part of the Madras Presidency they are hereditary?—Yes.

3432. They are men who have a considerable standing in their village by reason of their hereditary character?—That standing is not what it used to be.

3433. Should the fact that they are hereditary make any difference in regard to the tenderness with which they are treated in the matter of appeals? Would you treat an hereditary village officer differently from one who was not hereditary?—He certainly should be allowed more consideration, and I think he is allowed more consideration in the district on that ground.

3434. Would you on that ground give him a second appeal, or would you leave his fate entirely in the hands of the Collector?—I would leave his fate in the hands of the Collector.

3435. Although that might involve his family being disgraced and another family coming into the village office?—Yes.

3436. You said that you endeavoured to give notice of your tours and so on; is it not sometimes desirable that you should go to a place without notice, so as to discover exactly how matters stand?—Yes, I do sometimes.

3437. Did you hear the last witness's suggestion as to the reconstitution of taluks?—I only heard

Mr. C. T. H. Johnson.

26 Nov., 1907.

Mr. C. T. H.
Johnson.

26 Nov., 1907

the beginning of his evidence, about giving tahsildars the same powers as Deputy Collectors.

3438. And that you were to convert every tahsildar into a Divisional Officer; that is to say each of the existing Divisional Officers would have charge of a taluk as his division, and the remainder would be filled by moving up the tahsildars as Deputy Collectors, and the present revenue inspectors would in their turn become tahsildars; so that you would have a large increase in the number of divisions, and a great number of petty taluks; what is your opinion of such a scheme?—I think it is unnecessarily expensive.

3439. And would it greatly improve administration?—My first impression is that it would not.

3440. You cannot at present, at any rate, see any merit in it that would be worth the additional expense it would involve?—Not at present.

3441. You said something about dry crop remissions. You are aware of the Madras Revenue Settlement that in the case of dry crops the vicissitudes of seasons are more largely taken into account than in the case of wet crops?—Yes.

3442. Would that not be a ground for treating the dry crops differently?—Yes.

3443. I do not say for giving no remission at all, but for requiring more careful scrutiny in the case of dry crops than in the case of wet crops?—Yes.

3444. Have you any powers of suspension of revenue as apart from remission?—As a Divisional Officer, I do not think I have any powers of suspension.

3445. Cannot you suspend the collection of revenue pending further investigation as to whether there is a case for remission or not?—I have forgotten the latest ruling; my impression is that at present it is in the power of the Collector to do that.

3446. Do you think that that is sufficient, or that in certain cases it might go to the Sub-Divisional Officer?—I think up to Rs. 3,000 it might be with the Divisional Officer.

3447. On wet land, or dry, or both?—On both.

3448. As regards the taluk Board, is there a Vice-president?—Yes.

3449. Who is he generally?—The headquarters tahsildar.

3450. That is to say, he is generally an official?—Yes.

3451. Have you been aware of any non-official Vice-president?—Not personally.

3452. You really think that education would be done more satisfactorily if the taluk and District Boards had nothing to do with it?—Yes, primary education.

3453. Would you give any say in such a case to the Collector or to the Divisional Officer, as such?—I would say that it should still be expected that they would be consulted in matters relating to new departures and so forth by the Education Department.

3454. The whole authority then for creating new schools, or abolishing schools, or altering the status of schools, would rest with the assistant inspector of schools, or the inspectors of schools, or something of that sort?—Yes, but he should be required in all cases to consult the Revenue Department.

3455. Suppose you, as Sub-Divisional Officer, did not agree with the assistant inspector of schools, what would happen?—I would report my point of view to the Collector, and he would give his point of view to the Director of Public Instruction, and the Director of Public Instruction would decide.

3456. Would there be a certain amount of friction over that?—I think there would be less friction than there is at present in the scramble for grants.

3457. Do you not have more power at present as President of the taluk Board than you could possibly have under such a system?—Yes, we have more power. I think it is one of the powers which might be delegated to another department.

3458. You propose to abrogate the executive power and to take the position of an officer who is consultative only?—Yes.

3459. You spoke of the scramble for grants and said that roads suffered from the demand for education. Is there no order that a certain proportion of the taluk income must be laid out on their roads?—Yes.

3460. What proportion is it?—I do not remember at present.

3461. I put it to you that it is 50 per cent. of the land cess plus the income from tolls. Does not that give a guarantee that a large amount of money will be spent on roads?—I am not certain whether it is always carried out, and in any case there is certainly a demand for more roads rather than for more education, as a matter of fact.

3462. But it is for the taluk Board to decide, if they have not enough money to go round, whether they will apply it to roads or whether they will apply it to schools, is it not?—But our budgets are altered by the District Boards and by Government, and the Director of Public Instruction has a final say, about educational matters in Madras, that is to say with Government; whereas there is no one to have a final say in support of roads.

3463. You say your budget is altered by the District Board; in what direction as a rule does the District Board alter your budget?—They say "You shall not spend on this and you must not spend on that"; they transfer money from one head to another.

3464. The taluk Board is represented on the District Board?—Yes.

3465. And you sit as an ex-officio member?—Yes.

3466. So that you can always have your say before the District Board decides one way or the other?—Yes.

3467. You say that the final power rests with the Director of Public Instruction, with regard to education grants; is that so?—I only say that the budget is criticised by the Director of Public Instruction, and his criticisms are forwarded to Government, when final orders are passed.

3468. Then it finally rests with Government?—Yes.

3469. Is it your experience that Government as a rule takes the side of the Director of Public Instruction against the President of the District Board?—I cannot say that.

3470. You have mentioned matters in which you desire that the taluk Board should get rid of their powers. Are there any larger powers that you would like to see given to the taluk Board?—I have put down one or two matters of detail.

3471. But apart from detail is there any general idea on which you would give them larger powers?—I would give them more complete control in financial matters.

3472. In creating appointments and so on?—Yes.

3473. And sanctioning allotments for Public Works?—Yes. Under existing rules a certain number of things have to go up to the District Board for sanction.

3474. Who appoints the members of the taluk Boards now?—The President of the District Board; the nomination is made by the President of the taluk Board; it goes up to the President of the District Board, who nominates to Government; it is then notified in the Gazette.

3475. Does Government still appoint all the members of the taluk Board and select them, or has the power been delegated in any way to the District Board President?—I do not know that exactly; I know it is practically done by the Collector; but a reference on the subject does go up to Government?—Yes.

3476. You would be in favour of the President of the District Board appointing them?—Yes.

3477. Would you go further and allow the taluk Board President to appoint them?—No.

3478. Because they are your colleagues?—I think there should always be a certain amount of supervision by an officer above you.

3479. Take the village panchayat; would you allow the Divisional Officer to appoint their members?—Yes.

3480. How many municipalities are there in your division?—One.

3481. Do you sit on that ex-officio?—Yes.

3482. Are you Chairman of it?—No. There is an elected Chairman.

3483. As regards outside control, all matters connected with correspondence between the municipality and the Government come before you in the first place?—Yes.

3484. Do you have much work of that description?—There are a considerable number of papers.

3485. Would you be in favour of giving the Collector larger powers of supervision over the municipalities, reviewing the administration report or passing the municipal budget and so forth?—I should say that the budgets and the administration reports should still go to Government, but the other matters I have mentioned in my statement might stop with the Collector.

3486. Minor matters of expenditure and so forth?—Yes.

3487. As regards appeals; if you dismiss a taluk Board servant or suspend him, to whom does the first appeal lie?—I think it is to the District Board President.

3488. Not to the taluk Board?—I cannot remember which of the two it is; I know in the case of the District Board the appeal is from the President to the District Board.

3489. From the President acting singly, to the Board as a collective body?—Yes.

3490. Assuming that that is not the case in the taluk Boards, would you be in favour of that?—I think it would be desirable.

3491. Then if the taluk Board confirmed the decision that was taken by its President individually, you would bar any further appeal to the District Board?—Yes. My recollection is that the first appeal is from the President of the taluk Board to the President of the District Board.

3492. Therefore there is no appeal from the individual to the collective body in the case of the taluk Board as there is in the case of the District Board?—I think not.

3493. In the municipality there is?—In the municipality there is an appeal to the Council.

3494. From the decision of the Chairman as an individual?—Yes.

3495. Are the villages in Tanjore and in other Tamil districts rent by factions?—They are very much rent by factions in Tanjore, and to a less extent, but to a considerable degree, in villages in the other districts of which I have had experience.

3496. But especially so in Tanjore?—Especially so.

3497. Would the existence of such factions militate against the administration of matters belonging to the village by a village panchayat?—Very greatly.

3498. In Tanjore and other Tamil districts is there a considerable low-caste population attached to the villages?—Yes.

3499. Do you think that they would get representation on any panchayat?—I think that they would get nothing.

3500. Do you think that the higher castes would take their interests into consideration in the matter of schools for instance?—No. I can quote an instance where the taluk Board had sanctioned a Panchama school in a particular village.

3501. Perhaps you will explain what a Panchama school is?—It is a school for low caste people known as Pariahs or Panchamas; their employers, the high caste people, made so much trouble about the granting of land and the giving of a suitable site, that we finally abandoned it in that village.

3502. Therefore if there was a system of allowing a village to run a school of its own the Panchamas would not come in to it?—Not at all.

3503. They would not be allowed to come in to it?—I think not; I think there would be exceptions; for instance, in South Arcot.

3504. In South Arcot they are on more friendly terms?—Yes, and they have more influence.

3505. Then as regards the liquor shops; the Panchamas are the drinking class?—Yes.

3506. The higher castes as a rule do not drink?—Some Sudras drink. The majority of drinkers are non-caste.

3507. Suppose any matters such as the distribution and location of liquor shops were left to the panchayats would there be danger of the Panchamas being unfairly treated in the way of getting no shops or an insufficient number of shops?—I think there probably would be a danger.

3508. (Chairman.) You said in answer to Sir Steyning Edgerley that if an Advisory Council was started it would be merely a case of repeating old grievances which had been brought up at the jamabandis?—Brought up at the jamabandis and on petitions.

3509. Might it not be an old grievance with a new aspect to it?—I should say that if a Divisional Officer has done his duty the aspects ought all to have been considered.

3510. Not from that point of view, but from the point of view of fresh evidence that might be brought to notice which had not been brought to notice at the jamabandi?—I do not think that anything very much new would come out.

3511. You say that the Sanitary Commissioner being at present overworked causes delay in the execution of important work?—I said probably.

3512. Do you find that somewhere or other these schemes coming up from divisions do stick for a considerable time?—The Negapatnam market works stuck for more than a year; the water works scheme is still sticking.

3513. That was due to the necessity of it passing the Sanitary Board?—I do not know the exact details, but the delay seems to be after the scheme or project has left the Collector.

3514. So far as you can find out that is the place where it sticks, the Sanitary Board?—As far as I can see.

(The witness withdrew.)

Mr. P. B. THOMAS was called and examined.

3515. (Chairman.) There are one or two points, I understand, to which you, as District Superintendent of Police, desire to draw our attention; perhaps you will tell us briefly what they are?—The District Superintendent of Police has not got sufficiently large powers of his own to command the personal influence with his men which he ought to have in his own district. I have practically command of over a thousand men, and I cannot order a man a black mark, which is a very small punishment, without his having the right to appeal to at least one officer over my head. I cannot give a police constable a petty reward of even 8 annas or a rupee on my own responsibility; I cannot say to a man: "I will give you a little reward"; I have to say to him: "I will recommend a reward," even if it is a rupee. I have no power of promotion at all; I cannot promote a police constable to a head constable's appointment at Rs. 14 a month; that all has to be done over my head. I have absolutely no command of any money in the way of secret service, and if I want to send a man on special duty, on any detective work, I have to obtain the money all the way from the Inspector-General's Office in Madras; and if it is a matter of urgency I have to pay it out of my own pocket and trust to recover it afterwards, which is a matter of great correspondence. I have no power of transferring inspectors inside my own district, and I think it is impossible to keep a district in the order in which it should be kept unless both the District Magistrate and the Superintendent of Police together have power to transfer any non-gazetted officer to places where they wish him to go to inside their own district. Those are the points on which I think every District Superintendent ought to be given much larger powers.

3516. What you feel is that the present restrictions upon your powers are such as to prevent you having that influence with your force that a police officer ought to have?—Yes.

3517. And that if you had larger powers conferred upon you it would enable you to prevent and detect crime with greater facility than you can now?—Yes. The present system tends to a dead level of work, and if anything special is demanded of any man by me I have not sufficient authority with the man to make my personal influence as great as it ought to be. In all police work personal influence counts for a great deal.

3518. What is the size of your district?—5,000 square miles.

3519. That is a large area for a single officer to be able to get round?—Yes. I have two Assistants, and the inspection can be done. I do not think I am in a bad position as regards the area of the district in this particular district, but in most districts of Madras it is absolutely impossible to cover the area properly.

3520. Is yours one of the smallest districts?—No, but I have more Assistants than they have in other districts.

3521. What is your district?—South Malabar.

3522. You look upon an area of about 5,000 square miles as the limit that ought to be the area of any District Superintendent?—It depends entirely on the number of Gazetted Assistants supplied to the district. I think a District Superintendent could look over a much bigger area if he were supplied with sufficient Assistants.

3523. Do you think he could personally look over it?—He could personally administer it; he could not personally look over it.

3524. Is that not desirable?—I do not think it is absolutely necessary.

3525. It is not desirable?—It is desirably certainly.

3526. Very desirable?—Certainly.

3527. How long have you been in your present district?—Only three months.

3528. You have about 20 years' service?—Over 20 years.

3529. How many districts have you been in during that time?—About five.

3530. How long does it take you to become fully acquainted with a district of the size of your present one?—Very nearly two years.

3531. Does the system of leave necessitate an increased number of transfers?—It causes them; I do not think it need necessitate them.

3532. Is there any way in which constant transfers could be avoided?—Yes. I think in cases where a man gets an unpopular district or undesirable district he frequently takes leave after he has been there a short time with the idea of escaping from the district; when he comes back he is probably posted to any district that happens to be vacant at the time, and is not sent back to his original district as he ought to be. In many cases where a man is in a district that he likes and goes away on leave for a year, when he comes back he is put into the first available district, and is not sent back to the other district, although he may have been there for only two years before.

3533. Could any system be devised by which men could be kept longer in their district?—Very simply. I think it ought to be an understood thing that when an officer is posted to a district he should spend at least six years in the district, and that arrangements should be made to fill his place when he is away not by a permanent appointment; it should be understood that a man put in to act for him should give way to him when he came out again.

3534. Could that be done by employing some of the senior Assistants?—There are always a certain number of Superintendents of the standing of a senior Assistant who are bound to go on acting for two or three years until they become full Superintendents; there are always four or five gentlemen of that kind, and they might be relied upon to fill these vacancies perfectly satisfactorily and without inconvenience.

3535. That would give some relief in the matter of transfers to the greater number of Superintendents and Assistant Superintendents throughout the Presidency?—To Superintendents certainly.

3536. Is there any general delegation of powers which your Inspector-General could hand on to you or to your subordinates that you would like to have?—None beyond those I have been speaking about as to punishments and rewards and a certain amount of money being placed at my disposal. There is one smaller point which I think has not been mentioned. At all sub-divisions the Assistant Superintendents have small offices of their own in their ranges; those ought to be administered altogether, and the Assistant Superintendents might work with the headquarters offices; that would give the Superintendent greater freedom of action, because he would be able to detail them all to special work better than he can now, and it would relieve the Superintendent and District Office of a great deal of unnecessary correspondence.

3537. (Sir Steyning Ederley.) Would not your system of reposting to a district on return from leave be rather hard on individual officers? Take it in this way: I suppose in every Presidency there are 8 or 10 good districts, and perhaps some middling, and then some very bad ones?—Yes.

3538. Suppose your officer goes on leave from a very bad one; will it not have knocked his constitution to pieces very often?—But the districts are not bad because they are unhealthy as a rule; they are bad because they are unpopular in other ways.

3539. Have you not some unhealthy districts in Madras?—We have some unhealthy, and some of the most unhealthy are the most popular.

3540. You do not think that is an objection?—No.

3541. (Mr. Meyer.) I suppose your idea would be carried out if it were arranged that an officer spent from three to five years in the same district; you would not keep him in the same district for the greater part of his service?—I would not keep him in any district more than four or five or six years, because I think he tends to get slack after that, but up to that time I think he ought to be kept there.

3542. You spoke about giving much larger disciplinary powers in respect of punishments to the District Superintendent?—Yes.

3543. And also to the District Magistrate?—To the District Magistrate only with regard to the transfer of inspectors inside the district.

3544. But as to punishment?—I would not give any powers whatever in ordinary internal matters of police discipline.

3545. Any cases that the District Superintendent could not dispose of as regards discipline would go, as at present, to the Deputy Inspector-General?—Yes.

3546. (Mr. Dutt.) In the case of slight punishments you would allow no appeal?—In the case of a punishment as light as a black mark I would allow no appeal.

3547. And in the case of a small fine?—We are not allowed to fine at all now.

3548. You cannot impose a fine on any constable?—No.

3549. Or a head constable?—No.

3550. In the case of transfers what is the recommendation you would make?—I alluded to the transfers of inspectors. I think that transfers of inspectors inside a district should rest with the District Magistrate in consultation with the District Superintendent. That would make the influence of the District Magistrate and the Superintendent very much stronger and would prevent a great deal of correspondence.

3551. Do you have to take your orders now from the Deputy Inspector-General?—The transfers of inspectors of police depend on the Deputy Inspector-General's judgment.

3552. What is the result of having a black mark against a man?—If he has an accumulation of black marks it affects any increment of good conduct pay which he may have earned previously, and a certain number entail his dismissal.

3553. With the exception of the black mark, in every other case of punishment you would allow one appeal?—Yes.

3554. (Chairman.) Does the necessity of getting sanction from higher authority to punish by suspension or reduction of pay cause much correspondence?—No it does not. If I punish a man with a black mark, in practice it is practically a matter of course that the black mark will be confirmed; but the fact that I cannot do it without appeal does weaken my influence very much with my men.

3555. It is a question of prestige, not of correspondence?—Yes.

(The witness withdrew.)

Mr. P. B. Thomas.

26 Nov., 1907.

Dewan Bahadur P. RAJARATNA MUDELIAR was called and examined.

3556. (Chairman.) What has been your occupation hitherto?—I was a Government servant until 1905. I was tahsildar, Deputy Collector, Personal Assistant to the Salt Commissioner, Head Sherishtadar of the Board of Revenue, Secretary to the Board of Revenue in the Settlement Department, and, finally, Inspector-General of Registration.

3557. Compared with other provinces, are the Collectors' charges in Madras very large?—Yes.

3558. And you think they might with advantage be made smaller?—Yes.

3559. That would increase the number of Collectors and Divisional Officers?—Yes.

3560. And of course of the officers under them?—Yes.

3561. The raiya system necessitates a greater demand on the time on the part of the Divisional Officers than is the case under the zemindari system?—Yes.

3562. Is the demand on the time of Divisional Officers now so great that they are losing touch with the people in their districts?—Decidedly.

3563. Have you noticed during the time you have been in Government Service an increase or decrease of this?—An increase.

3564. A decided increase?—Yes.

3565. Is that due in any way to the lack of linguistic knowledge on the part of the officers, or is it due to the necessity of keeping up with the great mass of correspondence that they have, or is it due perhaps to both?—Want of linguistic knowledge of course is confined only to European officers, but, as regards the work, that has enormously increased in the past 20 years owing to the number of fiscal and special laws that have had to be passed for the protection of the revenue.

3566. In the case of those who are natives of the country, you find they too are also divorced from the people whose affairs they administer?—Yes.

3567. And the divorce in their case is quite as noticeable as in the case of European officers?—To a great extent.

3568. Some loss of administrative power is occasioned by the constant transfer of administrative officers from charge to charge?—Yes.

3569. In Madura there were no less than five changes of Collectors within three years?—Yes, those figures have to be verified, but I believe there must have been at least four.

3570. Is Madura a very large district?—Yes, a very large and important district.

3571. With a large population?—Yes.

3572. It would take some time for a Collector to get round the district?—It would, and it is also a difficult district, with a very large turbulent population.

3573. Is only one language spoken in Madura?—Only one language.

3574. It is clearly necessary that in a large district like this an officer should remain a sufficient time to get acquainted with the people?—Yes, he should remain at least four years.

3575. Now he remains how long?—A year, or a year and a half.

3576. You say that the condition of the tahsildars is just as bad as that of the Divisional Officers?—Yes.

3577. When you were a tahsildar yourself did you find much difficulty in getting out into your district?—No difficulty whatever.

3578. It has arisen since your time?—Yes.

3579. Has the mass of returns which the Board of Revenue now requires been increased very much since the time when you were a tahsildar?—Yes, it has been much increased under the requisition of the Secretary of State.

3580. Are all of them due to the requirements of the Secretary of State?—No, but many are.

3581. And some of them, you think, might be abolished?—When I was Secretary in the Settlement Department, I remember I recommended the abolition of certain statements and the submission of others once in five years. At that time the Government of India refused to approve the proposal because they said the information was wanted for Parliament, but I think subsequently there has been some change.

3582. There has been some diminution of these returns?—Yes.

3583. You are of opinion that the Uncovenanted Service might be remodelled; will you kindly outline your scheme?—Yes. My idea is that the work has so enormously increased that either you must reduce the areas or increase the number of officers. As regards taluks, it will be somewhat difficult to reduce the areas. Prior to 1868 the taluks were about half the present size; in the revision carried out in 1866, in order to provide funds for raising the pay of tahsildars, which was then about Rs. 70 or Rs. 80, they practically doubled the area. Now, with the enormous increase of work that has been entailed, it is difficult for a tahsildar, however energetic he may be, to get through his work. In this Presidency, some ten years ago, tahsildars were relieved of magisterial duties; there were appointed what were called stationary magistrates. Even now the tahsildar is overburdened with work. I therefore propose that there should be a Gazetted Officer in charge of every taluk, and that there should be given to him two or three assistants according to the importance of the taluk, one for revenue work and the others for magisterial work; then he will be able to keep in full touch with the people and to stop the corruption which is now rampant in every taluk—in the lower grades of course.

The main principle of the scheme, which I would suggest, is (a) to constitute the higher grades of the Uncovenanted Service, comprising all appointments carrying a salary of Rs. 200 and upwards, into "an exclusive service," to be recruited partly by competition, partly by selection, and partly by promotion from the lower grades; (b) to provide each taluk with a Gazetted Officer (either a Covenanted Civilian or an Uncovenanted Deputy Collector), with two or more assistants, one for revenue and one or more for magisterial work; and (c) to give each Collector a Personal Assistant of the rank of a Sub-Collector, or a Head Assistant or an officer of the "listed service." Under this scheme, the Collector will be freed from a mass of office work which now prevents him from touring about and freely moving among the people; and every taluk will be provided with a complete staff of officers who will be able to hear and dispose of all complaints in person and keep closer touch with the people than is possible under present conditions.

Not only will the pay of these Magistrates be slightly raised, but, what is of more importance, they will all be placed under the immediate supervision of a Gazetted Officer, who will be on the spot, promptly to check any irregularities that may occur. Moreover, the powers of these subordinates might ordinarily be limited to the trial of offences punishable by Third Class Magistrates and they may be debarred, where necessary, from taking up cases triable by Second Class Magistrates, except such as may be transferred to them by the Divisional Magistrate. These latter officers will generally be invested with summary powers and will thus be able to dispose of all important cases themselves. The increase in the number of First Class Magistrates will not necessarily lead to an increase in the number of cases triable by those officers, nor in the number of appeals against their decisions, but, on the contrary, there is every probability of a diminution in the number, as with reduced charges and more leisure, the officers would be able to dispose of all cases much more satisfactorily than at present. Similarly, the work of supervision on the part of the District Collectors will be reduced rather than increased.

Concurrently with the increase in the number of Divisional Officers, it is necessary that the Collectors' sherishtadars should also be included in the grade of Deputy Collectors.

Including the recently formed district of Guntur, there are 23 districts, for each of which there is a Collector. There are 14 Sub-Collectors, 21 Head Assistants, 16 Assistant Collectors (average), and 83 Deputy Collectors. This is exclusive of the two special Assistant Collectors employed in the Agency tracts. Including Madras and the Nilgiris, there are 161 taluks in the Presidency, for each of which a Gazetted Officer will be required. The 14 Sub-Collectors will be posted as Personal Assistants to the Collectors of the more important districts. For each of the remaining 7 districts excluding Madras and the Nilgiris, either a senior Head Assistant or a Provincial Service Deputy Collector may be attached as a Personal Assistant. These officers will have no separate divisional charges, but it should be open to the Collector to post them to the charge of any particular taluk when an emergency arises, or depute them for any important duty, and call in a Deputy Collector to headquarters to take their place. Excluding these 21 officers and 4 Deputy Collectors who are on other duty, viz.: two as Presidency Magistrates, one as Assistant Secretary to the Board of Revenue, and one as Assistant Superintendent of Stamps and Stationery, there will remain 14 Head Assistant Collectors, 10 passed Assistant Collectors who will be competent to be placed in independent charge, and 79 Deputy Collectors, or a total of 103 Gazetted Officers for the charge of 103 taluks. This will leave 58 taluks to be provided for. Adding to this the Collectors' sherishtadars, who will be graded as Deputy Collectors, viz.: 23, we shall require 81 additional Deputy Collectors to give effect to the proposed scheme. This will raise the total number of Deputy Collectors to 164, including the four officers on other duty.

I have adopted the following scale in calculating the financial results of the scheme:—

The net increased cost amounts to Rs. 2,01,804 per annum or two lakhs in round figures, representing an increase of only '32 per cent. on the total land revenue of the Presidency (Rs. 628'86 lakhs). If the Government of India would not object to adding another lakh to the cost proposed, I would advocate an increase in the number of Covenanted Officers as suggested above, and a corresponding reduction in the number of the last grade Deputy Collectors. In making these calculations, I have not taken into account the increase involved in Mr. Meyer's scheme for the redistribution of districts and taluks, the details of which have not yet been published. An increase in the number of districts and taluks is necessary, and I would increase the number of districts to at least thirty, limiting the extra cost to a moderate figure, by grading the additional officers partly in the third grade and partly in the Provincial Service. I have not also taken into account the increase in the pay of the Huzur and taluk establishments which is, I believe, under the consideration of the Board of Revenue.

The pay of tahsildars, deputy tahsildars, and stationary sub-magistrates should be made personal, but the number of each class of officers to be allotted to each taluk, and the number in each grade to be assigned to each district, should be fixed once for all by the Government.

I do not think that the number and pay of the revenue inspectors require any alteration. The scale was revised in 1890, and in 1906 a large staff of additional inspectors (157) was sanctioned for Land Records work whom I propose to retain. The revenue inspectors have hitherto been burdened with the duty of enquiring into every petition presented to the tahsildar or Divisional Officer. If the proposed scheme is approved, most of these petitions, except such as require measurement of the lands in dispute, will be enquired into by the tahsildar or his deputy, while the more important cases will be taken up by the Divisional Officer himself. Claims for remission for failure of wet crops above a certain limit will also be examined by these officers. The revenue inspectors' duties will then be confined chiefly to checking the accounts of cultivation and collection, inspecting boundary marks, cultivation of second and third crops, encroachments, &c.

3584. Do you consider that the position of the tahsildars ought to be very much raised?—Yes. Practically my scheme will carry that out.

3585. Would the increase of number of Gazetted Officers, giving one for each taluk, very much increase the work of the Collector?—I do not think so. With a good, honest officer on the spot, the work would be rather less; the work would be much more efficiently done than at present, and the appeals would be fewer.

3586. Do you consider that the appeals now are too numerous?—I do not think they are numerous.

3587. But you told us that the number of appeals would be largely reduced by the scheme which you proposed?—Yes, the present number will of course be reduced.

3588. Then I assume from that that they are too numerous?—They are not too numerous.

3589. The scheme which you propose would very much reduce them?—Yes.

3590. Would that not rather point to the fact that they are too numerous now?—They are undoubtedly large, but the necessity of appeals will be less under my scheme. What I say is that merely to increase the number of officers who can try first-class cases will not necessarily increase the number of appeals. If there are 50 first-class cases, there will be more people trying the 50 cases, that is all, so that it does not follow that the number of appeals would be greater; on the contrary, if the work is better done the number of appeals will rather fall.

3591. Are you in agreement that the appeals as to punishment may very properly be limited to one above the officer who gives the original decision?—I would draw a line as regards the limit of pay.

3592. Above so many rupees a month?—Yes, clerks paid so much might be allowed one appeal, and above that pay they might be allowed two appeals.

3593. Where would you fix that limit?—Say about Rs. 50.

3594. In no case should there be more than two appeals, in your judgment?—Not necessarily, excepting of course for Gazetted Officers.

3595. Then you suggest that the pay of the stationary sub-magistrate is much too low?—Yes.

3596. What is it now?—Rs. 100 to Rs. 120.

3597. What do you think it ought to be?—I have worked out a scheme in which I propose that there shall be four grades, Rs. 175, Rs. 150, Rs. 125, and Rs. 100. My scale, provided there is a complete establishment, will bring out a total cost of about two lakhs for the Presidency, which is certainly not large, considering that the present cost compares very favourably with that of other provinces. Madras has been practically starved in the matter of establishment.

3598. You said just now that there was a great deal of corruption in the lower ranks?—Yes.

3599. At what rank in the hierarchy does that corruption begin?—The revenue inspectors and village officers chiefly.

3600. What is the reason of that corruption; is it mere desire for gain?—No, it is the rigour with which the various special and fiscal laws have to be enforced; there is the Salt Law, the Excise Law, and the Forest Law, and many other laws—laws about irrigation, laws about encroachments, and so on—that give a dangerous power into the hands of the lower officers, and the first manipulation begins with the village karnam.

3601. Then it will not remove in any way the source of corruption if you increase the pay of these inspectors and subordinate officers?—You may increase the pay, but unless there is local supervision by a responsible officer, it is not likely that merely increasing the pay will produce the desired result; of course it would do some good.

3602. Would you get a better class of men?—You would in course of time, but the opportunity for temptation ought to be removed by prompt check on the part of superior officers. A Gazetted Officer is always likely to be much more effective than an officer of an inferior grade.

3603. Does this cause much discontent among the people?—Yes, the greatest curse of the country is the amount of corruption.

3604. Is that anything new in the history of the country, or is it something that has always been here?—It has increased rather than decreased, owing to the increase in the number of restrictive laws.

3605. As the number of restrictive laws has increased, so has the corruption of officers by persons desirous of evading the laws increased?—Yes.

3606. Will you give us instances of the restrictive laws you refer to?—That in regard to forests is one; then the salt and excise laws; then there are rules about remissions; they are not controlled here by legal enactments but by rules issued by the Board of Revenue. One rule is that the crop must be preserved for inspection; that is a necessary provision, I fully admit, but the revenue inspector and the karnam delay inspections, and the tahsildars have no time to inspect properly, and the result is that the raiyat loses the benefit of the remission.

3607. But where does the corruption come in there?—The raiyat must pay the man to induce him to come and make prompt inspection; if there is delay the cattle graze on it, and he loses the benefit of the little remission he can get.

3608. He may not touch the crop until somebody has come to look at it and certified that it is worth so much?—Exactly.

3609. Besides the provision of rather highly paid officers under the supervision of a Gazetted Officer, how would you propose to get rid of this corruption?—For instance, would you abolish the Forest Law?—No, that is not possible.

3610. The law in itself is a good law?—It is necessary; whether it is good or bad is a different matter, but it is necessary for the revenue and for the good of the people also; but in administering such laws there ought to be some little discretion used.

3611. By whom?—By the officers conducting the prosecutions.

3612. Perhaps they are thinking all the time of their revenue?—For instance the grazing forests are marked out, but not on the ground; there is some flag put up at a distance of two or three furlongs, but the raiyat does not know what the exact boundary is. The cattle trespass on it, and then he is hauled up and prosecuted.

3613. Prosecuted by some minor official?—The forest guard; there is one officer in the district, and practically the forest guard is master of the situation.

3614. The forest guard says, "I want back-sheesh," and if he gets it there is no prosecution?—Exactly.

3615. Then with regard to salt?—Similarly, if a man keeps salt water in his house or scrapes a little salt-earth, he is hauled up; the rules provide that the first offence should be excused, but the man has to go before a salt inspector before the excuse can be obtained. Rather than go 20 or 30 miles to see the salt inspector, the man pays two or four annas to the salt peon. Under my scheme, if there is a Gazetted Officer—he may be an Uncovenanted or Covenanted Officer, but he will be a Gazetted Officer—he will be on the spot and in touch with the people, and he will hear all those cases and set matters right. All those things go to the Revenue Department and this officer would be the chief executive officer in these matters.

3616. There is no danger of the transference of the corruption from the forest guard to the Gazetted Officer?—Well, if that is likely to occur, there is an end to all administrative government; but it is not at all likely to occur, because as a class our Deputy Collectors are honest; the only difficulty is that they are not in touch with the people; they have no time.

3617. What is the title of the lowest grade (Gazetted Officer?—The Deputy Collector on Rs. 250. As regards Divisional Officers, if my scheme is approved there will be a Gazetted Officer in each taluk, so it will be unnecessary to have a separate Gazetted Officer.

3618. You say you are in favour of the creation of Advisory Councils?—Yes.

3619. Should minor irrigation works, grazing lands, roads, village schools, and sanitation all form subjects which the Advisory Council could consider? Would you agree with that definition of the work of the Advisory Council?—They should be simply consultative bodies, and it would be well that the Collector of the district should be in touch with them and ascertain their views.

3620. How often do you think he ought to see them?—Once in two or three months I should say would be quite enough.

3621. Then he would call them together and say, "I have got certain things to settle"—it may be either roads or sanitation or a hundred and one things—"I should like to know what your opinion is?"—Yes.

3622. You think he would get a good opinion?—Yes, if freedom of discussion is allowed and the District Officer is given the relief that I propose; he is so much overburdened with work now that he has not time to discuss matters with anybody.

3623. You think he would get a good opinion from the Advisory Council?—Yes.

3624. One witness before us to-day said it was impossible at the present moment for the Divisional Officer to settle a question as to irrigation or division of water. There may be a dispute between village and village as to the amount of water available for this village or that, and the witness gave us to understand that that was a question which would have to be referred to the Public Works Department. That would be a case which would be constantly occurring, would it not?—Certainly.

3625. Is that the sort of question which might be advantageously threshed out at the Advisory Council?—It would not be possible.

3626. You would have to confine their advice to minor irrigation works—the provision of a well or some small sanitary scheme or something of that kind?—Yes, and small tanks in each village. There are numbers of them.

3627. Do you think that the creation of Advisory Councils should be accompanied by the revival of the panchayats?—Yes.

3628. How many members do you think would be advisable for a panchayat?—I think not more than five.

3629. I think in the Punjab they have eight?—I do not know; the word "panch" means five, and that is a large enough number.

3630. That is the number which from time immemorial it has been usual to have?—Yes. The panchayat system has practically disappeared at present, and it will require considerable care to resuscitate it; I do not think the difficulties are insuperable.

3631. I gather that in the north of India there has been a distinct attempt to revive the panchayat system and that they entrust to the panchayats the settlement of monetary disputes up to a small sum, and that practically no appeal has been found necessary. Do you think the same thing should obtain in Madras?—Yes, there must have been a recent attempt. At the time of the Irrigation Commission, Sir Denzil Ibbetson recorded a note in which he said, "Under the influence of our rule the faculty of combination and co-operation has diminished and is diminishing"; I think that is true of every other province in India; but we could create such a body.

3632. You think that the faculty of combination might be restored, first of all by the introduction of Advisory Councils and then by the revival of the panchayats?—Yes.

3633. Of course, that would take a long time?—Yes.

3634. But you think it would be well worth the effort?—Yes.

3635. (Mr. Meyer.) How long were you in the public service before you retired altogether?—Forty-two years.

3636. You spoke of the large increase of work that you had noticed during that time; was that not largely due to the tendency of the people to appeal against orders passed by the local executive officers?—To a very little extent. So far as revenue questions are concerned, I do not think there is any serious tendency to appeal.

3637. Do you know the Telugu districts?—Yes, my service was chiefly in Telugu districts.

3638. Do you say that there is no further tendency to appeal (I do not say whether rightly or wrongly) against actions of the executive authority now than there was in 1865?—There is a tendency to some extent.

3639. Has there been, in the last generation we will say, an increased tendency on the part of the people to appeal against the actions of the local executive authorities?—Yes.

3640. And in the Tamil districts?—That has been notorious.

3641. Do you think that one of the reasons which lead to the local authorities being over-worked and not being able to get into sufficient actual contact with the people is having to report on these appeals?—To some extent.

3642. And therefore if, without any substantial injustice being done, the mass of appeals could be reduced, it would be a good thing?—What sort of appeals are you speaking of?

3643. I am speaking about the darkhast appeals as to who is to get a particular field, or of appeals against an assessment for encroaching on Government land and so forth?—There is only one appeal allowed now in those cases.

3644. There has been some reduction there?—Yes.

3645. When was that reduction made?—I forget the date.

3646. I suggest it was about 10 years ago?—Very likely.

3647. In your opinion has that reduction proved satisfactory?—I do not know what reduction has been made in the number of appeals.

3648. But do you think that substantial justice is done with the one appeal that is allowed; under any system of law there may be occasional injustice, but speaking generally is that what you would say?—On the whole there has been substantial justice.

3649. Take the case of village officers; there used to be almost unlimited capacity for appeals there. That has been reduced?—Yes.

3650. With good effect, in your opinion?—Yes.

3651. Then it might be quite possible to reduce appeals in other matters also and to produce good results too?—I think in this Presidency we have gone far enough so far as revenue questions are concerned.

3652. To put it broadly, you would allow one appeal against any action of a local officer to the officer above him?—Yes.

3653. Would you allow a second appeal?—I am not speaking of personal questions—on all executive actions, such as assessments and so forth?—In certain cases, yes; for instance, cases of encroachments and percolation; these are enactments that can be worked very arbitrarily; in these special cases I would allow a second appeal.

3654. Until the matter had been definitely settled by what you might call an accumulation of case law, you would allow a second appeal, but you would regard that as a provisional step towards abolishing them?—Yes.

3655. You said you would abolish second appeals in the case of punishments up to Rs. 50?—Yes.

3656. You spoke of an increase of forms and returns as being due, as far as you know, to a certain extent to the action of the Secretary of State. Has there not also been a certain increase owing to calls for information by the local Legislative Council?—Yes, I do not think it has been very much.

3657. It is to a certain extent inevitable that when there is a Legislative Council formed, and the members take more interest in matters, there will be calls for returns from public servants?—Yes.

3658. And if there were local Advisory Councils would that lead to additional returns; do you think they would want information?—Much of the information ought to be available in the offices.

3659. And the information would be already there?—Yes. In the matter of returns there are two or three returns which entail an enormous amount of work. For instance, there is what is called the Crop Return; that has about 150 columns; such things are hardly worth the trouble taken with them.

3660. Who prescribed that return?—It is a return with reference to a despatch of the Secretary of State.

3661. Did the Secretary of State prescribe the whole 150 columns?—Well, we in Madras do not follow the same system as in other places where mere estimates are accepted; our officers are scientific and thorough, and they elaborated the 150 columns.

3662. Then the actual burden of work in this particular return is not so much caused by the initial requirements of the Secretary of State as by the superstructure that the Government of Madras have raised on it?—I do not know.

3663. However, a certain number of these returns might be reduced without any harm?—Yes.

3664. The particular statement you have referred to might be reduced to one return in five years?—Yes.

3665. The village accounts are very numerous?—Yes.

3666. Are all these accounts necessary?—Those that relate to the settlement of the demand are necessary, and the changes and rises are all essential; but there are other columns in the agricultural statistics which might be omitted.

Dewan
Bahadur
P. Rajaratna
Mudaliar.

26 Nov., 1907.

3667. What are the particulars which are demanded by the Secretary of State that you object to?—There is the Crop Return; there is the Produce Return.

3668. These all feed that big statement you mentioned just now; if that were abolished it would lead to a reduction of accounts in every village?—Yes.

3669. Apart from this, you do not think the village accounts are unduly cumbrous?—No.

3670. And the taluk accounts?—They follow the village accounts.

3671. They were improved some years ago?—Yes.

3672. Was that in the direction of expanding or diminishing them?—Mr. Stokes and myself were on the Committee, and we revised the village and the taluk accounts and tried to improve them.

3673. The improvement was in the direction of reducing and not increasing them?—As to some statements, yes, but in regard to some other statements we had to elaborate.

3674. In the accounts that you say are necessary, those relating to the holdings, to the man's payments, and so forth, could the account be made to cover all the real information required and yet be reduced in size?—I do not think that would be possible; there would be a danger of loss of revenue.

3675. You recollect a scheme of my own for the increase of districts, divisions and taluks?—Yes.

3676. I proposed three districts, 16 extra divisions and 17 extra taluks. I gather you prefer your own scheme for a larger number of officers?—Yes, that will give you complete autonomy for each taluk.

3677. Suppose you had power to introduce your scheme, would you include with it the increase in the numbers of districts, divisions and taluks which I proposed and the Madras Government accepted?—I would include your scheme.

3678. That is to say you would increase the number and therefore decrease the area, and the burden of charge, of each?—Yes.

3679. But you would proceed further?—Yes.

3680. I do not quite understand the position of your Divisional Officer under this scheme; is he to take the place of the tahsildar?—No, he will be the Divisional Officer practically; I give him also a tahsildar on reduced pay.

3681. There are two assistants, one for magisterial work and one for revenue work?—Yes.

3682. Is the assistant for revenue work to have precisely the same powers as the present tahsildar?—Yes.

3683. And the same pay?—No, not the same pay; less pay.

3684. Why? Do you think the tahsildar is overpaid now?—I think his responsibilities will be less, and he would have a Gazetted Officer on the spot to help him.

3685. But as regards the distribution of work; at present the local work of the taluk goes in the first place to the tahsildar?—Yes.

3686. Would it continue to go to the tahsildar under your scheme?—Yes.

3687. The Divisional Officer will not take any more part in the local work than he does now?—Many petitions are now transferred by the Divisional Officer to the tahsildar and by the tahsildar to the revenue inspector and so on. Most of the petitions ought to be disposed of by the tahsildar or by the Divisional Officer in person.

3688. The result of your scheme would be that the Divisional Officer would usually do a great deal of the work that now goes to the tahsildar?—A portion of it; we should make a sort of distribution about which there would be no difficulty.

3689. Under the system you advocate of one appeal against any particular order, there would necessarily be more appeals to the Collector, since in a particular thing which under the present scheme is done by the tahsildar the appeal would lie to the Divisional Officer. If under your scheme the Divisional Officer puts the tahsildar aside and passes orders himself, then the appeal lies to the Collector?—I do not know; such cases would be very few; in revenue matters the powers of the tahsildar are very limited.

3690. Do you think that the Divisional Officer under this scheme would be in absolute touch with the people?—Yes.

3691. There are taluks about 1,000 square miles in extent?—Yes.

3692. Would he still be able to be in touch with the people over those areas?—With one taluk he ought to be able to inspect every village once in the course of the year, if not twice.

3693. You stated that you consider corruption has increased of late years in Madras; do you really maintain that?—In the lower ranks it has increased, but in the higher ranks, no.

3694. You say that the Civil Judicial Service is now fairly pure?—Yes.

3695. That was not so a generation ago?—No.

3696. Is the tahsildar of to-day at all as corrupt as the tahsildar of 30 or 40 years ago?—No.

3697. We are getting a higher and better class of officer?—Yes, but he is not in touch with the lower ranks; the first manipulation of the records begins with the revenue inspector.

3698. Then you desire to restrict your remarks to the lower ranks?—Yes.

3699. You admit that in the higher ranks there has been an improvement in the morale?—Yes, but unfortunately they are not in touch with the people.

3700. Do you say that the tahsildar is not in touch with the people?—He is not in touch; for some reason or other, even although he has been relieved from magisterial work, he works from morning till evening, and he does not get into touch with the people.

3701. Does he not have to spend about two-thirds of the time in camp?—No, only 15 days in the month.

3702. Do the people not come to him about their grievances?—I do not know.

3703. The Divisional Officer also tours about half the year?—I think it is limited to three months in the year.

3704. I thought it was five?—I am not certain.

3705. Anyhow he tours a considerable part of the year; do the people come to him?—He receives petitions from them.

3706. Do you say the people would come more freely to the Divisional Officer or to the tahsildar?—It all depends upon the personnel.

3707. But speaking generally, to whom would they come more frequently?—The tahsildar if he is a good man. The system ought to be, except in cases in which actual inspection or measurement of fields is required, that petitions should be disposed of by him in person after personal enquiry.

3708. You say the tahsildar is too much aloof from the people; I say he has to inspect villages and people can come to see him; you say for some reason or other the people will not come to see him; is that it?—Not that they will not come, but petitions are received and they are sent to the revenue inspectors for report.

3709. But what does the tahsildar do when he goes to some village; does he not go out and see the people and the crops and all the rest of it?—I do not think he really does.

3710. You think he sits in his office and writes reports?—That is so.

3711. Does the Divisional Officer go and see the people and the crops?—No, except when remissions are to be granted and he has to certify them.

3712. I am speaking of the time when the Divisional Officer is going on tour; when he is encamped near a village, does he, or does he not, see the local affairs of the village and the people of the village?—He sees the people and if there are any complaints they are called upon to send in a stamped petition and there is an end of the matter.

3713. Always?—Always.

3714. Do you mean to say that a Divisional Officer will not take a complaint orally and enquire into it?—No.

3715. You spoke of the forest and other special laws as increasing corruption. Do you desire to give the management of offences under these laws to the ordinary Divisional Officer?—Yes.

3716. You would put aside the forest officer and his subordinates and the excise officer and his subordinate and so on?—No, the forest officer does not exercise any magisterial powers.

3717. But it is he that prosecutes usually?—Yes.

3718. Do you say that the power of prosecution should be transferred to the Divisional Officer?—No, let that be as at present, but the trial of offences should be done by the Divisional Officer.

3719. But it is now, or it may be done by him, or more often by a Second or Third class Magistrate?—Yes, generally by a third class magistrate.

3720. You admit that under the laws if they are properly carried out in the Excise and Forest and Salt Departments and so on there is sufficient power?—Yes.

3721. You would not disturb that at all?—No.

3722. You were a member of the Irrigation Commission?—Yes.

3723. What is your opinion as to the proper relations between the Collector and the Executive Engineer in Madras? Do you think that the Engineer ought to be under the authority of the Collector?—Yes, the old system of District Engineer under the Collector should be restored.

3724. He was formerly under the Collector?—Yes.

3725. When did he cease to be under the Collector?—About 20 years ago I think.

3726. It was more than that, I think; your idea would be that the Executive Engineer should stand to the Collector as the district forest officer does?—Yes.

3727. That is, he should be the assistant under his orders in all matters affecting the administration and the people, but for the technical execution of works he should be under his own Superintending Engineer?—Yes.

3728. You are aware, having served on the Commission, of the Punjab system, under which the engineers not merely construct the channels and keep them in order but take a share in the assessment?—They have complete control.

3729. Do you regard that as a good system for Madras?—No, I objected to it.

3730. You did not think it good?—No. Sir Colin Scott-Moncrieff wanted that system in Madras; I protested, and Mr. Muir-Mackenzie joined with me, and Sir Thomas Higham said: "Do not disturb the Madras system," and so we were left free.

3731. Is it not the fact that in the Punjab the engineer not merely constructs the channels, but sees that the people get sufficient water and at the right time?—In the deltas it is the engineering officer who is practically responsible for the distribution.

3732. Suppose Madras engineers think that a channel wants repairing and do it while the people want water for their crops?—That is exactly what they do, and that is causing great dissatisfaction.

3733. In the Punjab that would bring its own remedy by the fact that the engineer would also be responsible for the assessments, and in the case you put, he would make an allowance in the assessment. You would remedy the defect by putting the engineer under the orders of the Collector; the Collector would say to him "You will please leave that channel; you must repair it later on"?—Yes, it is useless wasting the time of the technical officer by asking him to measure fields and fix the assessment and to dispose of remissions and other things.

3734. You have had great experience of the Madras system of revenue assessments?—Yes.

3735. Are they too rigid in any way—I mean speaking generally?—It is not that they are too rigid, but the allowances made for cultivation expenses are a good deal too low.

3736. I do not want to go into the details of the settlement; but are the settlement rules fairly satisfactory and do they effect their object?—I do not think there is any defect in the rules; it is in the application of the system that the figures are manipulated.

3737. Are there unnecessary references over the settlements?—Yes.

3738. The Board for instance refusing to accept the Settlement Officer's report, and Government refusing to accept the Board's figures?—Yes, there have been many cases.

3739. That is to say, each authority doing the work of the other over again?—Yes, and the result was that the whole of the table elaborately framed by the Deputy Commissioner was upset, and had to be manipulated in some way.

3740. The net result finally arrived at did not differ very much from the results arrived at at first—I mean the net actual results affecting the people?—The revenue was reduced.

3741. But that reduction might have been brought about more simply without having to go through the whole process over again?—Yes.

3742. The system is too complex you would say?—Yes, it is in this Presidency.

3743. You are in favour of panchayats?—Yes.

3744. Is it the fact that in this Presidency there are in many villages a large number of low-caste people, Pariahs and others?—Yes.

3745. Supposing a village got a certain amount of local autonomy, would there be any risk of the Pariahs being oppressed by the higher castes?—No.

3746. In the past was that your experience?—Yes.

3747. That the Pariahs were never oppressed?—Yes.

3748. When there are five men constituting the panchayat there is no danger of any caste being oppressed?—Not if it is represented.

3749. But would the Pariahs be in the panchayat?—Oh no.

3750. The panchayat would not sit with Pariahs?—They would not.

3751. But you think they would not oppress them?—No.

3752. There is a good deal of faction in these villages?—Yes.

3753. Would that tend against the utility of the panchayats?—Not if care is taken to give some sort of status as I suggest to the panchayat; they will submerge their differences and try to work harmoniously.

3754. They would be appointed for two years I think you said?—Yes.

3755. And if they quarrel you would dissolve them?—Yes, and put in other men. It ought to be fostered very sympathetically, otherwise it would be almost impossible to create them.

3756. In cases of petty civil and criminal cases which they may dispose of would you allow an appeal?—If the decision is unanimous I would not allow an appeal, but if there is a difference of opinion or any charge of corruption, I think there ought to be an appeal.

3757. Would you be in favour of giving the construction of wells and minor tanks and so forth to the panchayat?—I think we must wait for some time.

Dewan

3758. But if they work well you might contemplate that hereafter?—Yes; at present there is a rule of the Board of Revenue in the case of minor irrigation works under which the village officers are allowed the privilege of carrying out the tanks at the contract rate.

3759. Some 25 years ago the experiment was tried of giving out the smaller tanks to villages for collective maintenance; did that succeed?—Yes, it worked fairly.

3760. Was it taken advantage of in many cases?—It all depends on the tahsildar.

3761. But I am speaking of the orders of 1882, were those taken advantage of in many cases?—If the tahsildar is sympathetic and takes an interest in these matters, things will work well.

3762. But I ask you, as a former Secretary of the Board, to your knowledge were those orders a dead letter or were they acted upon?—I do not think they were acted upon.

3763. And was that due to the reluctance of the people to take them up?—Not to the reluctance of the people.

3764. You think that if the tahsildar had tried to make the people do it they would have done it?—Yes.

3765. As regards education, would you give the management of schools to the panchayats?—No; they will not be competent to take it up.

3766. Then will you give them village sanitation?—Yes—petty improvements, construction of wells probably.

3767. Suppose there was a case of remission, would you allow a lump remission to be given to the village by the Divisional Officer and the remission distributed among the raiyats by the panchayats?—I do not know whether the Government would be prepared to give the privilege.

3768. Suppose the Government was prepared—suppose you had the power to give it, would you give it?—No.

3769. May I take it that at present, although the Divisional Officer can go round in the case of floods or drought and inspect any village and make a rough guess at the amount of crop that has been lost, yet in the case of any widespread calamity he has not possibly the time to make a field to field inspection?—At present he has not.

3770. Therefore, although as I say he may make a very fair guess about the village as a whole from his personal observation, as regards the details of a field, he has to rely on the accounts furnished by the village munsiff and the village karnam and the revenue inspector?—No.

3771. Then how is the assessment on each field fixed?—At present the remission rules are somewhat rigid; in the case of portions of fields no remission is granted; if the field measures even 50 acres and only 10 are cultivated, the whole field is charged.

3772. I am not speaking so much about the rules as about the application of them. Suppose there is a widespread loss of crops; how is it known which fields have lost crops and which fields have not lost their crops?—The karnam prepares the list and the revenue inspector inspects.

3773. That is what I suggested—and on their reports checked by the personal observation of the jamabandi officer, remission is granted?—Yes. In the case of partial loss, remission takes the shape of a certain percentage, it may be 25 or 50 or 75.

3774. This is all in the wet crop area?—Yes.

3775. My point is that in the case of total loss, perhaps owing to the configuration of the village, some fields have been submerged by flood and others have been on higher ground and have escaped; the Divisional Officer can check the total loss in the village, but he has not time unless there has been any widespread calamity to go round and check the field details?—No.

3776. For that he must rely to a large extent on the munsiff and the karnam and the revenue inspector?—Yes.

3777. You tell us that these gentlemen are hopelessly corrupt?—Yes.

3778. Then why not trust these details to the panchayat?—I have no objection to that.

3779. That is exactly what I meant; if I say “I give a remission of Rs. 500 to this village, which is what I consider called for, you people must distribute that among the raiyats who have suffered most,” you would not object to that?—No.

3780. In determining what fields have escaped and in what fields the crops have been totally lost you would not object to the panchayat having that power?—No.

3781. Would you give larger powers to Collectors in regard to dry remissions than they at present possess?—Yes.

3782. What would you allow them to do?—If the loss is confined to one taluk they might be given some power.

3783. Would you give them the same discretionary power as that possessed under the wet remission rule, subject of course to any special principle laid down by the Board of Revenue and by the Government?—I think that might be allowed.

3784. Is it not the fact that the ordinary dry assessment is settled on somewhat different lines than the wet assessment?—That is true, but in certain cases remissions are made, and in those cases the Collector might be given powers, if it is only in exceptional cases such as famine.

3785. You say that dry remissions should only be given in exceptional cases?—Yes, that is the rule now.

3786. But that instead of the Board being the judges of an exceptional case it might be left to the Collector?—Yes.

3787. And to the Divisional Officer if he was doing the jamabandi?—No, I would restrict it to the Collector.

3788. Would you give Divisional Officers and Collectors any large power of suspending revenue in times of drought subject to final decision as to whether remission was required or not?—It should be left to the District Officer, not the Divisional Officer.

3789. The Collector should have it?—Yes.

3790. There is a section of the Madras Land Law which forbids even the Board of Revenue to make a remission beyond the agricultural year?—I have not heard of it.

3791. Suppose there be such a law, is it a good restriction?—I do not see why the Collector should not be allowed.

3792. (Mr. Hichens.) The powers that you would give your panchayat are mainly connected with small irrigation works, repair and upkeep of works, and in regard to civil suits?—Yes.

3793. Those are the principal ones?—Yes.

3794. Have not the village unions which exist in Madras got some of those powers to-day?—Simply the carrying out of the sanitary improvements; funds are placed at their disposal and they carry out sanitary improvements, village road repairs and other things; they have no power to try civil suits.

3795. What is the difference between the panchayats you propose and the unions which exist to-day?—The former would be chiefly appointed for the disposal of civil suits and petty nuisance cases.

3796. You do not want both; you do not want the village union as it exists to-day, and the panchayat?—The village unions are very few in this Presidency.

3797. But would your proposal be to abolish village unions and substitute panchayats?—I think that when panchayats are created the village unions might very well be abolished.

3798. Now with regard to the existing taluk Board; are you satisfied with the constitution of that Board to-day?—I am not in possession of the latest information.

3799. But you have no suggestion to make with regard to any additional powers that could be given?—No, I have not had time to look into the question.

3800. And the same applies to the District Boards?—Yes.

3801. (Mr. Dutt.) Do you think these Advisory Boards could be profitably consulted in the matter of the irrigation rates which are now imposed?—I do not believe they would be able to give much valuable advice; they would of course prefer to keep the rates as low as possible.

3802. There is such a thing as a third crop rate?—Yes; it has been introduced into this Presidency only within very recent years.

3803. Would you consult them as to the advisability of imposing such a rate or not?—If my own opinion was consulted, I would abolish the third crop rate.

3804. But would you consult the Advisory Board on that matter?—Yes.

3805. Would you consult them, when a revision settlement is going on in the district, about the details of the revision settlement?—They might be consulted. At present the Settlement Officer is supposed to consult all the people, even the people of the village.

3806. If the Settlement Officer consults this Advisory Board do you suggest his consulting them direct or through the Collector?—Direct, just as he does in the case of every village; he has to go and consult them.

3807. He might refer questions to them for their recorded opinions?—Yes, there is no objection to that.

3808. Evidence was given to us this morning that it was desirable to organise Advisory Boards in all taluks; do you agree with that opinion?—No, I think that would be unnecessary if my scheme were adopted.

3809. In cases like the question of percolation, you would allow more appeals than one?—Yes.

3810. I understood you to say that you would allow that only provisionally; was that correct?—Yes, until we know how these new Acts are being worked, whether they are worked sympathetically and there is no sort of oppression.

3811. I understand that percolation is a question of fact—whether the irrigation water has percolated into a field or not?—It is a very difficult question; it may be surface percolation or it may be sub-soil water; and it also depends in this Presidency upon how far the field has been benefited.

3812. In those cases you would only allow a second appeal?—Yes.

3813. Not only provisionally but for ever?—No, only provisionally.

3814. For how long?—Say for five years.

3815. Then you would finally decide?—Yes, but if these are being worked sympathetically there will be no necessity, and where the charges are very few it is hardly worth while.

3816. In personal cases you have said that clerks or officers drawing Rs. 50 or under should be allowed one appeal only; that those drawing Rs. 50 should be allowed two appeals, and that Gazetted Officers should be allowed more?—Yes.

3817. Is there any reason for making this distinction between poorly paid and highly paid officers?—Probably, strictly speaking, the badly paid man is just as much entitled to an appeal.

3818. Is there any reason for making any sort of distinction and treating the poorly paid officer as a Pariah with only one right of appeal?—You must draw a distinction somewhere or other for administrative purposes.

3819. And you draw the distinction so as to benefit the highly paid officers and not the poorly paid officers?—The presumption is that the low paid officer more frequently misconducts himself; in the case of the higher paid officer there is some consideration to be given to the fact that he is likely to be better behaved.

3820. However, in the case even of the poorly paid people you would allow one appeal?—In the case of dismissals I think you might allow two appeals.

3821. What is the present rule? If a man on Rs. 50 is dismissed cannot he appeal up to the Government?—That is two appeals.

3822. It might be three; it depends upon the man who punishes him; can he or can he not appeal up to the Government?—I have not looked up the present orders on the subject.

3823. If that be the rule, would you restrict that appeal and prevent him from appealing to the Government against an order of dismissal?—Two appeals I think would be sufficient.

3824. And you would not allow him to go to Government?—No.

3825. Would that restriction add to the sense of security which is now felt by Government officers?—Two appeals ought to be satisfactory.

3826. Would it not weaken the sense of security now enjoyed?—I do not think so. In all my answers I go on the idea that you would provide a first rate administrative machinery for each taluk.

3827. The reason for your restricting appeals is to save the time of officers?—Partly to save time and partly because the presumption is that these lower paid officers will always somehow or other get into trouble—that they will render themselves liable to some punishment.

3828. The village unions are under the Local Self-Government Act?—Yes.

3829. And the panchayats you propose are mainly for the performance of other duties?—Yes.

3830. Is there any reason why you should abolish the existing unions when you create panchayats for the performance of other duties?—There is no reason for maintaining two separate bodies; the Act might be amended perhaps. The village unions cannot be given the powers which I propose to give to the panchayats; the panchayats will have wider powers than the village unions.

3831. Which are the powers which you think the panchayats can exercise and which the village unions cannot?—Civil suits and petty criminal cases will not be taken up by the unions; it is simply a matter of convenience whether you will have two bodies or one body.

3832. In the case of existing taluk Boards and existing District Boards, you would not recommend their abolition?—No.

3833. In addition to the duties which you have recommended for the panchayats would you give them any voice or consult them in any way with regard to the management of pasture lands and grazing fields—communal lands so to speak?—Yes, they may be consulted as regards their village concerns in which they are interested.

3834. Would you consult them as regards the location of liquor shops and other excise shops?—Yes.

3835. And in many other village matters they could be utilised?—Yes, that is now done; the villagers are consulted.

3836. Are they consulted as to the establishment of an excise shop in the village?—Generally they are, at least the orders are that they should be consulted.

3837. I wanted to know the practice. It is difficult for me to say exactly what is done.

3838. You said that remissions with regard to dry crops are allowed only in exceptional cases under the rules. Would you extend those rules and make them similar to the rules for remission in the case of wet crops?—You mean whenever land is left waste or a crop is lost; no; that is opposed to the principles of our settlement. The settlement provides for some allowance for loss in ordinary seasons, but not for loss in a season of calamity; it may be that the allowance is not sufficient, but so long as the principle is there, you will not be justified in granting remissions on dry lands in ordinary seasons.

3839. You have suggested some alteration of rules in the case of dry crops; but you would not make the rules identical with those in the case of wet crops?—The only thing I recommended was this; instead of the Board of Revenue sanctioning, the District Officer might be allowed to sanction remissions in the case of dry crops.

3840. (Sir Frederic Lely.) I think the chief object, or at any rate the effect, of your scheme would be to relieve the tahsildar. As a matter of fact, we hear a good deal about the Collector being overworked; is not the tahsildar often the most overworked man in the district?—Yes; it is to give him relief.

3841. He is overwhelmed with detail?—Yes.

3842. Every department goes to the tahsildar?—Yes.

3843. You propose an Advisory Council for the whole district. There will also be a District Board, taluk Boards, and village panchayats. That is a good many bodies in one district?—The members of the District Boards at present attend only to matters concerning the work connected with the District Board under the Act.

3844. But would it not be making it more compact to make your Advisory Council the District Board; why have a separate body?—In the District Boards all different interests are not properly represented.

3845. But that could be altered; they ought to be represented?—I do not know; I say they might not care to come to the District Board.

3846. They might not care to come to the Advisory Council?—The Advisory Council does not entail so much work as the District Board; membership of the District Boards entails a certain amount of responsibility.

3847. You think a man too timid of responsibility for a District Board might be advantageously placed in even a more responsible position on the Advisory Council?—They would only meet once in two or three months.

3848. At any rate, you think the two ought to be separate?—Yes; some members of the District Board might also be members of the Advisory Council.

3849. You would duplicate?—Yes.

3850. In the case of this Advisory Council you would not propose to give it any power of control?—No.

3851. Or responsibility?—No.

3852. You would hope by so doing to develop the faculty of combination spoken of by Sir Denzil Ibbetson?—Yes.

3853. Do you think the faculty of combination will ever be developed by mere talk?—As I said, they must be created and fostered.

3854. Is not the only way of developing the power of combination to give some control, some actual power, and to associate it with real responsibility. Would it not be a good thing to make it an instruction that any matter before Government, or any executive orders which you propose, should be referred for opinion to the Advisory Council, and that they should give their opinion in writing under their own signatures?—Yes.

3855. Would that not rather tend to fix responsibility and make them act with more deliberation and sense of responsibility?—I did not understand the word "responsibility" in that sense; it is simply consulting their views.

3856. But it should not be a mere talking body?—No, it ought not to be; they ought to be allowed to give free opinion.

3857. As to village autonomy, you do not approve of giving the control over the schools to the village body, I understand—you would not approve of that even by way of experiment?—Not if you mean by control, control of any expenditure.

3858. I mean absolute control over the schools?—No.

3859. As I understand, chiefly because there is danger of injustice owing to factions?—No, that is not it; the difference in the educational rules is very great; the educational authority sets apart the money.

3860. But you might hand that to the villagers and let them have the spending of it?—The educational rules require that men of certain standards are to be appointed as teachers.

3861. The rules might be modified. Suppose we left the selection of teachers to the Education Department, might not all else be left to the villagers—the provision of the school house, the granting of holidays, the selection of children who should be exempt from fees, and so on?—Yes, you could give them such powers as those; I have no objection.

3862. You would not consider that there would be danger of the Pariahs being oppressed?—Pariahs will not be allowed to read in any village school owing to caste; they will have to establish a separate school for Pariahs.

3863. Is that the case now?—Yes, Pariahs' sons are not allowed in the schools unless they become converts; if a man becomes a Christian, somehow or other the prejudice is overlooked.

3864. I understand now that, as a general opinion, you would not object to handing over the schools to the control of the village?—No; if the educational rules are modified.

3865. Then as to Public Works; what I mean is, not giving a contract to the villagers, but handing over the whole grant, say for a village well, to be spent by the villagers, on the understanding that they are responsible for doing the work; you do not approve of that?—They might be allowed to carry out certain works, say the construction of wells. As regards the repair of irrigation works, that is another matter.

3866. That is provincial work; I am speaking now of local works only?—As regards drinking water wells and so on there will be no objection.

3867. If the estimate was for Rs. 500, and if they could build the well for Rs. 400, you would allow them to keep the Rs. 100 and devote it to some other village purpose?—Yes.

3868. (Sir Steyning Edgerley.) I take it that all your proposals about Advisory Councils and the increase of the system of village bodies, whether you call them panchayats or village unions, really depend on your proposals for the increase of the supervising establishment?—No, they are independent of them.

3869. You do not think they would depend for success on the leisure of the superior officers to run them?—No.

3870. You would have them in any case?—If my proposal is not sanctioned, I would allow Advisory Boards to Divisional Officers also, as at present constituted.

3871. You would begin there?—Yes.

3872. Suppose your proposals were sanctioned, would you put a Civilian who is at present a Sub-Collector or a Head Assistant Collector in charge of one of your taluks?—Yes; I propose giving the Sub-Collectors to the Collectors as Personal Assistants without any charge; I would give each Collector one Sub-Collector.

3873. That would mean a reduction in the number of Civil Servants required for the Presidency?—No.

3874. Why not?—Instead of being in charge of divisions they will be Personal Assistants to the Collectors.

3875. I understand that an average Collector in Madras has two experienced Assistants, and one young Assistant in training?—That is for divisions; he will be Personal Assistant to the Collector without charge in a division. I do not want to reduce the number; on the contrary I wanted to increase the number to 14; but the commercial results worked out to an increase of three lakhs of rupees, so that frightened me. Instead of being in charge of a taluk he will be at the headquarters of the district to relieve the Collector of an enormous amount of minor details.

3876. Then we assume that the Collector will be very much more free than he is at present?—Exactly.

3877. And we assume that the work will be very much better done, because a great deal of the appellate work which is now done on report is to be done by the superior officer?—Yes.

3878. Will not that mean a very considerable delegation of the Collector's power from the Board?—Yes.

3879. And much more finality in the work of the district?—Yes. Owing to want of time I have not been able to look into the existing powers, but generally I am in favour of extending his powers in all directions.

3880. You would rather enlarge his powers and make him a much bigger man and the work would stop to a great extent there?—Yes.

3881. A great deal of that would require legislation?—With regard to extension of powers, yes.

3882. And also you would probably have to have legislation to institute your panchayats and Advisory Councils?—Yes.

3883. What sort of legislation do you think would be best? There is a question here suggesting that all these things might be in one of two forms, either by a very general Act allowing a considerable freedom of experiment, or else by taking at any particular moment the legislation you require and waiting until you see the result of that and legislating further if you want more?—In this Presidency we have been doing many things without actual legislation, and I think these are only administrative acts; you might go on and see how the experiment works, without any legislation.

3884. You think you could begin without any legislation at all?—Yes.

3885. With the village panchayats to try cases?—No; with regard to that of course the Village Munsiff's Courts Act would have to be amended.

3886. Would you try to draw up a scheme and pass it out and try in the Legislative Council and work it, or would you introduce an Act which would give considerable rule-making power, so that you might try different experiments in different districts, and modify them if necessary without again having recourse to the Legislative Council in order to do it?—Yes, that could be done.

3887. Which would you think the better?—Probably, in these days, legislation would be the best.

3888. You mean specific legislation?—Yes.

3889. And then to come back to the Legislative Council in 3 or 4 years' time or whatever it may be?—Yes.

3890. You would prefer that course to the other?—Yes. As regards the Advisory Councils I do not think any legislation is necessary, because we do not propose to give them any responsibility at present.

3891. But with regard to the panchayats?—With regard to the panchayats it would be necessary.

3892. Now with regard to delegation to Collectors. You have been all over India?—Yes.

3893. Have you ever looked at this Act, V of 1868, a Sind Act?—No.

3894. Under the Act powers are given to delegate whenever Government choose to sanction; they do not go for each delegation to the Legislative Council; everything that is ripe for delegation is given by executive notification?—I think that would be useful.

3895. Would you go rather for legislation by schedule or for general legislation?—General legislation!

3896. You went over India with the Irrigation Commission, and I suppose you saw many systems at work?—Yes.

3897. Did you study them much?—To some extent.

3898. Did you come back impressed with your own system after all?—Well, I think our system is much better than the system in any other province.

3899. (Chairman.) You told us, with regard to demands for returns for the Legislative Council and so forth, that there were a great number of them. In the matter of vital statistics which you said were amongst the returns demanded, are these accurately prepared?—Fairly accurately.
